MR. ASQUITH : Yes; I adhere in every particular to my former answer, which was founded on the statement made by Mr. Walsh to the Superintendent at the time. What took place appears to have been as follows :—After the meeting broke up a noisy crowd assembled outside; but this did not prevent Mr. Walsh from proceeding to Alscot Road on his way home. After he had proceeded half-way down the street some disorderly lads threw stones, whether at Mr. Walsh or not is uncertain; anyhow he was hit and much hurt. The perpetrators of the outrage ran away before the police arrived; and they could, therefore, do nothing more than assist the rev. gentleman, first to a chemist's shop, where the wound on his face was dressed, and thence to his home.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : On what does the right hon. Gentleman, who expresses not the slightest sympathy with the rev. gentleman, base his statement that the report was exaggerated? I call attention to the letter in The Times of to-day.

MR. ASQUITH : My statement is founded on the information given by the rev. gentleman himself. The hon. Member has spoken of a "howling mob," a description which is not borne out by the evidence of the police, or by the statement made by the rev. gentleman himself at the time.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : The right hon. Gentleman seems to attribute the words "howling mob" to me. [Cries of "Order!"] I shall certainly move the Adjournment of the Debate if I am interrupted. The words "howling mob" were written by the wife of the rev. gentleman, and the House has a right to assume that they are used with his assent.

RAILWAY RATES.

SIR J. WHITEHEAD (Leicester) : I wish to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state definitely when his Motion for the appointment of the Committee on Railway Rates and the Reference thereto will be taken?

MR. MUNDELLA : The Select Committee to be appointed to consider the subject of Railway Rates has now been arranged to the satisfaction of both sides. [Colonel HOWARD VINCENT : No.] Two Members have been added to meet wishes expressed on both sides, and in these circumstances I hope I may be allowed to move the Committee to-night. If it is not moved the responsibility will not rest with the Government, as they have done everything possible to meet the desires of hon. Gentlemen interested.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT : There is a Notice of Motion in my name. I think it is absolutely essential that the right hon. Gentleman should himself be a Member of the Committee.

MR. MUNDELLA : I consider that the Department is the best judge of what can be done in that respect. I should like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether it is in Order for the hon. Member to move me on the Committee without my consent?

MR. SPEAKER : The consent of the right hon. Gentleman must be obtained.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT : In the interests of the right hon. Gentleman's and my own constituents I hope to obtain that consent.

MR. BARTLEY : Are we then to understand the Committee will be moved to-night?

MR. MUNDELLA : Yes.

MR. BARTLEY : At what hour will consideration of the Government of Ireland Bill be suspended?

MR. MUNDELLA : At the usual time. The Motion will be made in the customary way after 12 o'clock.

THE SCOTCH SUSPENSORY BILL.

× MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.) : Do the Government intend to proceed this Session with the Suspensory Bill relating to the Church of Scotland?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : It will be inconvenient for me to give an answer with regard to the other Business of the Government until I know what time is to be occupied with the stages of the Government of Ireland Bill.

THE WHITSUNTIDE HOLIDAYS.

MR. MACFARLANE : I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, having regard to the state of Public Business, he will consider the desirability of cur-

VOL. XII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

tailoring or entirely dispensing with the Whitsuntide Holidays?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : There is a limit to the demands which the House should make on the physical strength of Members. Hon. Members have lately been hard pressed, and they will continue to be hard pressed; and, therefore, I do not think the proposal the Government intend to make with regard to the holidays is unreasonable. At the same time, I admire the readiness of the hon. Gentleman to make the sacrifice which he has named.

THE UNFOUNDED CHARGE AGAINST AN OXFORD TUTOR.

MR. BYLES : I beg to ask the Home Secretary if his attention has been called to the extraordinary proceedings in connection with the arrest on imperfect evidence and without warrant of an Oxford tutor, and the failure of the police to deliver a letter which he sent to his friends? Will the right hon. Gentleman cause inquiry to be made into the circumstances?

MR. ASQUITH : I must ask for notice of that question.

THE DERBY DAY.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) : On a point of Order, I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether the practice of allowing a private Member to move the Adjournment for the Derby is not one which has grown up without any regular sanction by the Rules of the House; and whether, the Motion for such Adjournment having been defeated last year, it is still within the discretion of any private Member to bring it forward?

MR. SPEAKER : Up to the year 1878 it was the custom for the Government to make that Motion; but it has since been in the hands of private Members, and the fact of the Motion having been rejected last year is no reason why an hon. Member should not again bring it forward. Probably in a new Parliament the hon. Gentleman thinks he will have a better chance of carrying it.

THE COURSE OF BUSINESS.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) : The Prime Minister has informed us that Supply will be taken on the day the House re-assembles after the Whitsun Recess. Will he state if it has been decided on the following day to resume the Committee on the Home Rule Bill and continue it day by day?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Probably as to Tuesday, and with regard to a series of days forward from that time, it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the Government of Ireland Bill.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

(No. 209.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 12th May.]
[SIXTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Legislative Authority.

Clause 2 (Powers of Irish Legislature).

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 14, to leave out from the beginning of the Clause to the word "there," in line 15.—(Mr. Cavendish.)

Question again proposed, "That the words, 'With the exceptions' stand part of the Clause."

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) said, he thought this was one of the most important Amendments they had had upon this Bill, and it was another of those tests by which they sought to ascertain the intentions of the Government. They had already heard them say that the Parliament was to be a subordinate Parliament; and when they got their answer to this Amendment they would learn further as to the quality of the Legislature which was not to be called a Parliament, but which, it appeared, was to have all the powers of a Parliament. They had spent a great deal of time in speaking—he would not call it discussion, because discussion presumed the existence of two parties; whereas, up to now, they had had arguments and inquiries on the one side, and, on the other hand, they had had nothing but lectures, platitudes, and interruptions, so that up to that moment it could not be said they had had half-an-hour's discussion on the Bill. He hoped the Government had seen they had wasted time enough over this attempt to carry out the policy which they successfully carried out in the country during the past six years—namely, to observe all the issues of this measure. ["Question!"] He expected that; but he would remind hon. Members opposite that they could no longer go on the vague phrase of "Home Rule," which might mean anything, but they now had the Bill before them; and the Amendment sought to elicit from the Government some meaning as to the measure which they had at last been obliged to discuss. Perhaps the hon. Member who called "Question!" had not yet been consulted by the Government as to the answer they should give to this Amendment, because on Friday night a Member said that hon. Members were in "a tight place!" It was the Government who were in a tight place over this Amendment and others that had been brought forward, because they were unable to give a definite answer as to whether they accepted this Amendment until they had ascertained the wishes and had obtained the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite. Hon. Members were not in any tight place, and they had a perfect right to be silent, seeing they had the Government Bench to say what they wanted said, and to do what they wanted done. There would be a considerable amount of support to this Amendment. His hon. Friend below him the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) he hoped would say something on it, because, in his election addresses, the hon. Member laid down this principle in a most statesmanlike manner—he said the Home Rule he was going to affirm was that in which the Imperial Parliament delegated certain measures and subjects to the Parliament in Ireland; and all that was not so delegated in the Bill he declared should be retained for what he called "the Mother Parliament." He (Mr. Collings) thought that was a very statesmanlike statement. If he consulted the feelings of the Government Bench, he should wish his hon. Friend not to speak, because they were very uneasy under his utterances. But he had no doubt the hon. Gentleman would vindicate his position by speaking on this Amendment. Then there were a large group sitting on that (the Ministerial) side of the House who had in their addresses gone on the same lines, but very much further than his

hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey). They had been unwilling—at least, they had not expressed their willingness further than to include such measures as Gas and Water and Private Bill Legislation; and he would be curious to know what they would say to delegating from this Parliament everything, with the exception of what was held back by the Bill itself. It might be said it would be difficult to define in a Bill the measures which should be delegated to the Irish Parliament; but the same difficulty existed with regard to those measures which they kept out of the Bill, and which would produce the same amount of discussion and anxiety. In Canada everything was retained in the power of the Federal Government, except those subjects which were delegated to the Provincial Parliament. It was not only due to the Committee, but it was due to the constituencies, that they should know something more about the powers of this proposed Parliament, because the interest taken in the measure by the constituencies, now that the actual text of it was before them, was really astonishing. He should wait with anxiety to know what the Government had to say on the point, if they were allowed by hon. Members opposite to answer. Perhaps the Government would tell them frankly; but, at any rate, there were Members on the Government Bench who had spoken very much on the lines of this Amendment. He did not see his right hon. Friend the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), who was equal to all and superior to a good many on the Treasury Bench in making his ideas clear and explicit, so that they could all understand them; but if that right hon. Gentleman would give them his opinion on this Amendment, and tell them why the Parliament in Ireland should not be restricted to those measures which were distinctly delegated by the Imperial Parliament, they would be very much indebted to him. At any rate, he hoped their appeals would not be treated as previous Amendments had been treated, but that they would have a discussion upon this Amendment. By discussion he meant a debate in which both sides should give their reasons and arguments, and not waste the time of the House, as the whole Session was likely to be wasted, by a fruitless attempt to get at the mind of the Government with regard to the proposals of the Bill and their intentions regarding it.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I waited because I hoped some Member of the Government would tell us what is the view of the Government with regard to the very important Amendment which has been moved by my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. Victor Cavendish), in a speech which the Committee will consider was extremely excellent and well-reasoned. My hon. Friend bears a name which will always be honoured in this House, and I think it will be a pleasure to all sides that he is himself likely to add to its lustre. The Amendment itself has suffered a little, perhaps, because it is one of a series of Amendments; it is only by putting them together that the exact effect of what my hon. Friend proposes can be ascertained. However, I think it is pretty generally understood that my hon. Friend desires that in this Bill we shall specify the powers we are to give, not, as is done here, by giving up all our powers with certain exceptions, but by keeping all our powers except those we specifically delegate. I think the House will see there is a great deal of difference between the proposal of the Bill and that of the Amendment. It is not merely a matter of drafting; it is also a matter of principle. My hon. Friend said he had not thought it necessary to put on the Paper the powers which should be delegated to the Irish Legislature. The fact is, my hon. Friend is not raising that point at all, but is merely raising at the present time the question of the method. If the Government view the Amendment favourably, it would be natural that they, who must know exactly what are the powers which they desire to delegate, should put them on the Paper. If they decline to do that and wish to throw the responsibility on the Unionists, no doubt we can furnish a list of the subjects we should think it safe to entrust to an Irish authority. I imagine the list would be considered rather short and rather incomplete by the Government. The proposal of the Amendment is that the Government should state to the Committee what powers the new Parliament is to have, and not what powers it is not to have. In the first place, I wish to point out that that course would be in accordance with all the best precedents with regard to the creation of subsidiary Legislatures. It would be in strict accordance with the precedents of the United States of America and Canada. They may not appear, on first sight, to be in accordance with precedent in the United States of America, and I must explain that the principle in all these cases has been that the power which claimed supreme authority should state definitely what portion of its power it was willing to delegate. In the case of the United States the separate States all claimed supreme and independent authority before they made the Union, and when they united they delegated to the Central Authority those powers which they did not intend to retain in their own hands. In the case of Canada the opposite course was followed. In Canada it was intended that the Dominion Parliament should be the supreme authority, and the powers reserved for the Provincial Parliaments were all specially delegated to them; whereas all the rest, unnamed or unforeseen, were retained in the hands of the Central Authority. The Dominion Act not only declared the powers to be given to the Provincial Parliaments, but also declared the powers to be reserved to the Dominion Parliament, but with a provision that that was not in any way to lessen the authority of the Dominion Parliament to deal with all such matters not specially reserved to Provincial Parliaments. Now, I would urge, in the second place, that the method which we propose is the more natural and easier way—easier to the Government, I mean, as well as to the Committee—of dealing with this subject. Let me put an illustration. Suppose a man told his friend that he was in difficulties and asked for money, would not the friend be certain to ask, in the first place, how much money was required in order to relieve the difficulties? And if he were satisfied he would advance the sum asked for. Surely he would never hand over his purse to the petitioner and say, "Keep back £5," or some other amount which he would name, "for me and take all the rest," knowing that, in doing so, he might be giving more than was asked for and more than he wanted to part with.

Mr. J. Chamberlain

The case now is precisely the same. This is a Bill brought in on the demand of the Irish Members. I suppose the Irish Members know exactly what they want; and I assume the Government are willing to give it. Would it not be right that we should state in the Bill what it is the Government are going to give to them, instead of leaving the matter in such a form that we may be giving to the Irish people more than they ask for and more than we want to give? In the third place, I should point out that this plan is the only way of letting the Committee and the country know what it is we are doing. I defy a layman, and I do not believe there are many lawyers who, without more consideration than they are willing to give, could say exactly what it is which, under this Bill, is being given to the Irish Parliament. We retain certain things for ourselves; but the moment you give the remainder you find heaps of things which you have not retained, and as to which it would be difficult to say beforehand whether the Government would be willing they should be handed over to the Irish Parliament. I will take two or three matters as an illustration, as showing the kind of questions that arise, and which will have to be raised by Amendments to this clause, with the probability that even after we have exhausted our ingenuity in raising Amendments on all the principal subjects that may be discussed, we may still have forgotten something which the Committee would have liked to have brought before it. Take the case of marriage and divorce. That is one of the subjects that is not named by way of exception, and, consequently, would be handed over to the Irish Parliament. I do not know what is the opinion of the Government; but I would ask them, is it their opinion—is it their intention—that the Irish Legislature should have the power of dealing with the question of civil marriages? That is an important question, and one worthy of lengthened debate. It may be the Government do not intend that a matter of this importance should be taken from the Imperial control. If so, it was an omission on their part, caused by the particular way in which they have drafted the Bill. Then there is another question. Foreign trade is not to be in the hands of the Irish Legislature ; but, as I understand it, all that concerns domestic trade will be in their hands. Is it intended they should deal with factory legislation ? I do not know the intention of the Government, but would point out this will have to be seriously debated, because we have, by our own factory legislation, imposed very serious obligations in the interests of the working classes upon manufacturers and other persons engaged in industry ; and if the Irish Parliament is to be permitted to relieve manufacturers in Ireland from all these conditions, of course they would be in a better position, so far as competition went, than the English manufacturers, and that might be an indirect way of giving a bounty and encouraging and stimulating Irish industry. I say, again, I am not pronouncing authoritatively on the subject ; it is one of very considerable difficulty ; but I say it is very much fairer and better that the Imperial Parliament should state to the Irish Legislature it is one of the subjects to go to them, instead of leaving it to be discovered by implication as we are obliged to discover it under the form of this Bill. Then there is another important question to be considered. Navigation is excluded from the control of the Irish Parliament ; but does anyone know what it means ? I have asked several lawyers, and they have told me that it is open to considerable doubt. It appears to be very doubtful whether merchant shipping legislation is included in the term "Navigation." Do the Government intend that the merchant shipping legislation is to be different in Ireland from what it is in this country ? Is a shipowner in this country, upon whom a burden has been placed with the desire of protecting life at sea—

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) rose to Order, and asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was in Order in discussing these extraneous subjects—subjects that were not in the least connected with the clause ?

THE CHAIRMAN : The right hon. Gentleman is in Order, because the Amendment raises the question of the powers to be delegated to the Irish Parliament.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : I am accustomed to these interruptions ; but I think that they have got rather low down. Do the Government intend that the shipowners of the country, who object to the regulations imposed upon them, should be able to transfer their ships to Irish ports in order to escape all these regulations and obligations ? If so, this will raise a very serious question ; and it appears to me that this is one of the questions which might easily escape the notice both of the Government and of the Committee in consequence of the form of the Bill. Coinage is also excluded from the powers of the Irish Legislature. Banking and currency are not included. Banking and coinage will raise an infinity of questions with regard to which it may be extremely doubtful whether the Irish Parliament should be in a position to pass legislation differing from the legislation of this country. I would impress upon the Committee the extreme importance of having all the powers specified which it is proposed to confer, in order that Parliament may not, by inadvertence, find that it has conferred some power which Ireland does not desire, and which it might be inconvenient that it should possess. Under the proposal of my hon. Friend, mistakes, which must be made in forming a new Constitution, were much more easily corrected than they would be under the Bill ; because nothing would be easier, if certain powers are granted, and it is found hereafter that something has been omitted which it is desirable to add, than to bring in a Bill making the necessary addition. On the other hand, if Parliament grants more than is wished, or more than is or has been asked for, nothing will be more difficult than to withdraw the power already granted. Under the proposal of my hon. Friend, also, it would be much more easy to treat this question as an experiment. I do not suppose that the Prime Minister is under the belief that he is making a final settlement of the Irish Question. Every reasonable man believes that even if the Bill passes as it stands now it would not be accepted as final by either the Irish Members or the Irish people ; and certainly it would not be accepted by the Irish Members and their constituents of the future. The Bill, therefore, must be in the nature of an experiment. If the proposal of my hon. Friend were adopted, it would be open to the Committee to treat the Bill as an experiment, in which case the Committee might think it wise to be very moderate in the concession of the powers to be made, retaining always in the hands of the Imperial Parliament the power of adding more hereafter and averting any mistake now of attempting to secure anything in the nature of a final settlement even by the largest concessions. The question of supremacy is connected particularly with this clause; but the very idea of supremacy goes to the wall if Parliament hands over to another Legislative Authority all the powers which are not expressly reserved. The Supreme Authority always delegates and defines its delegated powers, reserving to itself all the other powers which it does not specifically give away. If the Government refuse this Amendment it will confirm the impression which we have derived from their attitude towards previous Amendments—that, although they are willing to establish what has been described as a paper supremacy, they have no idea in their own minds of creating a real, vital, and satisfactory supremacy. The Prime Minister will no doubt remember that this was one of the points raised early in the discussions of the Bill of 1886 by the present Duke of Devonshire—then Lord Hartington—and as being one of the conditions which were preliminary even to the consideration of the question of establishing a new Legislative Authority in Ireland. Speaking from memory, I think the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) expressed a willingness to give the proposal of that time, now embodied in this Amendment, his favourable consideration if it ever came formally before him. I hope, therefore, that he will give every consideration to the terms of this Amendment.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): There is one satisfactory subject in connection with this Amendment, and that is the manner in which it has been presented to the Committee. I join with my right hon. Friend (Mr. J. Chamberlain) in bearing testimony to the excellent performance of the Mover of it, and in expressing the hope that may be entertained of the hon. Gentleman's future. I cannot, however, say as much with regard to the beginning of the Debate this afternoon. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham began his speech by saying that the result of the speech of the right hon. Member for the Bordesley Division (Mr. Jesse Collings) must have been to draw a reply from the Government. I have never in all my life heard a speech which appeared to me to less need a reply. I am surprised that the right hon. Member for West Birmingham has been under any difficulty or doubt as to the mode in which the Government must deal with a question of this kind. It is a misfortune of the Amendment that it does not contain any decisive words. As far as the mere verbal effect of the Amendment is concerned, it looks more like an enlargement of the powers of the Irish Government than their contraction; and it will, therefore, be understood that, though I am not making any objection to the Amendment verbally, yet I object to its obvious and recognised meaning. I do not think that it is a good Amendment verbally considered, because, considering the nature of the reservations which the Government introduce in a subsequent clause, it is right and even needful that there should be a reference to those reservations in the present clause, where they are conferring the main legislative power. There are two methods in considering this question which may be adopted, and which have been fairly stated by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. You may grant by the enumeration of that which is granted, or you may grant by the enumeration of what is not granted. That is really the point at issue. It is quite true that there is one method of dealing with the question which the Government have treated as a matter of drafting, and that is the method by which we have gone through the particular subjects of local government in Ireland winding up the catalogue with a covering clause; but that is not a method of proceeding which need, in any degree, narrow the distance between the Government and their opponents. Therefore, I put it aside. The Government have considered it largely, and their conclusion is that it is not attended with any recommendation of convenience or policy to counterbalance the considerable complication which it would tend to introduce into the provisions of the Bill. What is the meaning and essence of this Bill? It is a Bill to constitute a Legislature in Ireland for the purpose of dealing, I may say, with all properly Irish concerns which are not Imperial concerns, subject, possibly, to some limited reservation like the limited reservation the Government have inserted in the Bill with respect to land; but, speaking generally, it must be well understood that the Government divide the subjects of government as between Ireland and Great Britain into two classes—one, those which are of common Imperial interest; the other, those which are of local interest, or are domestic matters belonging to Ireland. Our object is to reserve, as strictly as it is possible to do so, to the Imperial Parliament the subjects which are of Imperial concern. We have laboured to make enumeration as full as we can make it according to our reflections and inquiries. We do not say that it is complete. It is possible we may not have included in it something that ought to have been included; but that is a detail, and the line can be drawn in particular cases when they arise. But with regard to those matters which are Irish, domestic and local, we do not intend to proceed by giving a subject here and a subject there, and keeping back every other matter to be met by a covering clause. That would be totally contrary to our intention, to the distinct meaning of the Bill, to everything that has been done in all prior legislation of a developing kind, and to the policy and expediency of the case. My right hon. Friend has said that the Bill is in the nature of an experiment, and that the course he advocates would make the experiment more easy. But if the Government accept the Amendment and the consequent Amendments, will my right hon. Friend accept the Bill?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Certainly not.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Just so. I might best describe my right hon. Friend's attitude by a homely phrase which undoubtedly requires an apology, which is, that he intends to deal with the Government on the principle of "Heads I win, tails you lose." In the arrangements of the Bill we are to enter upon a new and complicated investigation; and when you have completed it within this year, or within some future years, you are to wind up—

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Surely my right hon. Friend does not contend that it is not competent for us to try and amend this Bill unless we are prepared to accept it?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No; that is not my contention. I am merely unveiling a state of facts. When my right hon. Friend used this honeyed language as to the blessings and benefits of this experimental form, some soft-minded man might think that he was relenting a little in this matter, and that he was ready, in conformity with the precedents in former years, to proceed on the principle of the delegation of certain subjects to an Irish Legislature. There might be some reason in giving way, if we had it authentically that by doing so we could conciliate our opponents without endangering the vital essence of our measure; but as it is, the case is this: We are to undergo the very considerable labour of re-construction, and we are to have our return not in £ s. d., but in nought, nought, nought. My right hon. Friend has raised a number of questions, most of them of vast importance, in order to terrify the Committee; but there is not the smallest doubt of the intention of the Government, which is to reserve effectively, simply, and largely all that can fairly be called Imperial matters, and to give as effectively, as simply, and as largely all that can fairly be called Irish and local matters. My right hon. Friend has enumerated a number of questions. He asks, "Do we hand over the Marriage Law?" Yes, we do; why should we not? Ireland has got a different Marriage Law now from the English law. Why in the world, therefore, are we to convert this Bill into a restricting instead of an enlarging Bill, and to take away from Ireland that distinction in the Marriage Law which she now enjoys and largely prizes?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I never suggested it.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I thought my right hon. Friend did. Someone suggested it. I am aware that there are no Divorce Laws in Ireland. That is a very great distinction in the Marriage Laws in Ireland; and if I am rightly informed, it is one that Ireland highly prizes, and in that I think Ireland is right. As to factory legislation, if the Irish people suffer by it, they will suffer at the hands of men whom they will have chosen to govern them. It is purely a matter of local interest and concern of which the Irish Representatives are best qualified to judge. In such a matter they have every title to judge, and they will need no instruction from England as to the principles of humanity and of the best policy. As to the currency, I am not quite sure whether the language of the Bill as it stands is the best adapted to its purpose; but the intention of the Government is plain: They consider that the standard of value is an Imperial matter, and that that standard of value, and everything touching it, should be reserved. If proposals are to be adopted for introducing a double standard, that will have to be decided in this House. If Ireland were to give power to issue promissory notes, that would be a matter of currency; and would be within the powers of the Irish Legislature under this Bill. But if she were to say that those notes should be legal tender for debt, that, I think, would immediately be a part of the standard of value. Speaking largely and generally, the Government propose to resist as incompatible any limits being imposed on the local Irish concerns, which are to be handed over to be dealt with by the Irish Parliament. The Irish people, according to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, are to be treated as little children. A child would be given some pocket money, but a very limited amount. Great Britain is to stand in loco parentis to the Irish people; but the Irish would regard the assumption of that attitude with very considerable misgiving, considering what has been the history of Ireland for 700 years. The affection which England has shown to Ireland during that period does not justify proceeding on the parental basis. The difference between the position of the Government and that of the right hon. Gentleman is this: The great measure under consideration has in it something of an experiment, for we have no absolute certainty as to the future. But the right hon. Gentleman recommends one form of experiment, and the Government recommends another. The Government method is to concede local affairs and to retain Imperial affairs, and that is the often-tested and always successful plan on which Parliament has proceeded in all its legislation up to the present time. That experience supplies guidance in the present case. But the experiment of the right hon. Gentleman is wholly novel, and one upon which no light is cast by experience in any quarter. It would be at once rejected by those who spoke in the name of the Irish people. The Government desire to avail themselves of all the guidance to be derived from practical results, and these are largely available. Another reason for reserving Imperial subjects nominated, and for granting local subjects not nominated, is that the subjects of common interest between England and Ireland, though of vital importance, could be brought into a very narrow compass. But the great bulk of the business of Government is local and domestic, and this domestic part of the business of Government is continually extending. There are a multitude of subjects now regarded as proper and ordinary matters for the cognisance of Parliament which, when I began Parliamentary life, Parliament would have utterly declined to recognise. The right hon. Gentleman knows as well as I do that not a single man representing the Nationalists of Ireland would travel with him a single inch on the road he pointed out. That form of legislation would attain none of the objects desired on one side of the House or the other. The proper and only method is to reserve Imperial subjects, for two reasons: First, because it is a task which can easily be performed, and which has been performed in the main. If any defect in the enumeration be found later, it can easily be remedied; secondly, because it is impossible to enumerate local subjects. When Ireland proceeds to deal with her local affairs, it is almost a moral certainty that subjects will come up which, in a process of previous enumeration, will never have come into one's mind. The result will be that Ireland will come to the House of Commons to ask for further legislation. Every practical object is in favour of the Government plan. But, over and above all these practical objects, is the great question of principle. What Ireland asks is the restoration or concession to her of the power of dealing with her own local Irish concerns. If that be not given to her, it would be better to give her nothing. Anything else would be a miserable mockery, and a great descent from the lofty elevation at which British legislation has hitherto been conducted. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the United States. He said that there the States are the supreme power, and that that power limits the subjects which are given to the control of the Federal Government. That is so, but the reason they are limited is that they are few and very easily to be described. There can be no doubt that in the United States a condition of things obtains which does not obtain here. In the innumerable—the multitude—of cases that might be cited, where is one favourable to the right hon. Gentleman's view? Canada affords no example of the relations between a subordinate and a supreme Legislature. One view is that the purposes of local government ought to be left free and open within the proper sphere. The Government desire to do everything to preserve the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament; but it will not be a supremacy which will satisfy the right hon. Gentleman, because the right hon. Gentleman will not admit to be a real supremacy anything but a supremacy which would irritate and reduce Irish affairs to a still more obnoxious position than they occupy at present. But with regard to the assertion of the principle of supremacy, the Government desire to keep it in its absolute fulness—subject to no limitation, except the geographical limitation. They desire to be faithful to their pledges in regard to it; but they desire to be equally faithful in their pledges with regard to the effective grant to Ireland of local government and local administration.

*MR. H. MATTHEWS (Birmingham, E.): In the course of the speech which he has just delivered, the Prime Minister said to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, "If we accept this Amendment, will you accept the rest of the Bill?" That is hardly a fair question. The Opposition are surely entitled to ask the Government to accept an Amendment without being thereby bound to accept the rest of the Bill.

The speech of the Prime Minister must make it clear to everyone that what Parliament is asked to create is not a subordinate Parliament at all. It is quite true that the right hon. Gentleman has said that the Irish Legislature is to be subordinate to the Imperial Parliament; but, at the same time, the right hon. Gentleman has stoutly resisted the insertion of the word "subordinate" in the 1st clause. If the right hon. Gentleman desired to set up a sovereign and supreme Parliament in Ireland, he could not have employed more apt words for the purpose than are to be found in this Bill as it stands. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the case of Canada. I am quite aware that in the case of Canada a supremacy has been reserved to the Imperial Parliament, but that supremacy is a purely nominal one, and has no practical effect whatever. Is that the sort of supremacy of the Imperial Parliament which hon. Members opposite intend to reserve in the case of the Irish Legislature? I am not aware of any instance in which this House has interfered with the internal affairs of the Colonies after the grant of Representative Government has been made to them. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister appears to have a confused notion with regard to the affairs which an Irish Legislature should have control over, and those which it should not have power to deal with. For instance, the right hon. Gentleman says that only Imperial affairs and matters of common interest are withdrawn from the control of the Irish Legislature. But, at the same time, the Irish Legislature is not to have control of even denominational education, which would appear to be a matter of local interest, while it is to have control over the law of marriage and divorce. Surely it is a matter of common interest to the two countries that the law relating to marriage and divorce should be the same in both. If a man were held to be married in England and not married in Ireland, and if his issue were legitimate in this country and illegitimate in Ireland, and could not, therefore, inherit property in Ireland, how inconvenient it would be! It may be said that there is at present a considerable difference between Scotch law and the English law upon this subject, but that is no reason why a third law should be established. Is the Irish Legislature to have power to deal with the Merchant Shipping Act, with the law relating to bankruptcy and insolvency? and will it be empowered to authorise the issue of a paper currency which is not to be a legal tender, and which will have no reserve of bullion behind it? Surely all these are subjects of common interest; and yet the Irish Legislature, as we have gathered from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, is to have power to deal with them. And, moreover, over these questions, which may be determined so disastrously for the two countries, the Ulster Representatives will have practically no control. Again, there is the subject of the Criminal Law. Surely it is of the first importance that the Criminal Law of the two countries should be identical—surely it is a question of common interest? Are we not entitled to ask the House to introduce safer provisions than are given at the present time? Suppose it were proposed to set up a different Criminal Law as to murder from that which prevails now—

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JOHN MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): There is a different Criminal Law at present in Scotland.

*MR. H. MATTHEWS: The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary says there is a different law at present in Scotland. I am sorry to say that is so; but that difference, which we have inherited, is no reason why we should set up differences in Ireland. A difference of any kind is to be deplored. But in regard to any future changes in the law—the Criminal Law—do the Members of the Government and the gentlemen supporting them ever intend that a supremacy should be exercised? Do they intend that this Legislature shall be no more a subordinate Legislature than in Canada, or will they tell us how, or under what circumstances, you intend to exercise a supremacy? I ask hon. Gentlemen do they intend never to exercise that supremacy? Do they mean the Irish Legislature to be a Colonial Legislature? If so, this mode of dealing with the question is the right one to adopt. But if they mean to create a subordinate Legislature, it is clear that the only logical—sensible—mode is to enumerate those subjects which you delegate. Even in the case of the Colonies the rule has not been quite universal. For instance, in the case of New Zealand you gave a Legislature with power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of New Zealand, provided that such laws were not repugnant to the laws of England.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!

MR. H. MATTHEWS: There is no clause here to that effect.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Look at Clause 33.

*MR. H. MATTHEWS: That is a clause which undoubtedly enables the Imperial Legislature to pass an Act "expressly extended to Ireland"—whatever those words may mean—and Irish Acts will be valid so far as they are not inconsistent with that Act. That is what Clause 33 says in singularly inflated language. But that section does not prevent the Irish Legislature from creating a totally different system of laws from those prevailing on this side of St. George's Channel. Under the Bill the Irish Legislature will be perfectly free to legislate as it thinks proper. The right hon. Gentleman will probably say that if there is inconsistency between the Acts of the two Parliaments it shall be the Imperial law that shall prevail. That is true in theory as it is in the case of the Colonies. But when you have given powers so wide as these to the Irish Legislature you will never be able to defend your action if you endeavour to interfere in Ireland. The only way to preserve to yourselves any practical control and right of interference is to part wholly with those subjects on which you do not wish to interfere, and to reserve all those subjects on which you are likely to desire to interfere. Take the Criminal Law, for instance. It would be a great misfortune if that were to become different in the two countries. Is the penalty of death to remain in one and to be done away with in the other? The truth is, that the more light that is thrown on this subject the more plainly it appears that unless some of these Amendments are accepted by the Government the Legislature you are creating is not a subordinate Legislature. The Irish Judges will construe any two Acts which may happen to clash in favour of the Irish Parliament, and will give—and rightly give—a wide and sweeping interpretation to the 2nd clause of the Bill which will practically exclude British control. The presumption will always be in favour of the Irish enactment—and ought to be. It will be held that the Irish Parliament is vested with the widest and most ample powers to say what shall be the law on all subjects that the Legislature can touch at all. Every conceivable subject that can be made a matter of law, with the exception of Clauses 3 and 4, is committed to the Irish Parliament; and in the case of a conflict, as I say, the balance will always incline towards the vast powers of this clause. With that regard for popular Institutions and Assemblies which this House has always exhibited you will not be able to interfere. That would appear to be the clear result of the 2nd clause as it stands now; therefore, for my part, I shall vote for the Amendment.

MR. HALDANE (Haddington) said, the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had made a most remarkable speech, and had told them a number of things which, speaking for himself, he did not know before. The right hon. Gentleman had said that in some instances laws which were valid in Scotland were void in England. That was obviously a mistake. He had told them that the Colonial Legislatures were Sovereign Legislatures—oblivious, apparently, of the fact that in earlier days there were a large number of Acts passed by this very Parliament interfering in specific matters that were within the competence of the Colonial Legislatures. But the most extraordinary of all the right hon. Gentleman's extraordinary statements was the one which he put forward, in conjunction with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, to the effect that all the precedents made in favour of delegation of authority, with the exception of the doubtful case of Canada, were to be found in cases of subordinate Constitutions, and that there were none in favour of the method adopted by the Government. There was not a single precedent in favour of delegation; but in every instance that could be brought forward the precedent was completely and conclusively in favour of the method adopted in this Bill. In the United States there was called into existence—not a subordinate Legislature, not a Provincial Parliament, not an ordinary Legislature of Home Rule—but a life of the nation, a supreme Sovereign Authority which, by its constitution, was Federal in its nature, spreading itself and distributing itself between various co-ordinate parts. That was not a Legislature in point. Then let them come to nearer illustrations. In the case of Canada, the Australasian Colonies, the Cape of Good Hope, and our Crown Colonies, we had granted powers not specifically, not enumerating them, but according to the stock and well-established form which was the legal formula expressing Home Rule. What was that formula? It was the power of making laws “for the peace, order, and good government” of the country upon whom the Legislature was conferred. That formula was adopted in the case of Canada; and it was a mistake to say—as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had said—that an analogy in the case of Canada was to be found in the distribution of legislative powers between the Dominion Parliament and the Provincial Parliaments. It was to be found in the grant of Home Rule to Canada in the delegation by the Sovereign Parliament in 1867—in the 97th section of the British North America Act of 1867. By that Act they gave powers in general terms, as they were given them by this Bill; and they made reservations as they did in the present case, with this difference: that in the case of Canada the reservation was made in favour of the Provincial Parliament, while here it was in favour of the Imperial Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham spoke of this system of delegation of specific powers as if it were Home Rule, and as though he were accommodating himself in some way to the desire which was being expressed by those who, with the Government, were in favour of a system of Home Rule for Ireland. That reminded him of the set-off in the historic days of the Round Table. The right hon. Gentleman said, in effect, that the Unionists did not bring forward these Amendments and make these speeches because of enmity to the objects of the Government, but because they wanted to put the Bill into a definite shape. The real object of the Government was not to assist the Government, but to destroy the Bill. They were giving to the Irish people, under this Bill, a restricted form of government, with great safeguards, greater than they had reserved in the case of any of their Colonies. They were giving powers to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the country. It was not desirable to restrict those powers and to have constant friction between the two countries, and constant questions arising as to whether a particular question came within one form of specific delegation or another form of specific reservation. Did the right hon. Gentleman know the amount of friction which had taken place between the Dominion Parliament in Canada and the Provincial Parliaments? Did he know that almost constantly questions which had caused the greatest friction and bitterness came before the Privy Council in consequence of the obscurity of the form of delegation? And did he know that the consequence of the system there was that they had the Dominion Government making one set of laws for, say, Ontario, and the Ontario Legislature making an exactly similar set of laws for itself? It was not difficult to show that there was no precedent whatever in favour of the course which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham proposed, while every precedent supported the course which the Government wished to follow. It was impossible to state what the Irish would want, because they could not define the whole range of questions which must be discussed by an Irish Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman who had last spoken had said they were going to allow the Irish Parliament to make Marriage Laws, and that the result of that would be that they would put the Irish Parliament in the position of being able to annul marriages which had been legitimately contracted. But there was absolutely nothing in this statement. No doubt, any law the Irish Parliament might make would affect persons domiciled in Ireland; but it would not touch persons domiciled on the other side of St. George's Channel; and if it did, the case would be a proper one for the exercise of the veto. In the exercise of the veto in such a case, we should only be following the precedent of what had been done in the case of the Australian Colonies. It was said in support of these Amendments that if they were adopted the Imperial Parliament would be in a better position to interfere if it wished to show that its supremacy was a real one. The reasons advanced by the supporters of the Amendment seemed to him to disclose what lay behind all their arguments touching supremacy. It was evident that what they were aiming at was to so mould the Bill and introduce words into it to alter its form as to render it possible to say, "In passing this Bill, Parliament declared by implication, if not in terms, for the policy of allowing the Imperial Parliament to interfere at every turn to overhaul the work of the Irish Parliament." He trusted that in the course of the Debates on the Bill the Government would not show any weakness—he did not believe they would on this point—but would reject every Amendment, and that, while maintaining intact the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, they would make it plain that they meant to give Ireland Home Rule in substance, and not merely in form or theory. They should make it clear that what they meant to do was to give the Irish Parliament the power of managing its own affairs, and that by rejecting this plan of specific delegation and everything else of a similar nature they would make it plain to the Irish people that what they were endeavouring to pass was a real Home Rule Bill and not a sham one.

Mr. Haldane

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.) said, the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down hoped the Government would reject all Amendments. ["No, no!"] Yes; he had taken down the hon. and learned Gentleman's words. He had said—"I trust they will reject everything." ["No, no!"] Hon. Members said "No, no!" but the hon. and learned Gentleman to whom he referred did not interfere in the matter.

MR. HALDANE said, he never for a moment had suggested such a thing.

MR. RENTOUL said, the matter was before the House. He had taken down the hon. and learned Member's words. Of course, if he did not mean them it was another matter. Those who desired that the Government should not concede anything were very likely to have that desire gratified, judging from what had taken place since they had got into Committee, because hitherto everything that had been moved by the Unionist Party had been rejected. The hon. and learned Gentleman, in the larger part of his speech, dealt with historic analogy; but the Ulster Unionist Members agreed with the hon. Member for North Armagh, and were of opinion that no historic analogies touched this question in the smallest degree. They desired rather to look at the question as a plain, practical matter, affecting those residing in Ulster in their business and general home relations. Therefore, they thought that references to countries thousands of miles away had no reference to the question at issue. The speech of the Prime Minister differed, in their opinion, extremely from the speech which he delivered on Thursday evening, because they were then unable—and possibly it was their own fault—to understand that he gave any information in answer to the inquiries of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham; and he could not help thinking that it was the duty of the right hon. Gentleman, as Prime Minister, to come down to the low level of their capacities, and make them understand the answer he had given. But they could not make that complaint that afternoon, because the Prime Minister had been perfectly clear in the statements he made. The one, great, central illustration to which the hon. Gentleman referred again and again, and which appeared to be the substance of his speech about treating the Irish people as children—giving them some pocket money and saying that, if they used it well, they should have some more—absolutely failed. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister again and again spoke of Ireland. But there was just one difficulty that arose. The majority in Ireland undoubtedly had the larger number of votes; but the minority had the larger amount of property; therefore, when the Prime Minister talked of giving pocket money to the Irish majority, the analogy failed altogether. It was not a case of giving pocket money to a child to see how the child would spend it. It was a case of appointing trustees or managers over the affairs and properties of other people. The majority in an Irish Parliament would be the managers of the wealth of the minority; and, therefore, it was no insult to the majority of the Irish people to say—"We will give you small powers at first to see how you will exercise them." Surely there could be nothing wrong in stating what were the subjects to be left to the Irish Parliament; and if the Unionist minority were to be treated fairly, it was only common justice to tell them what were the powers which the Irish Parliament was to exercise over them and their property. "But," said the Prime Minister, "this is only a detail." Well, it appeared to him (Mr. Rentoul) that if there was one thing which was not a detail it was just that particular thing. The exceptions should be extended to such an extent as to make the Bill valueless to Irish Home Rulers altogether. The Prime Minister said that the principle was that they should give the Irish Parliament control over Irish subjects and withhold from it control over Imperial subjects. But in 1886 the right hon. Gentleman said it was impossible to make a distinction between local and Imperial subjects; and that difficulty certainly remained at the present time. The right hon. Gentleman said he would unveil the position of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. He said to the right hon. Gentleman—"Will you accept the Bill if we accept this Amendment?" The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham naturally said "No." "Then," said the Prime Minister, "we have the matter clearly before us. We offer you a Bill; you offer us an Amendment; but if we accept it, you have no intention whatever of accepting the Bill." But this was not the case of a Bill being offered for the acceptance of the Irish minority; it was a Bill thrust upon them by a majority gained by refusing to let the constituencies know what the Bill was going to be. It was on that account that they said that the Government were acting in a tyrannical manner in regard to the Bill. The Government obtained a majority over the Opposition, the validity of which the Opposition disputed, because they said that the mind of the people of the United Kingdom had not been taken, and the question was not fairly before them. That being so, the Prime Minister brought in a Bill and said, "You must pass that." The Opposition put forward Amendments frankly, and said they objected to the Bill entirely ; but because they brought forward Amendments was it unreasonable that they should seek to amend it, so that if they were compelled to accept it it might be brought as near their views as possible ? Would the Prime Minister wish them to offer no opposition to the Bill at all in Committee ?

MR. LABOUCHERE : Yes.

MR. RENTOUL said that a large number of the Irish Unionist Members had intended to take up the line of saying that, because they objected to the Bill in toto, they would take no part in the discussion ; but, wiser counsels prevailing, that policy was not adopted. Their position had been stated on hundreds of platforms, and it was that unless the Army interfered they would not accept the Bill.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) asked whether the hon. Member was in Order in the observations he was making ?

*THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member was irregular, as he was not confining himself to the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. RENTOUL said, his point was that the Prime Minister had said that the Government had pulled aside the veil of the Opposition, but he (Mr. Rentoul) was showing that they had no veil to pull aside. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had remarked upon the unbusinesslike way in which the question was put in the Bill. He had used the illustration of a man coming to ask you for a sum of money, and your offering him your entire purse with the request that he should hand back what he did not want. It was a very common thing for a husband to settle something on his wife ; but it would be an extraordinary thing for a man making such a settlement to say, "Take all my property, but reserve a little for me." Yet something very like that was done in this Bill. All the powers of the Imperial Parliament were to be settled on the Irish Parliament, and then in the 3rd clause certain powers were reserved to the Imperial Parliament. As to giving a man your money on the understanding that he was to give you back what you did not want, he had known that course to be followed in the case of a certain Home Rule Member, and, in the end, not one penny was returned. That would be the experience of the Imperial Parliament if the Bill were accepted. Was it unreasonable that the Ulster Members should want to know exactly what powers were to be given to the Parliament that would be over them ? The Irish Parliament would consist of a majority of Home Rulers and a Loyalist minority. Therefore, was there anything unfair in the minority wishing to know the best and the worst at once ? If they did, they might perhaps be less reluctant to accept the Bill than they were. Many hon. Members had spoken on this question from every possible point of view. [Ministerial cheers.] Yes, from the point of view of the entire and absolute freedom of the Irish Parliament, and the point of view of the Irish Parliament having such-and-such powers. Looking at the absolute statement of the Home Secretary the other night as to the extent of the power of the Irish Parliament, was there anything unreasonable in asking the Government to accept the Amendment—in asking that they should give the information sought ? If that was given, then compel them, if necessary, to accept this Parliament. At any rate, let the Government tell them what the powers of this Parliament were to be in order that they might see how they stood. It was on that ground that he desired most earnestly that the Government should see their way to accept this arrangement, and see whether a policy of conciliation from any point of view would not have some effect. They might find the Ulster Members more approachable than they thought. They, at any rate, wished the Government to treat them as men who were willing to talk on this subject. [Ministerial cheers.] Exactly. When he said that he meant what he said. He had already said it was a question with the Ulster Members whether they should touch the Bill and debate it at all ; but now they had consented to debate it with the limited powers at their disposal. They treated the Government as fairly as they could. They told them what their objections were, and then voted against the Bill in the frankest manner.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, there was one speech he could not understand — namely, that of the hon. and learned Member for Haddington (Mr. Haldane). He said that the Canadian analogy was no analogy at all. That, he confessed, went a good deal further than the Prime Minister's speech. The Prime Minister had not denied the Canadian analogy. If the hon. and learned Member had been in his place, he (Mr. Russell) would have asked him what Sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act really meant if they did not constitute an analogy for the Irish case. Why, in Section 92 of the British North America Act the work of the Provincial Legislatures was set out and the subjects enumerated. Beyond those subjects they could not go; and if they went beyond them, the Supreme Court of Canada would declare the Acts to be un-Constitutional. So far as an analogy could be perfect, this analogy was perfect. It was impossible to say that delegation could not be carried out; for in Canada, ever since 1867, it had been the law, and no very great difficulties had arisen under it. There was one practical argument in favour of delegation and against reservation. Under Section 4 of the Bill the Irish Legislature was forbidden to endow religion; but the question might arise, what constituted the endowment of religion. It might be found, for example, that the endowment of religion was effected through education. But if the principle of delegation were adopted, it would be impossible for any such question to arise. The powers of the Legislature would be clearly set forth in the Bill itself, so that those who ran could read. Under the system of reservation all kinds of difficulties would arise which, under the principle of delegation, they would be free from. What was the real argument against this principle? One argument used by the Prime Minister seemed to preclude all debate on the matter. The right hon. Gentleman stated with the greatest clearness that the Irish Members would not go one inch of the way with the Government if they adopted the plan of delegation. That was the effective argument on the Ministerial side of the House.

An hon. MEMBER : Quite right, too.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL : "Quite right, too!"—that was a nice confession for a Liberal to make. He had always thought there was a British view of the question as well as an Irish one, and that Irishmen must not ask more than Great Britain would concede. But if the method proposed in the Bill were adopted, for the reason given by the Prime Minister that the Irish Members would not move one step of the way if delegation were attempted, then the Irish Members were the real Leaders of the Liberal Party, though they did not sit on the Treasury Bench. These were the men who dictated to the Government what they should vote for, and what they should not vote for. That was a fine position for the great Liberal Party—that they should be mere hewers of wood and drawers of waters for the Irish Nationalists! He was not very much concerned one way or another with regard to the Amendment, and he would tell the Committee why. He thought delegation the better plan of the two. He did not see, for instance, why the question of regulating the public-house system should not be delegated to a Body in Ireland. He did not see why the English people should decide how many public-houses there were to be in Ireland, and what hours they should remain open. This subject was pre-eminently a matter for the people of Ireland, and the people of Ireland alone; and, therefore, he was prepared at any time for a system of delegation of that kind. On the broad national question, he was against an Irish Parliament altogether, but thought that the principle of delegation was better than the principle of reservation, and on that ground he should vote for the Amendment.

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.) said that no one had attempted to answer the observation that the subjects to be delegated—if they were to be delegated—were not capable of being enumerated with any approach to accuracy. If they wished to give only a few subjects for the consideration of the Irish Parliament, it would be very easy indeed to do it—as was done in the Canadian Act for the Provincial Assemblies. But that was precisely what the Government and their supporters did not want to do. The object of the Amendment was to limit the Bill; his object was to prevent the Bill being limited. They had been asked by the late Home Secretary (Mr. H. Matthews) what sort of supremacy they wished to have over Ireland. So far as legal supremacy was concerned, there was only one they could have, and that was the same that they had over all Her Majesty's Dominions; but he meant, most emphatically, to do everything he could to make the supremacy of Parliament over the affairs that would be discussed in Ireland as small and simple as he could. If the Irish people demanded it, he should find it difficult to refuse that they should have the uncontrolled management of Irish affairs. That subject, however, was not appropriate for discussion now; but he could imagine nothing more disastrous than to create a Parliament in Ireland, and then have constant appeals from Ireland to the Imperial Parliament, encouraging the different Parties in Ireland to contradict or fight one another, with no sense of responsibility, because they would feel that their battles must be fought over again on the floor of that House at Westminster. He would readily vote for a limitation of the powers and opportunities the House of Commons would have of interfering with or regulating the decisions of the Irish Parliament, but he must decline to attempt to further restrict the powers of that Parliament. Treating the Amendment as a very neat method of raising the question whether this was to be a gas-and-water Bill merely or not, he should vote against the proposal.

MR. MACFARLANE (Argyll): I beg to move that the Question be now put.

THE CHAIRMAN: Commander Bethell.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) said, that on all previous occasions when the sovereign power had parted with some of its authority, it had delegated the authority so parted with, and limited it to the necessities of the case. The case of Canada had already been mentioned; but the very interesting case of Australian Federation—which, though it had not become law, had been defined very clearly—had not yet been alluded to. In the Regulations which had been passed by the Representatives of the Australian Colonies, it had been clearly laid down that those Colonies should only give up such powers as would be sufficient for the purpose of the common Government, and such powers were very clearly defined. He thought the hon. and learned Member for Haddington (Mr. Haldane) might have given lay Members of the House some further light on the interesting question of the Marriage Laws. He understood from the hon. and learned Member that by this proposal the Irish Parliament would have the power of divorce over people domiciled in Ireland, whilst the British laws would apply to people domiciled in other parts of the United Kingdom. He was anxious to know whether, in the event of the succession to property passing by death, the Imperial Parliament would tax the person who succeeded to Irish property and who would be illegitimate under the British law? The hon. and learned Member had said that, after all, this was the old question of supremacy. No doubt this was so. The Opposition desired to limit the powers to be given to the Irish Legislature. They were not satisfied that the supremacy which extended over the Colonies was sufficient for the purposes of Ireland. They, therefore, intended to do all they could to limit the powers to be given to the Irish Legislature and to destroy the proposal of the Government. The Prime Minister said the intention of the Government was to draw a distinct line between Imperial and local affairs. The intention of the Opposition was to do precisely the same thing, only the Opposition proposed to define the local matters with which the Irish Legislature was to deal, and the Government did not. The Opposition desired to define the local matters in such a way as would clip the wings of the Irish Legislature as much as possible.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, the question he asked himself in reference to the Amendment now before the Committee was, What was the House driving at? Supposing the House had agreed that some such thing as Home Rule was to be established in Ireland, what particular form of Home Rule was to be set up? Was it to be something corresponding to Colonial Independence, or was it to be that which had been described as Home Rule all round? The hon. and learned Member for Haddington said that Parliament had never intended to enumerate subjects to be delegated. The answer to that was that in all the cases referred to by the hon. and learned Member Parliament had been setting up Colonies practically independent of Great Britain, and over which we had a merely nominal supremacy—a supremacy which, legislatively, had never been exercised, and which in the way of veto had long since ceased to be exercised. If Parliament was going to give Ireland the degree of independence which the Colonies had, he admitted that the Government were quite right in not attempting to define by legislation the objects which the Irish Legislature was to be allowed to legislate upon. If, on the other hand, Parliament was going to set up some relation between Ireland and the Parliament of Westminster which might be followed hereafter by similar relations with Scotland, Wales, and England, the precedent that must be followed was the Canadian precedent. The speech of the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid) had rather surprised him, as he thought that the hon. and learned Member was an avowed disciple of the principle of “Home Rule all round,” and that under these circumstances he would have seized upon the opportunity of making a precedent which might be applicable afterwards to other parts of the United Kingdom. The hon. and learned Member for Dumfries used one argument, and one argument only—an argument which had been previously used by the Prime Minister—namely, that it was too difficult to enumerate the subjects with which the Irish Legislature might be entrusted. But had the hon. and learned Member looked at the Canadian precedent, or did he think that such a small, meagre, and impoverished delegation as was therein contained was not sufficient for the Irish Legislature?

MR. R. T. REID : May I interrupt my right hon. Friend to say that I have had some practical acquaintance with this subject of delegation. I assisted my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen in drafting a Home Rule Bill for Scotland. [Laughter.] It is in print. We tried to enumerate the subjects to be delegated to the Scotch Parliament, and found it perfectly impossible to do so.

MR. COURTNEY said, he had no doubt the hon. Members for Dumfries and Aberdeen found it difficult to put a limit to Scotch ambition. But he submitted they were not all Scotchmen ; and it was quite probable that if they tried they would be able to find a sufficient number of subjects to delegate to a Scotch Parliament, as he believed they would be able to enumerate a sufficient number of subjects to satisfy an Irish Parliament. In the Canadian precedent it would be found that in no less than 16 classes of subjects delegated, besides education, agriculture, and emigration were dealt with in separate clauses. Amongst the classes of subjects were municipal institutions, a subject which covered the whole code of laws, and the carrying out of which would give ample scope to the most ambitious Irish Legislature for many years. That was a precedent which ought to guide those who pursued the idea of a system with a Parliament at Westminster with four subordinate Parliaments, the Parliament at Westminster having general powers and the four subordinate Parliaments delegated powers. There was the subject of marriage, which, apparently, it was proposed to give power to the Irish Legislature to deal with. It was true that the Marriage Laws were now different in England, Scotland, and Ireland ; but the difference between the English and the Irish laws on the subject was formal rather than real. Nearly 30 years ago a Royal Commission had been instituted in order to discover, if possible, a means of bringing about uniformity in the laws of the two countries. That object had never been attained. It was an object that every subject of the United Kingdom should desire to attain, but the process adopted in the Bill would make it practically impossible to attain. If marriage were kept for the Parliament at Westminster, uniformity might by-and-bye be obtained ; but if it were given as a subject to be dealt with by a subordinate Legislature, he was afraid they might bid good-bye to uniformity in this matter. The Prime Minister seemed to think that the Irish people were distinguished by their views with respect to marriage and divorce, and that he was paying enormous respect to those views by the extraordinary line taken in the Bill. The Irish feeling, in the right hon. Gentleman's opinion, was so strong that persons who might obtain divorce in England could not obtain it in Ireland through the Divorce Court, but they could do so by the process of a Bill in Parliament ; so that the feeling which the Prime Minister said should be respected was over-ridden, not by providing a system of Divorce Courts, but by providing the costly machinery of a Bill in Parliament. In other words, Irish opinion might be flouted, but it must be flouted by means of a machinery which involved a considerable amount of cost. That was only an illustration of the difficulties that would result in the future if an Irish Parliament were to be set up with general powers instead of delegated powers. The precedent of the United States Government, which had been appealed to, ought to lead them to be very jealous in retaining general powers at Westminster and in abstaining from giving any large powers to the Parliament in Dublin. The weakness of the United States Constitution rested on the few subjects that were confined to the Legislative Congress and on the immense difficulty in increasing that number of subjects. He believed that in the United States the best class of citizens had long desired a uniform law of marriage, but the laws of the Constitution prevented them from obtaining their desire by reason of the machinery by which any Constitutional Amendment could be enforced being so cumbrous, unpractical, and difficult to work. They were about to take a step which would make the maintenance of a Common Law and the development of a Common Law in different parts of the Kingdom increasingly difficult. If it was desired to have a Legislature capable of legislating for all the people within the United Kingdom, the real precedent—which was the Canadian precedent—must be followed; but if, on the other hand, it was desired to pursue the ideal Colonial precedent with no supremacy and with the complete isolation and separation of Ireland, then the plan in the Bill was the one to stick to. But if this Parliament desired to maintain a real Legislative Authority at Westminster, he submitted that the plan to be adopted was that of the enumeration of the subjects to be delegated to the Irish Assembly.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland) said, he had intended to make some observations on this Amendment, but the right hon. Gentleman who had last spoken had so well expressed his views on the question that he would not trouble the Committee very long. He had thought over the question of Home Rule for many years, and when he stood before his constituents he made a distinct promise. He said to them—

“With regard to Home Rule, I think my fellow-townsmen are entitled to a frank expression of my views. (1). I am in favour of the Imperial Parliament delegating to a Statutory Irish Parliament the full control of Irish home affairs, the matters delegated being set out specifically in the Act, and all others being thereby reserved for the decision of the Mother Body.”

He did not pretend to have as good an opinion on the Home Rule Question as the 17 Members of the Cabinet; but, although he had not thought about it so much as they had when they sat together, he had thought about it probably for a longer time than most of them, and he had come to the conclusion that if they would enter on this policy of Home Rule—and he certainly was not one of those who began it—there was no tarrying until they came to a Federal system. Therefore, he set himself to this conclusion: that if he voted for Home Rule, he would vote for a Home Rule which would give effective power to Ireland in Ireland, while retaining the Imperial power finally to the Imperial Parliament. He was going to keep the promise he made to his constituency. [Liberal Unionist cheers.] That statement need not have been cheered. Hon. Members would believe him when he said that they had lost votes by their cheers. It was not satisfactory to him to be cheered when he told the House he was going to vote against his hon. Friends. Those who had cheered him did not cheer him for his merits, but because they thought he was going to do some mischief. He could assure hon. Members who cheered that he was not a whit better than the Radical Members were who had been accused again and again of having made promises to their constituents which they had broken. He should like to see these promises. He knew the Radical Members, and he was bound to say that amongst the whole 140 of them, there was not a single one of them that gave a promise to his constituents which he was not going to redeem. If there was anything which would prevent Radical Members from voting for some of the Amendments, it would be the utterances of his right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham. He was going to vote with his right hon. Friend on this Amendment. But his purpose in so voting was to press an effective Home Rule Bill for Ireland which should fit in with the Federal system, which, rightly or wrongly, he believed to be coming; while the purpose of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham was not to amend the Bill in that direction, but to destroy it. There were thousands of people in the country who saw with sore dismay the right hon. Gentleman taking that line. With regard to the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, he really believed there was a lurking honesty in him; and he would ask him whether, when he argued so powerfully that if they were going to have Home Rule they should have this plea of delegation, did he honestly desire to convey that if the Amendment were adopted it would conciliate Liberal Unionist opinion to the Bill? The right hon. Gentleman only laughed at him now. Well, he submitted that if that question were not answered, his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's position was perfectly right. His right hon. Friend said—"I propose a plan; it may not be as good as yours; but if you will not help in amending that plan, I will stick to it." If he had not made that promise to his constituents he would go into the Lobby with the Prime Minister, because the right hon. Gentleman, as a practical politician who wanted the Bill to be carried, was justified on having taken a line to stand by it, unless, by giving way on a point, he could conciliate Liberal Unionist opinion; and, if he could not do that, his wisest course was to be strong. Though he believed the right hon. Gentleman's plan was the best plan, he thought that the Prime Minister could have just as easily proceeded by way of delegation, and to define measures, instead of reserving measures; and, as he had given the promise to his constituents, he proposed to go into the Lobby for the Amendment.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 275 ; Noes 228.—(Division List, No. 83.)

*MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) moved, in Clause 2, line 14, to leave out "and subject to the restrictions." He said the Amendment on which the Committee had just voted aimed at changing the scope of the restrictions in the Bill by removing them from the negative side to the positive side, and by stating distinctly the subjects that were to be included within the powers of the Legislature about to be created in Ireland. The issue he wished to raise by his Amendment was quite different. No doubt it was absolutely necessary to limit the action of this proposed subordinate Legislature to certain subjects. It was clear that in some way or other it must be clearly and distinctly stated that such questions as the succession to the Crown, peace, and war did not appertain to the Legislature they were about to set up. On that they were all agreed. But the restrictions set forth in Clause 4 of the Bill were of a different category, and he wished to show that restrictions were illusory as safeguards to the minority, and derogatory even to the mongrel local Assembly they proposed to set up in Ireland. These restrictions, which he wished to remove from the Bill, might be divided into two classes. The first class related to religion, and the second concerned ordinary morality. A point which he wished the House to remember—and it was a point which they were apt to lose sight of—was that the Irish Legislature would, without doubt, be practically dominated and ruled by the priests. That was clear; and whether they liked it or disliked it, whether it was a bad thing or a good thing, they must recognise it, for recent events in Ireland had told them conclusively that Archbishop Walsh and his successors would pull the strings of the Legislature in Dublin. These restrictions that concerned religion were matters of very keen concern to the Irish people. It could not be supposed that a Legislative Assembly established in Ireland and very largely influenced by the priests would long support a number of restrictions which touched very deeply the religious sentiments and wishes of the Irish people; and he believed that when the Legislature was set up in Ireland attempts would be made to do away with them. But, even as they stood in the Bill, those restrictions could be circumvented and set at defiance; and was it reasonable, then, that they should be put in the Bill, especially as it was inconceivable that the Imperial Parliament would enforce these restrictions, if need be, by war? If 80 per cent. of the Irish Members were powerful enough to force this Home Rule Bill on the House of Commons, and as they thought—though erroneously—within measurable distance of passing it—it was absurd to suppose, if they got a Legislature in Dublin—in which they would be even more powerful—that they would allow these restrictions to remain. The other class of restrictions was of a still more remarkable character. These restrictions formed a sort of second table of the Decalogue, and it was certainly an extraordinary thing to find them put into an Act of Parliament. It was possible that the Prime Minister thought that the Decalogue had been somewhat forgotten in Ireland, and that he wished to set it up in the Home Rule Bill, for Clause 5 was, practically speaking, some of the Commandments in other words. It was absolutely forbidden under the clause to deprive any person of life, liberty, and property without due process of law. That simply meant that the Irish Legislature was told “Thou shalt not kill” and “Thou shalt not steal.” It was true that the words “without due process of law” were added; but had they come to this, that they needed to put into a Statute which set up a Legislature in Ireland a clause which enacted that these offences against the Decalogue should not be committed by that Legislature? He wondered that the whole Decalogue had not been inserted in the Bill. When he had proposed to introduce into Clause 1 the words “subordinate Parliament,” which everyone agreed this Legislature would be, the Prime Minister charged him with wishing to degrade the Irish Assembly, and said the proposed words, if accepted, would be a bar sinister against that Assembly. But now they proposed to enact, for all posterity to see, that when they thought the time had come to set up a Legislature in Ireland, they thought it necessary to state distinctly in their Bill that they were afraid the Legislature would commit these crimes against the Decalogue, and that for that reason they inserted in the Bill in so many words the Commandments “Thou shalt not kill” and “Thou shalt not steal.” Surely that was a bar sinister, darker and more shameful than the words “subordinate Parliament,” which the Prime Minister himself declared would be the position of the Irish Legislature if the Bill became law? The Irish Members must have come down very considerably if they were going to allow those objectionable restrictions to remain in the Bill. But he objected to these restrictions from the United Kingdom standpoint as well as from the Irish standpoint. If the Irish Representatives were retained in their full strength in the Imperial Parliament, the restrictions, if allowed to stand, would be a source of continual agitation in the House, for they would be denounced as an insult to the Irish nation, and the Prime Minister would in a few years have as hard words used against him by Irish Members as the right hon. Gentleman himself had used towards those who carried the Union. Suppose an agitation were got up in the Imperial Parliament to remove these restrictions, how could Parliament possibly refuse to do away with them? From the Imperial standpoint it would be, therefore, much better to remove the restrictions now than to allow them to remain to be the cause of friction in future years. There was a great deal of talk on the Ministerial side of the House about trusting the Irish people; but instead of trusting them they were about to declare that so little did they believe in the Irish people that it was necessary to put restrictions in the Bill to prevent their Legislature from killing and stealing. He thought that on those grounds the clause setting up the restrictions was the most remarkable in the Bill. Personally, he was not anxious that the Bill should become law, and he did not wish to promote its passing. But if they were going to set up in Ireland a Legislative Assembly, and if they were going to put restrictions in the Bill indicating that they did not trust the Irish people, and gave them the Legislature under compulsion, then the Irish people would not have the Legislature long before they would knock out these restrictions; and as he, therefore, thought they ought to be knocked out now, he begged to move his Amendment.

Mr. Bartley

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 14, to leave out “and subject to the restrictions.”—(Mr. Bartley.)

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I will not endeavour now to deal with each particular safeguard that is contained in the Bill. By doing so I do not think the Committee would escape from having to consider in detail the clause as a whole when the Question is put from the Chair that the clause do stand part of the Bill. Hon. Members must feel that it would be a very strong measure, at the present stage of the clause, to decide that the whole of the restrictions upon the power of the Irish Legislature should be cut away. Undoubtedly the effect of the proposed Amendment would be to enlarge the scope of the Home Rule Bill. It is the first proposal of the kind that has come from the Opposition. I will only make this remark—that the restrictions which the Amendment proposes to sweep away constitute a bonâ fide attempt to narrow the power of the new Irish Legislature; and I must say that the way in which the Nationalist Members have acquiesced in this limitation of the power of that Legislature is most creditable to them, and affords a singular example of the moderation with which they have conducted themselves in this House in connection with the details of this Bill. I may be told that these restrictions are not of much value; but I think it will be admitted that there is not the smallest doubt that if they were swept away it would be regarded as very much enhancing the demerits of the measure. The hon. Member who moved the Amendment said it was not consistent with the respect due to the Irish Legislature to impose any restrictions of this kind. Well, take the very first of them, which prohibits the new Irish Legislature from setting up an Established Church. That, according to the hon. Member, is an improper restriction upon its legislative powers; but that is exactly the restriction that is imposed upon the Federal Legislatures of the United States. In my opinion, it is most improbable that any Irish Members would be in favour of establishing a Church of any denomination, whether these restrictions existed or not. The restrictions have been inserted with the goodwill and entire approval of the Irish Members, in order, if possible, to allay those jealousies which, however unhappy and unreasonable they may be, they find entertained and even enforced in this House. This Irish Legislature has been called, not inaptly, a “subordinate Legislature,” and there is nothing at all improper in this policy of imposing restrictions. When we come to the clause, each restriction will be decided on its own merits; but, in my opinion, it is most unreasonable to cut out the whole mass of the restrictions that are contained in the clause at this stage, and therefore I must offer the strongest opposition to the Amendment.

MR. ROSS (Londonderry) said, that up to the present he had taken no part in the proceedings of the Committee. His constituents had very grave doubts as to whether he should in any way take part in the proceedings at all. He did not disguise that the position they took up with regard to the Bill and to every one of its clauses was a position of uncompromising hostility. But, although he entertained these sentiments towards the Bill, he thought it was his duty to endeavour to draw from the responsible Members of the Government explanations as to what the clauses really meant. He knew that these restrictions were put forward in the guise of being safeguards; but, as safeguards, they were absolute shams. There was not one of them that was not capable of being got round. Even the one mentioned by the Prime Minister had been demonstrated to be absolutely ineffective. Therefore, his constituents would much rather have no restrictions at all. He spoke with a full sense of his responsibility; he knew what the people who elected him wished; and he told the Government not to hurt the feelings of the Irish Members at all—not to strain the allegiance of some of their own supporters—by introducing these safeguards. He hoped he would hear no more of what the Prime Minister had said about the acceptance of these restrictions by the Irish Members showing their moderation and the spirit of compromise which animated them, for, with great respect to the Irish Members—for he did not wish to say anything insulting to them—he did not believe that that attitude could be maintained. The great point of the Irish Members was to get the Bill through by hook or by crook, and when they had the house over their heads in Dublin they could then get anything else they wished for. He did not believe these safeguards were intended for the Loyalists in Ireland at all. They were intended for the protection of the Government when the Government were brought face to face before the country. That might be put off for a long time; but he sincerely believed that the time would come when the Government would have to answer to the country for the wrongs and oppression that would be wrought by this Bill, and then the safeguards would be useful to them—then they would say—"Look at all these clauses we put in for the protection of the loyal minority." But he did not think the country would be satisfied with that answer. The Representatives of the people of Ulster told the Government that they did not want these safeguards and restrictions; and he would, therefore, support the Amendment.

SIR HENRY JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I hope the hon. Gentleman will not proceed to a Division on his Amendment, for if he does some of those who oppose this Bill will not be able to vote for it. The position some of us take up with regard to this Bill is that we oppose the Bill, and desire to see it defeated; but it may pass, and we desire to make it as good a Bill as safeguards can make it. There are illusory safeguards in the Bill, and we desire to remove these illusory safeguards. But this Amendment proposes to strike out some of the safeguards we desire to see in the Bill; and if carried it would really give to this proposed Irish Legislature greater powers than those proposed to be conferred by the Bill as it stands. Therefore, I trust the hon. Member will not go to a Division on his Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I quite agree that this Bill is full of illusory safeguards; but the Amendment really goes much further than illusory safeguards. It touches every one of the restrictions contained in Clause 4. My desire is, when we get to Clause 4, not to diminish its restricting power, but to increase it. As far as it goes, I think it is an improvement in the Bill, but it does not go far enough. When we get to it I shall try to make it go further; but, in the meanwhile, I think it would be inadvisable for my hon. Friend to persist in his Amendment; the proper course for him to adopt would be, when he sees how Clause 4 is modified—if it should be modified—to move to omit that clause. As the Prime Minister has said, it would be rather a strong order, on the 2nd clause of the Bill, to take the course proposed; and, under the circumstances, I am inclined to advise my hon. Friend not to press this particular Amendment.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said that, while sympathising with his hon. Friend opposite, he was in a difficulty. He had no great belief in the restrictions proposed by Clause 4, and less belief in that particular one which had been singled out by the Prime Minister with regard to religion. The Prime Minister was, in his view, entirely inconsistent in singling that out. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to the restrictions that prevented the Irish Parliament from establishing or endowing religion. He himself had put a Notice on the Paper to omit that special subsection, and for this reason—the Church question was reserved for the opinion of Scotland, Wales, and England; and he did not see how they were logically going to make an exception in the case of Ireland. Moreover, if they made it, it would not be observed. He thought, upon the whole, inasmuch as they would have an opportunity of dealing with each of these restrictions separately when they came to them, it would be better that the present Amendment should not be pressed.

MR. BARTLEY said, he did not desire to put the House to the trouble of a Division; and he would, therefore, withdraw the Amendment and bring it forward later. ["No, no!"]

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. BOUSFIELD moved, in Clause 2, page 1, line 15, after "mentioned," insert "and subject to the assent of Parliament as hereinafter provided." This Amendment, he said, was the first of a series which were designed to provide practical machinery by which the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament might be maintained. They had had a number of discussions on this question of supremacy; and the answer of the Government had been that the proposals which had been made would not put the supremacy in a better position, but would put it in a worse, and that their proposals were impracticable and out of place. The object of his Amendment was to make a practical proposal with regard to the maintenance of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament — a subject on which they had been told that both sides of the House were equally exercised, and equally desirous that a practical and effective supremacy should be maintained. He submitted there could be no such practical supremacy unless there was a possibility of that House intervening on any particular measure and saying what it had to say on such a measure before it was passed into law. Clause 5 provided the whole of the machinery in the Bill with regard to giving the assent of Her Majesty to anything the Irish Legislature might do ; and under that clause far wider powers were given to the Legislature which it was proposed to constitute in Ireland than were in most cases given to our self-governing Colonies, in regard to which the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament was almost null, or the weapon was such a rusty one that it was practically never used. With regard to our Colonial Legislatures, there was a bar put on which might be effectively used and exercised with regard to giving the Royal Assent to any Bills which might be brought into a Colonial Legislature. The Governor of a Colony was not merely the mouthpiece, as it were, of the Legislature for the purpose of giving assent to a Bill ; but he had, in fact, a real discretion, and could exercise that discretion, in order to give or withhold assent to a Bill. According to the Bill now before the House, it was proposed that the Lord Lieutenant in Ireland, who held a position corresponding to that of a Governor in the Colonies, should have no discretionary power of that kind, therefore this was a weaker Bill, and gave more power of freedom to the proposed Legislature in Ireland than had hitherto been given in the case of many of our Colonial Legislatures. This Bill provided that the Lord Lieutenant should, on the advice of the Executive Committee, give or withhold the assent of Her Majesty to Bills passed by the two Houses of Parliament ; so that, practically, for the purpose of giving or withholding that assent, the Lord Lieutenant had to act on the advice of the Executive Committee, and had no independent power to give or withhold assent.

MR. J. MORLEY said, that surely the hon. Member was now debating Clause 5.

THE CHAIRMAN : I understood he only wanted to refer to it for the purpose of illustrating his argument ; but he is going beyond that.

MR. BOUSFIELD said, his desire was simply to make a statement as to Clause 5, and not in any way to debate it. He simply intended to point out that the Lord Lieutenant had no voice in the matter, and that the only possible place where the exercise of any supremacy could come in was in the last lines of Clause 5—

“Subject, nevertheless, to any instructions given by Her Majesty in respect of any such Bill.”

THE CHAIRMAN (interposing) said, it was extremely important that in the discussions on this Bill no subsequent Amendment should be anticipated. Such a course was out of Order.

MR. BOUSFIELD was afraid he had not made his meaning clear. He intended simply to state what the possibilities were of intervention under this Bill, and to point out that his Amendment proposed to supplement that possibility of intervention by providing that no Bill should pass without the assent of Parliament. He wanted to show that these lines did not include any supremacy of Parliament, and that the line with reference to instructions given by Her Majesty was the only possible line in the whole of the Bill where any practical attempt was made to maintain the supremacy ; and what he proposed to do was to supplement that by inserting an express provision that a Bill which had passed the two Houses of the Irish Legislature should not pass into law without the assent of the Imperial Parliament. That must be followed up by another clause, and it would be convenient he should state to the Committee what the clause was.

MR. J. MORLEY : No, no !

MR. BOUSFIELD : He saw a disposition to prevent him stating his case.

THE CHAIRMAN : There is no disposition to prevent the hon. and learned Gentleman stating his case ; but if he goes beyond the ruling it is my duty to call him to Order.

MR. BOUSFIELD had not the slightest intention of going beyond the ruling of the Chair, and his remark was made in reply to an observation of dissent from the Chief Secretary.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: On a point of Order, may I point out that the Amendment states, "subject to the assent of Parliament as hereinafter provided"? Is it not competent for the hon. and learned Gentleman to show under that what he provides hereinafter?

THE CHAIRMAN: It is competent for the hon. and learned Gentleman to point out what it is he intends to provide, but not to discuss it, and so anticipate other Amendments.

MR. BOUSFIELD observed, that he proposed to refer to the clause, "hereinafter provided" to show how it fitted in with that he had moved. And he would simply read the sub-section which he intended to move to add at the end of Clause 5. It was this—

"Every Bill which has passed both Houses of the Irish Legislature shall be laid before each House of Parliament, and shall not, except in case of urgency, be presented to the Lord Lieutenant for Her Majesty's assent until 40 days after it has been laid before both Houses of Parliament. If within such 40 days an Address be moved in both Houses of Parliament praying that Her Majesty's assent be not given to such Bill, and if both Houses of Parliament present such Address to Her Majesty, such Bill shall be null. Provided, nevertheless, that if the Lord Lieutenant is advised by the Executive Committee of the Privy Council of Ireland that the immediate enactment of any Bill is a matter of urgency, such Bill may be immediately presented to the Lord Lieutenant for Her Majesty's assent."

There were other proposals by which, in one form or another, the assent of Parliament was intended to be provided. He did not, therefore, wish in any way to tie himself or the Committee to any particular form of assent which the Committee hereafter might think it right should be inserted in the Bill. What he did desire to do was to lay before the House this proposition—that in the majority of cases at all events, except in cases of urgency, when an immediate enactment might be a matter of necessity, they ought to reserve the right of Parliament to intervene before assent was given to Irish measures. That right of intervention would, he thought, be best preserved by providing that a delay should take place after a Bill had passed both Houses in Ireland, and that during that delay the Imperial Parliament should have an opportunity of considering the proposal.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I ought to point out to the hon. and learned Gentleman that if he moves his Amendment now and it is negatived he will not be able to move his Amendment to Clause 5. I would, therefore, suggest he should withdraw his Amendment now, and raise the question on Clause 5.

MR. BOUSFIELD said, he was explaining that he did not in any way desire to tie himself or the Committee to any particular form to which assent should be given; but he was simply illustrating what he meant by the assent of Parliament by referring to the particular Amendment he had put down, and the rejection or insertion of these words would not in any way tie the hands of the House with regard to any specific proposition. He desired to submit that if any Amendment was to be moved at any subsequent stage of the Bill by which the assent of Parliament should be reserved in any particular case, here was the proper place where a Saving Clause should be put in. The present Amendment corresponded with the words preceding it—"With the exceptions and subject to the restrictions in this Act mentioned"—words which pointed, as his Amendment did, to provisions that were to follow. He had stated at the outset, and he repeated, that some assent of this kind was necessary if they were to preserve in a practical form the supremacy of that House. The supremacy of Parliament did not mean merely that they should have the power to repeal any measure which was passed by the Irish Parliament; but it meant, if supremacy was to be an effective power, that, before the act was done to which they objected, they should have an opportunity of discussing it in that House, and of there determining before assent was given whether or not it was a measure in which the Imperial Parliament should interfere. He apprehended that such a power would be rarely used. The very existence of the power of discussing in that House whether or not assent ought to be given to a measure would probably prevent the necessity in almost every case of resorting to the exercise of that power. But in the case of new legislation that power might be required. Take, for instance, the case of legislation with regard to land. If Irish Members were true to their pledges on the Land Question, any Land Act which the Irish Legislature passed must be one to which the great majority of hon. Members of the House must necessarily offer uncompromising opposition. If the Lord Lieutenant gave the Royal Assent on the advice of the Executive, and if this Parliament had no power to intervene, where would the supremacy of Parliament be? If power were reserved to Her Majesty to refuse assent, that would not be the supremacy of Parliament; it would be the supremacy of Cabinet Ministers, and there would be no possibility of testing in that House whether such assent ought to be given. If in regard to legislation of this kind Parliament was to be supreme, it must have power to consider proposed legislation before there was any possibility of the assent being given. He had been considering this question as affecting new legislation, and he would now take the case of old legislation. Part of the supremacy of Parliament consisted in maintaining the laws as they stood on the Statute Book; and, except on certain subjects, it would be in the power of the Irish Legislature to repeal clauses as they stood at present on the Statute Book. Take the law relating to bills of exchange. Under this Bill the Irish Parliament would have perfect power to repeal or modify the law as to bills of exchange, or any other part of the Mercantile Law. In order to maintain that uniformity in their Mercantile Law which they believed to be essential to the prosperity of the United Kingdom as a whole, they would then have to exercise the Royal Prerogative upon the advice of Ministers. It was not right that the Royal Prerogative should have to be called up in a matter of that sort, as it assuredly would have to be under that Bill in order to obtain uniformity of commercial laws. Of course, one hardly expected that the Government would assent to an Amendment of this sort, because hon. Members on his side of the House knew perfectly well they would be told this was not the right place to move it, or that a mere paper declaration of supremacy was no declaration of supremacy at all. But he contended he was now proposing practical machinery for the assertion of that supremacy; and surely there were some hon. Gentlemen opposite who had pledged themselves over and over again to an effective and practical supremacy available in case of necessity, who would admit that the time had come when they ought to give effect to their declarations? This was the proper place to indicate that in some form or another it was intended to make the supremacy effective. Speaking from a Conservative point of view, he said that in making a great change, such as that proposed by the Bill, they ought to work cautiously, and, as far as possible, see that evolution and development might have time to act in a matter of this sort. They had done so in the Colonies, where they had preserved far greater powers for intervention than in this Bill. Had they more reason to trust Irishmen than they had to trust the Colonists? Why should they give more freedom to Ireland and retain less power of intervention than they did in the case of the Colonies? He held that the Imperial Parliament ought to keep the reins in its hands, and that as time went on and things worked well it could give more rein and greater freedom to the Irish Legislature.

The Amendment referred to was as follows: Page 1, line 15, after "mentioned," to insert "and subject to the assent of Parliament as hereinafter provided."

MR. E. STANHOPE (interposing) desired to ask what would be the effect of moving this Amendment. Would it have the effect of shutting out the Amendments to be moved by the hon. and learned Member himself and other hon. Members to Clause 5. If it had that effect, he would suggest to his hon. Friend that he should not move it now.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have no doubt that if these words are moved now and negatived they would shut out the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member to Clause 5, and all Amendments of this kind. I pointed that out to the hon. Member while he was speaking, but I could not say his Amendment was out of Order.

MR. BOUSFIELD : I hope, on the point of Order, you will consider what I submitted to you.

THE CHAIRMAN : I distinctly considered what the hon. and learned Gentleman said. I am distinctly of opinion that if these words are negatived they will shut out the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member to Clause 5, and all other Amendments of the same character.

MR. BOUSFIELD : If that is so I shall not move it.

MR. J. MORLEY : I submit that the hon. Member has moved his Amendment.

MR. BOUSFIELD : May I say that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stanhope) interrupted me as I was in the act of moving ?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL : I would suggest to my hon. Friend that, seeing he cannot withdraw his Amendment, he had better go on with it.

THE CHAIRMAN : My own impression was that the right hon. Gentleman was in time to stop the hon. Member from moving it ; but he was very near it.

MR. J. MORLEY : My impression was that the hon. Member had moved it.

MR. SHEEHY : I was opposite the hon. and learned Member, and I distinctly heard him move the Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN : I must point out to the right hon. Gentleman that that was my impression. The question has to be decided by me.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL : Is it your ruling that, the Question not having been put, the Amendment can be withdrawn ?

[Hon. MEMBERS : It was put.]

MR. J. MORLEY : On a point of Order, may I ask has the Question been put ?

THE CHAIRMAN : The Question has not been put. I call on Commander Bethell.

MR. MACFARLANE : I wish to ask you, Sir, whether an hon. Member, having spoken to an Amendment, is then entitled to withdraw it without the leave of the Committee ?

THE CHAIRMAN : It was perfectly plain that if the hon. and learned Member had moved the Amendment he could not then have withdrawn it without the leave of the Committee. My impression, under which I have acted, is that he did not move it, and that is the reason I did not put it to the Committee.

MR. J. MORLEY : On a point of Order, may I ask upon what question the hon. and learned Gentleman was speaking ? What was his position during his long speech if no question was to be put at the end of that speech ?

MR. PLUNKET : I submit to you, Mr. Mellor, that the point raised by the Chief Secretary does not apply. Till a Motion is actually made the hon. Member is entitled to speak unless he is interrupted by you. The fact of his having made his speech does not, in the least degree, affect the question.

MR. J. MORLEY : May I ask, then, whether it is competent to any or every hon. Member of the Committee to get up and make a speech, and then to sit down without making any Motion ?

MR. E. STANHOPE : I wish to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that the point of Order has been decided, and that, therefore, this discussion is irregular.

THE CHAIRMAN called upon Commander Bethell, and Mr. Harrington also rose.

MR. HARRINGTON : I want to move a previous Amendment to that of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. I beg to move the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member who last addressed the House (Mr. Bousfield).

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL : I rise to a point of Order. I wish to ask you, Mr. Mellor, whether, having given your decision upon the question arising out of the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Hackney, and having called upon another hon. Member to move his Amendment, it is competent for the hon. Member for the Harbour Division to go back and move the hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment ?

THE CHAIRMAN : No ; it is not.

MR. HARRINGTON : On a point of Order, Mr. Mellor, I wish to point out to you——

THE CHAIRMAN : Commander Bethell is addressing the Committee.

MR. HARRINGTON : May I ask am I not entitled to move a previous Amendment, Sir ?

*THE CHAIRMAN : The hon. and learned Gentleman is out of Order, for this reason : that that part of the clause has been passed, and I have called upon Commander Bethell, who is in possession of the Committee.

COMMANDER BETHELL moved, in page 1, line 15, to leave out the word "granted," and insert "delegated." The hon. and gallant Gentleman said the Amendment was of the same character as some of the Amendments which had already been moved. This question of supremacy must crop up here as it had cropped up on other Amendments. The Amendments had endeavoured definitely to declare the supremacy of Parliament in so many words. The Government had practically pledged themselves to accept in some form or another an Amendment or clause which would have the effect of declaring in so many words the supremacy of Parliament, and he suggested that the acceptance of his Amendment would meet the wish of the Government. So far as he knew, the word "granted" had never been used in any other delegated powers they had given to any other Body. In the Act relating to Canada the powers were "vested in and exercisable by." He contended that these words were much more on all-fours with the words he proposed than with the word in the Bill. From the sentence in the Act under which these powers were conferred on the Colonial Parliament, it was quite obvious much more restricted powers were intended to be given to the Irish than were accorded to the Colonial Parliament, and for this reason : The Acts relating to the Colonial Parliaments stated that they should have power to make laws of every description, which was a much wider proposal than anybody ever dreamed of giving to the Irish Parliament. He hoped the Chief Secretary would not take up an attitude of hostility to this Amendment. Surely it would be wise and politic on the part of the right hon. Gentleman to soothe the susceptibilities of Members of the Opposition, and go a little way to meet their reasonable and legitimate views. He would remind the Committee that the late Government made reasonable concessions to the Liberal Party when they were in opposition. He agreed that the substance of the question raised by the Amendment was the same that had been discussed all last week and all that day. That question was the question of supremacy, which they should continue to discuss until some concession was made to them. They should insist on having defined in clear and unmistakable terms the supremacy which they desired to see exercised over the Irish Parliament. He would, therefore, express the hope that the Chief Secretary would accept the Amendment which he begged to move.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 15, to leave out the word "granted," and insert the word "delegated."—(Commander Bethell.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'granted' stand part of the Clause."

MR. J. MORLEY : The hon. and gallant Gentleman has taxed me with showing hostility towards Amendments. I do not regard him as very serious in moving the proposition he has done, and I cannot suppose he regards his own Amendment as a serious one. The hon. and gallant Gentleman falls back, as everybody does, or has done, and he moves an Amendment to the Bill upon the necessity of declaring unmistakably and formally and positively the doctrine of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. I do not complain of that ; I only wonder that anyone should suppose that that doctrine was in any way whatever furthered or asserted or made more emphatic by substituting the word "delegated" for the word "granted." The hon. and gallant Gentleman in his speech showed that he is not more particularly than the rest of us a master of the niceties or distinction in phrase. Here is an Amendment turning entirely upon the distinction between "granted" and "delegated," and I submit that the hon. and gallant Gentleman did not adduce one single consideration—or, indeed, did not show the slightest necessity for adducing considerations—to induce the Committee to believe that the word "delegated" more clearly and emphatically asserts and preserves the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament than the word "granted." I can tell the hon. and gallant Gentleman that there are lawyers and sea lawyers. There are lawyers who say that "granted" is a word which more clearly asserts the Parliamentary supremacy, or as clearly, as the word "delegated." There is not a shadow of foundation for the contention on which the hon. and gallant Gentleman rests his Amendment. To declare that supremacy will be better preserved by substituting "delegated" for "granted" is to show a complete want of appreciation of the distinction between the two words. In 1886 the words we used were—"it shall be lawful for the Irish Legislature." In order to meet the views and wishes of the Party of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, we have now substituted the words "there shall be granted." The use of those words indicates that there is a granting power and a granting Authority, and what can that Authority be but the Imperial Parliament which passed the Bill? The Amendment is an entirely futile one, and the Government will certainly not assent to it.

*MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): The right hon. Gentleman is certainly what he said my hon. and gallant Friend was not, a master of the English language, and that he should fail to see the difference between "granted" and "delegated," strikes me as somewhat extraordinary. The right hon. Gentleman says that the Government substituted the word "granted" for the words "it shall be lawful," not, it will be observed, because they were themselves convinced of the necessity of emphasising the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, not to please any of the hon. Members behind them, who are watching the attitude of the Government with regard to the question of supremacy, with,

Mr. J. Morley

I think, an increasing interest, but to satisfy hon. Members on this side of the House. The right hon. Gentleman says the use of the word "granted" shows that there must be supremacy, because if anything is granted there must be authority to grant. But I have never heard that when you have granted a thing, you have power to take it back again. "Granted" means conveyed in a much more permanent way than "delegated." If you delegate a thing, you simply confide it temporarily, and have the power of resumption. That is the distinction which would strike the general reader, if it would not strike the legal mind. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman has consulted the Solicitor General on the point. The right hon. Gentleman says we are arguing this question with undue iteration. Yes, but I think we are educating the public by iteration as to the attitude of the Government upon this matter. We remember that they will not have the word "subordinate," and that they will not have any specification or delegation of powers; and that when they have a difficulty on a question of definition, they would rather give the benefit of the doubt to the Irish Parliament than to the Imperial Parliament. They say it is difficult to give a definition of Imperial and local concerns; and when they regard the difficulties as equal, they give the benefit of the doubt to the Irish Legislature. This spirit runs through the discussion of every Amendment. The Government resist the assertion of anything like supremacy, relying on the exposition of the doctrine of supremacy by the Solicitor General (Sir J. Rigby)—an exposition which conclusively proved that it was not an inalienable supremacy at all. [Cries of "Oh!"] The Solicitor General does not deny it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar): The right hon. Gentleman is putting an improper interpretation upon my argument.

MR. GOSCHEN: That is a careful denial on the part of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: I did not say that there was any doubt at all about the supremacy. I have never stated anything that would lead to that conclusion, and I wish again to say that I consider it so firmly established that this Act cannot in any way invalidate it.

*MR. GOSCHEN : I observe that the Solicitor General has not denied that part of my argument which says that he rested on statute and not upon inalienable supremacy. This is too important a matter to be allowed to remain unexplained. I do not wish to press the Solicitor General at all unduly; but I would ask him whether I understand him to state that the Imperial supremacy rests in the main upon the Act of Union, and not upon inalienable right? This I understand to be the case, and the consequence is, that we must look more carefully at every question in which the supremacy is involved than was necessary before that was established. In the refusal of the Government to use the word "delegated" we have one more proof of the extreme reluctance they have to specify or emphasise by any single word in the Bill the fact that what Parliament gives Parliament might again take away. If the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. J. Morley) considers that the words "delegated" and "granted" are not so dissimilar that one might not be used for the other why will he not, at all events on this point, meet us? The right hon. Gentleman says it is a small and futile matter.

MR. J. MORLEY : I did not say it was a small and futile matter, but that it was a small and futile Amendment.

MR. GOSCHEN : Well, then, if it is a small and futile Amendment why not accept it? The right hon. Gentleman thinks it can do no possible harm, and I should like to see the Government on one occasion admit a word which more clearly indicates that what Parliament gives Parliament may take back.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland) said, he had already given a vote in favour of delegation, and he thought the matter had been settled. He now found they were quarrelling not about the thing itself, but about the form of words to be used. The right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had contended that the use of "granted" implied the giving of that which could not be taken back again. But was not a Charter "granted"? A Charter was granted to the East India Company, but that Charter was afterwards withdrawn. Imagine the right hon. Gentleman coming down to the House and arguing—although he could not have done so at that time, because he was then a Liberal—that the Charter ought to be withdrawn because it had been "granted" and that it might have been withdrawn if it had been "delegated." The Committee had said it would not adopt the principle of delegation, and he accepted that decision, although he was sure that on a future occasion the principle would have to be adopted if a Home Rule Bill was to be carried through Parliament. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that they were simply discussing a trifling and futile Amendment; and if hon. Members opposite wanted any support on the Ministerial side of the House, and any support in the country on questions of principle they would, in his opinion, exercise a wise discretion in dropping discussions about words and debating only really important matters.

*SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, he desired to correct a misapprehension into which the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) seemed to have fallen in regard to the East India Company. The hon. Gentleman seemed to think that that Company's Charter, having been granted by the Crown, was arbitrarily taken away. On the contrary; the Charter had been granted, revoked, re-granted, and re-granted again at various intervals, in every case for a term of years, before the end came. No one had greater respect than he had for the authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. J. Morley) upon a question of language; but he would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that the word "granted" was a great deal stronger than the word "delegated." "Granted," of course, implied a granting power, but the grantor parted with his power in making the grant, and could not recover it. Delegation was a far weaker operation, and meant a deputing of a power which could be revoked, and which in ordinary circumstances would be revoked. It had something of a temporary signification. Of course, nobody contemplated revoking without very good cause the power proposed to be given to the Irish Legislature, but the right to revoke ought to be retained. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had misunderstood the Amendment in a manner which was certainly not worthy of his great literary authority, and he hoped the proposal would be pressed to a Division.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) desired to ask the Government why they had departed from the form of words in which legislative powers were conferred upon the Legislatures of New South Wales and Victoria? Was it intentional or unintentional that that form of words, which was repeatedly used in Acts dealing with the Colonies, had not been employed in the present case? If they were not used, and the Government had determined to abandon the form of words almost consecrated in the Forms of the Colonial Legislatures, was it because the expression used in the clause was either greater or less in authority than the expression used in establishing legislative authority in Victoria and in New South Wales? There was a very material difference, as hon. Members would see by referring to the Act of 1854 or 1855. The Solicitor General would no doubt be able to say why the Government had abstained from adopting the words used in the other cases.

Mr. Channing rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 218; Noes 146.—(Division List, No. 84.)

Question put accordingly, "That the word 'granted' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 251; Noes 186.—(Division List, No. 85.)

MR. A. CROSS (Glasgow, Camlachie) said, he wished to move an Amendment giving the Irish Legislature power to make laws for

"the making, maintaining, and improving of railways, tramways, canals, waterworks, reservoirs, gas and lighting works, fisheries, and all other things which are the subject-matter of Bills known in either Houses of Parliament as local Bills, and also for the confirmation of Provisional Orders."

This was an honest Amendment.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I would ask whether this Amendment is in Order? Having passed the 1st clause of the Bill, is not this Amendment really trifling with the Committee?

THE CHAIRMAN: This Amendment is in Order.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Is the hon. Member entitled to describe his Amendment as an honest one, thereby implying that the other Amendments are dishonest?

THE CHAIRMAN did not reply.

MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow) asked whether the hon. Member, by moving this Amendment, would shut out one in his (Mr. Ambrose's) name?

THE CHAIRMAN: I must put the Question in one particular form—namely, that the words "peace, order, and good government of Ireland" stand part of the clause; and if the Committee adhere to those words, no doubt the hon. Member's Amendment will be shut out. If, on the other hand, they are rejected, the hon. Member can move his Amendment.

MR. CROSS said, he was not sorry that he had elicited from supporters of the Government a hostile expression as to his Amendment, because it would bring into clear significance the fact that their view was wholly and totally opposed to the view he had ventured to express in his Amendment, and which he held was the opinion with which a great many Members went to the poll at the General Election. He had been about to go further, and say that he hoped the House would see that his Amendment was in the way of concession, and he thought an important concession, to the views of those who believed in the doctrine which they called Home Rule. He admitted in his Amendment that Ireland had a serious grievance—that in the matter of Local Government Bills she was at a great disadvantage. He conceived that the House had not proved itself able to deal efficiently with these matters, and he proposed, therefore, to concede to the new Irish Government the powers which the Imperial Parliament had not been able to exercise satisfactorily. But if he went so far with those hon. Gentlemen who believed in the doctrines of Home Rule he did not do so because of the reasons which actuated the supporters of the Government. Those reasons were matters of ancient history. They believed that Ireland had grievances 100 years ago, and that that country ought to be erected into an independent nation. He moved his Amendment for different reasons. He ventured to think that Parliament could not deal efficiently with local Bills, and his experience in the House, though brief, had confirmed him in that view. Piles of measures were introduced and placed on the Table of the House, and they were very little noticed, though in the localities where those measures were required they were regarded in a very different light. According to the arrangements under which the House carried on its business, this condition of affairs could not well be otherwise. He might be told that these Bills were dealt with after 12 o'clock at night. That was true; but he ventured to say that nothing in that House impressed the imagination of a new Member more than what took place after 12 o'clock at night. A long list of Bills was read, and some were passed, the House not understanding their contents. Not only was their contents unknown, but the House was comparatively indifferent to what the Bills were. Those were the conditions under which local Bills were dealt with; and when such a conditions of things prevailed, he thought it was not too strong a phrase to say that the whole thing was a farce. It might be urged that the local Bills of that House were properly considered in the Committees. He did not wish to disparage the work performed by Committees of that House. He recognised the weight of their labours, and he wished to relieve them of those labours because they were over-worked. There was a Debate the other day on the question of limiting the hours of miners, and he understood the proposal met with the assent of a majority of the House. [Cries of "Question!"] If the proposal had been to restrict the hours of legislators to eight hours it would probably have been——

THE CHAIRMAN observed that the hon. Member was not addressing himself to the Amendment.

MR. CROSS said, his point was that that House was unable to discharge its duties as regarded Private Bills, because in Committee the Members sat from 12 to 3, and then they sat in that House from 3 till 12 or 1. ["Order!" and interruption.] The House was not fit to discharge its functions as things were now in respect of local Private Bills. He would go further, and say that the House ought not to deal with local Bills. Having to bring such Bills to be dealt with in London meant both delay and expense. [Cries of "Question!" and "Order!"]

MR. T. M. HEALY rose to Order, and asked whether the hon. Member ought not to confine himself to the question whether the lesser powers which he suggested could alone be conferred on the Irish Legislature?

MR. J. A. BRIGHT would like to ask whether it was usual for hon. Members to subject a new Member in his maiden speech to continual interruption?

THE CHAIRMAN hoped that the hon. Member would keep within the scope of his Amendment.

MR. CROSS said, he was trying to do so. He was not unaccustomed to interruptions from the Irish Party in that House, and in other places when he had occasion to say things not altogether palatable. Continuing, he said, that under the present state of affairs, the expense and delay of conducting local Bills in Parliament were very great. It might be that certain witnesses would be delighted to come to London because of the outing; but they were coming at other people's expense, and it was not a very delightful thing from the point of view of those who had to pay the money, and it was not to the public interest that expenses should be piled on in this way.

[Cries of "Agreed!" and "Order!"] He did not think that Parliament was the proper tribunal for such measures. He had knowledge of a Committee consisting of 17 Members which was appointed the other day, and it was a curious fact that five was to be a quorum. He concluded from that that the attendance was not very regular—[Cries of "Question!"—and that the duties imposed on Members were such that they could not give proper time to these questions. He would also urge that the House did not possess the necessary knowledge which was required for the purpose of dealing with local affairs involving knowledge of details of a local character. The question arose whether this Parliament which it was proposed to set up in Ireland was a fit and proper tribunal to entrust with the powers of dealing with local business. It might be said that his argument had been practically admitted, for last year there was a proposal before Parliament that a Body should be elected to deal with these questions in the nature of a Commission composed of Judges, Members of Parliament, and Railway Commissioners. He thought that the power of dealing with these matters should be dealt with by some Local Authority elected for the purpose, and which would be responsible to Parliament. He thought the days had gone by when nominated Bodies could obtain much support or countenance in this country. He understood from the Government that it was one of their main conditions in proposing their Home Rule scheme that nothing should be enacted by the Bill which should not be equally capable of being extended to Scotland. [Cries of "Question!" and interruption.] It could also be extended to Wales if the Welsh people wished it. [Cries of "Question!"] He contended his proposal was of a nature eminently calculated to meet the requirements and necessities of Scotland in regard to local measures. Wales might speak for itself when the time came. If it preferred the present system—[Cries of "Question!" and interruption.] He did not think the Home Rule scheme of the Government was one which they themselves would allege could be extended to Scotland. [Cries of "Question!"]

THE CHAIRMAN : I must request the hon. Gentleman to confine himself to Ireland.

MR. CROSS said, he understood it was an important condition of the Government's scheme that there should be nothing in this Bill which was not capable of being extended to Scotland. [Cries of "Question!" and "Order!"] The Prime Minister, speaking in Edinburgh in 1892, said that no principle should be laid down for Ireland—[Interruption—which could not be admitted for Scotland if she should desire it. As it stood, the clause was not one that the Government would propose for Scotland. [Cries of "Question!" and interruption.]

THE CHAIRMAN : I have already pointed out to the hon. Member that this is a measure for Ireland and not for Scotland. The question is entirely distinct from Scotch Home Rule at the present moment.

MR. CROSS said, he bowed to the Chairman's ruling, of course. [Laughter.] Hon. Members below the Gangway opposite laughed because he bowed to the Chairman's ruling. He should postpone the consideration of his argument as to how the clause might affect Scotland ; but he gave the Government fair warning that he should not fail to watch every clause in the Bill and criticise it if it were a clause which might one day be applied to Scotland, and other Scotch Members would not be justified in taking any other course. He would admit that if the Government intended to make Ireland a nation then the proposal was petty and insignificant ; but he would remind them that if that was their intention, then their own proposals were petty and insignificant. He understood what was meant by the liberty and freedom of a nation ; and he was greatly mistaken if any nation, worthy to be called a nation, would submit to the conditions laid down in the Bill. If, on the other hand, the Government did not intend to make Ireland a nation, but to delegate to Ireland subordinate powers, he respectfully submitted to them that the course they had adopted was not a course likely to realise wise and prudent calculations. He would admit the time must come when a delegation of powers must take place from that House to Local Bodies. He asked those hon. Gentlemen who led the Liberal Party whether their course would not be wiser and better—[Cries of "Question!" and interruption.] He was entitled to his opinion as to the manner in which the Liberal Party had been conducted of late years. [Interruptions.] Although he was a young Member of the House, he had worked for the Liberal Party for many years; and he had been in the secrets of the Liberal Party. He was entitled to an opinion in the matter, and he asserted that the Government had not gone into this question of Home Rule in accordance with the traditions of the Liberal Party. [Cries of "Question!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: I really must call the attention of the hon. Member to the Amendment which he is moving.

MR. CROSS, resuming, submitted that his Amendment was a step in the right direction, and he hoped that Unionist Members would see their way to support it, on the broad plea that devolution of some sort was becoming inevitable. He hoped, also, that some of the hon. Gentlemen who supported the Government would also vote for it. One hon. Member, at least, was committed to his proposal. ["Question!"] He alluded to the hon. Member for Rossendale, who, in common with many other Gladstonian candidates, drew attention to the anomalies to which he (Mr. Cross) had referred, and justified their support of the scheme of the right hon. Member for Midlothian by conveying to the minds of the electors that the Home Rule which they proposed for Ireland was practically simply the giving of powers to deal with such matters as he had referred to in his Amendment, which he now begged to move.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 16, to leave out the words "peace, order, and good government," in order to insert the words "making, maintaining, and improving of railways, tramways, canals, waterworks, reservoirs, gas and lighting works, fisheries, and all other things which are the subject matter of Bills, known in either House of Parliament as local Bills, and also for the confirmation of Provisional Orders in."—(Mr. Alexander Cross.)

VOL. XII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member says this is an honest Amendment, and I am bound to believe him. But, with all respect to the hon. Member, I cannot help feeling that it is a ludicrous Amendment. When his Amendment was read out from the Chair, I noticed that some hon. Gentlemen opposite had considerable difficulty in maintaining their gravity. To put it fairly and candidly, is it not a ludicrous Amendment? Because, surely, in everything we vote in the Bill we must have some regard to what we have voted already? We have determined to constitute in Ireland not a tribunal for dealing with railways and the other matters mentioned in the Amendment; but we have determined to constitute a Legislature. That Legislature is to consist of the Queen and of two Chambers. Is it to be conceived that that Legislature and that interposition of Her Majesty the Queen is seriously to end in the declaration which the hon. Gentleman, seriously I suppose, invites us to make—namely, that Her Majesty and these two Chambers for the better government of Ireland are to deal only with matters relating to railways, tramways, canals, waterworks, reservoirs, gas and lighting works, and so on. I must hold, viewing the consummation to which some hon. Gentlemen seem in danger of leading the Committee, it seems to me we are in danger of substituting not only jokes for earnest, but extremely bad jokes.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I have been in the House now for 17 years, and although that is a very short time in comparison with the lengthened service of my right hon. Friend, still I fancy it is much longer than most of the present Members of this House; and I will say, at all events, in my own experience—and I doubt very much whether the longer experience of my right hon. Friend will qualify what I am about to say—I have never known, during all the time I have been in the House, any lack of courtesy shown towards a new Member addressing the House for the first time. I confess I should have thought the very fact that my hon. Friend behind me was a new Member would have justified the House in according to him, at all events, a patient consideration of his Amendment, even if, in the words of my right hon. Friend, they thought the Amendment to be entirely ludicrous. I say that even then I still think the ordinary courtesy of Parliament might have suggested a little more decent attention to what my hon. Friend said. I come to consider the Amendment; and, I ask, is it ludicrous? My right hon. Friend, at an earlier part of the discussion this evening, fell foul of me because, he said, I proposed an Amendment, and in proposing this Amendment I was not willing to say that if the Amendment were accepted I would accept the Bill.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I said nothing of the kind.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I should be sorry to do my right hon. Friend an injustice; but I am in the recollection of the Committee. I will say that I understood my right hon. Friend to make that accusation against me. We are placed in a difficult position by the action of the Government. When we move an Amendment the Government either ask, in order that they should give fair consideration to that Amendment, that we should go on and say, if they do so, that we would accept the whole Bill, or else they accuse us of a desire to destroy the Bill, and of an intention to make no Amendment in the Bill. That is their first case as against the Opposition, and when we do propose an Amendment of value then they say that the Amendment is ludicrous. We have never placed ourselves in absolute opposition to what the Prime Minister calls the principles of his policy. But the principles of the right hon. Gentleman's policy is always varying, like the arguments by which he supports them. Still, at different times my right hon. Friend has said that his principle was to establish some sort of Legislative Authority in Ireland, leaving it an open question as to what sort of Legislative Authority it should be and what matters it should deal with. If we accept that as the principle of the measure, some of us, in view of our past pledges and promises—[Cheers and counter cheers.] I can assure hon. Gentlemen opposite that we find it more difficult to swallow past pledges than they do. But we cannot, in view of our past pledges and promises, entirely oppose a principle of that kind. I, for one, may say that I have no objection whatever to the establishment of a Legislative Authority in Ireland, and to give to that authority, experimentally, certain powers. The difficulty is as to what extent those powers should be conferred. In a previous Amendment I endeavoured to press upon the Government the importance at this stage of dealing with the matter experimentally, leaving to the Imperial Parliament to extend the powers hereafter, if those powers which are now conferred were not abused. My right hon. Friend treated that also as a ludicrous Amendment.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I never said so. It is not difficult to quote or misquote my words. I never said that the Amendment of my right hon. Friend was ludicrous.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: In my opinion, my right hon. Friend treated my Amendment as ludicrous—[Nationalist cheers—]and conveyed that impression to his friends and allies opposite. I did not quote my right hon. Friend's words, but I said that that was the effect that the words which he had made use of produced upon the minds of his hearers, and he certainly refused to give the Amendment consideration, because he said that if he were to accept it he would be in the position of a man who would lose, whatever happened, and that I was playing the game of "Heads you lose, tails I win." If that is not treating my Amendment as ludicrous, I do not know what is. Now, I come once more to the Amendment before the Committee, and, I ask, is it a ludicrous Amendment? The right hon. Gentleman merely read it out with an ironical intonation, and that was all the argument which he offered against it. That is his way of dealing with the Opposition. Again and again he has met the serious arguments which we have put forward with no answer, and with nothing but a dramatic expression of opinion. Is it a small or ludicrous thing to propose to give to the Legislative Authority, which is to deal with the interests of 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 of people, what my hon. Friend by his Amendment proposes to give to the Legislature of Ireland? Is it a ludicrous thing that this House should have been occupied for I do not know how many weeks with the powers conferred upon the London County Council? Was it contemptible?—did it deserve what I have called the ironical intonation of the right hon. Gentleman that we should confer upon the London County Council what I have heard described as Home Rule for London? If that was an important subject and deserved the consideration of the House, why is it a ludicrous thing to propose to confer upon the Legislative Authority in Ireland similar powers to those which have been conferred by the House upon the London County Council? The Amendment would give to Ireland all the business connected in our minds with great Municipal Institutions; and I said in this House many years ago, as I say to-day, that Municipal Institutions touch the lives and welfare of the people of this country infinitely more than a vast deal of the business that is done in this House. Under these circumstances, I say, it was unworthy of the Prime Minister to treat this Amendment in the way he has treated it. I have never, either in this House or outside it, doubted the ability of my right hon. Friend. [Nationalist cries of "Question!" and "Order!"] I yield to no man in the House in my admiration for the Prime Minister. [Renewed cries of "Question!" on the Nationalist Benches.] I am not going to be put down. My admiration for my right hon. Friend is much more genuine than the recently-bought eulogies of hon. Gentlemen opposite below the Gangway. My right hon. Friend has not paid me for my praise. I say my right hon. Friend could, if he chose, make some kind of answer to the arguments adduced, and I do not know why he should prefer to evade them. I had no intention of taking part in this Debate. I rose only to justify my hon. Friend, whose Amendment is serious and not ludicrous, and was proposed, in the view which my right hon. Friend has recommended to the attention of the House, with a desire to amend the Bill.

MR. DUNBAR BARTON (Armagh, Mid) congratulated the hon. Member for Camlachie on bringing forward such a useful Amendment. Why was that Amendment received with irritation by the Nationalist Members, with rudeness by the Liberal Party, and with impatience by the Leader of the House? It was because the subject of the Amendment was what hon. Members on the Government side had taught the English people to believe was Home Rule. Every man who had spoken on English platforms or mixed with the English people knew that the Amendment contained more than the English people were taught to believe was contained in Home Rule. The Liberals won the Elections on gas and water, and now the gas was exploded and the water had flowed away. The Prime Minister, in answer to the Amendment, said—"You create two Houses, and are you going to give them only such powers as these?" They now knew why the Upper Chamber was put in. It was not as a safeguard for the Loyalists, for it would do the Loyalists more harm than good, but in order to give a false importance to this miserable Legislature. When the Committee appreciated the difference between the Amendment and Home Rule, they would have the reason why the Loyalists were willing to sacrifice their lives and liberties against Home Rule. They opposed the setting up of a Legislature in Ireland; but they would not be justified in offering resistance to a measure embodying the principles of this Amendment. They had no objection to what were called local matters, but which were really very important matters—such matters as were dealt with by Private Bill Legislation in this country—dealt with in Ireland. Many of them were sorry that a Bill in that direction had not been passed by the late Government; for they believed that it would have led to the circulation of money, to municipal enterprise, and to increased employment, which was badly needed in Ireland. The Unionists would like to see some tribunal set up in Ireland to deal with those matters. But what they objected to was a Bill by which the administration of the Criminal Law was to be handed over to the men who were responsible for the outrages of the National League and the Land League; the law of property was to be handed over to the men who organised and carried out the Plan of Campaign; commercial property in the North of Ireland was to be handed over to the merchant princes of New Tipperary; the taxation of Ireland was to be placed in the hands of the gentlemen who financed The Freeman's Journal, and the Executive of the country was to be given into the hands of men who had formed the executive of every criminal conspiracy which had occurred in Ireland during the last 15 years. The Bill was, forsooth, for "the peace, order, and good government" of Ireland! He told them that if they passed the Bill they would have civil war in Ireland, for no free people, with the rights of freemen, would submit to have their lives and liberties and property placed in the hands of such a body as the Bill proposed to set up in Ireland. The Ulster Unionists did not object to the local development of Irish affairs in Ireland. They did not believe those things could be better managed in Ireland than they were in England; but he and his friends would be willing, even at a sacrifice, to have local matters attended to in Ireland. It was the omission of the words, "peace, order, and good government of Ireland," that led him to support the Amendment. He again congratulated the hon. Member on his Amendment, which, like the policeman's lantern, turned upon the criminal, exposed his guilty face, and detected him in the act of his ill-doing.

*MR. MADEN (Lancashire, Rossendale) said, that although he was known as the "gas and water" Member—and he was not ashamed of it—he was as good a Home Ruler as any Member of the House. The hon. Member who had proposed the Amendment supported a Local Authority for dealing with Local Bills. He had no objection to state now that he thought Ireland should have power and authority over local matters. But he went further than that. In his speech some time ago at the Constitutional Club the Leader of the Opposition referred to the seven subjects which he had enumerated as fitting to be referred to an Irish Parliament. If anyone referred to that speech he would find that, as well as gas and water, he mentioned the Land Question and the control of the police as subjects that ought to be referred to the Irish Legislature. He intended to vote against the Amendment, and in so doing he would not be breaking any pledge which he had given his constituents.
Mr. Dunbar Barton

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As I am unwilling to give a silent vote on this Amendment, I will tell the Committee in a few words what my views are concerning it. The hon. Member for Rossendale claims to be as good a Home Ruler as many of the hon. Gentlemen who sit behind the Government. I have not the slightest doubt that that claim is well-founded, though I admit that I am rather surprised at the foundation on which it rests. I was not aware that the hon. Member was known as the "gas and water" Member; but I remember that at a certain celebrated Election he made a speech in which it was generally understood that he had cut down the claims for Home Rule to the kind of subjects mentioned in the Amendment.

*MR. MADEN said, that at the meeting to which the right hon. Gentleman referred he was asked by letter at the last moment to mention six subjects upon which the Irish Parliament could legislate. He replied, and stated seven things which he thought could be dealt with by the Irish Parliament, but never said they were the only things.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can assure the hon. Member that I do not wish to lay too much stress on an explanation given evidently under exceptional difficulties; but I think he is more unfortunate than most of us when answering the questions of our constituents, for, as far as I can make out, of the seven things that he was prepared to give, five of them are mentioned in the Amendment treated so contemptuously by the Prime Minister, and the other two are subjects which the Prime Minister has excluded from the purview of the Bill.

MR. MADEN: They are only excluded for a time.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: But, passing from the Member for Rossendale, I wish to point out to the Committee that the Amendment consists of two questions—first, what it leaves out, and, second, what it puts in. It puts in those important Municipal Institutions—a policy which I have long advocated. I was the author of a Bill to give to Scotland and Ireland control over Private Bill Legislation, with which so much of the time of the House is, as I think, unnecessarily occupied. But, owing to the determined hostility of hon. Gentlemen opposite, that Bill did not become law. With regard to the more important part of the Amendment—what it leaves out—I have not much to add to what has been said by my hon. and learned Friend. The words which we proposed to leave out—"peace, order, and good government"—seems almost ironical when we see who are to maintain peace, who are to preserve good order, and who are to control the Government. It is impossible for us to forget that if this Amendment is carried it will lead to the possibility of carrying a Bill that will not be a dangerous Bill. It would destroy this Bill. The Government would be compelled to drop the Bill; but that does not make me less reluctant to support the Amendment. For that reason I shall follow my hon. Friend into the Lobby if he presses the Amendment.

SIR F. MILNER (Notts, Bassetlaw) said, he wished to say a few words before the Division, as he understood the Amendment of the hon. Member for Harrow would not be allowed to be discussed. He thought that this Amendment exactly fitted the declarations of hon. Members opposite at the General Election. He had read dozens and dozens of their speeches, and he noticed that in constituency after constituency Gladstonians stated that although the Prime Minister, in his infinite wisdom, had given them no details, yet Home Rule for Ireland meant simply giving to the Irish people the same privileges of local government which had been given to the English people. He did not believe that a single Gladstonian would get up and deny that that was his definition of Home Rule. [Several supporters of the Government here sprang to their feet and shouted, "We do deny it."] He observed that among those who denied his statement was the noble Lord the Member for Barnsley, but he thought that he would be able to find words in the speeches of the noble Lord which fitted in exactly with the terms of the Amendment.

EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): I should like to meet that challenge at once. I went to Barnsley in 1889 to fight a bye-election. A Liberal Unionist came down to speak against me, and gave it as his reason for doing so that I went further in the direction of Home Rule than either the Prime Minister or the late Mr. Parnell.

SIR F. MILNER said, he would try to furnish the noble Lord with some satisfactory evidence in proof of his assertion. But hon. Members opposite well knew that their definition of Home Rule was giving to the Irish people the same justice as had been given to the English people. Hon. Members did not attempt to reply to the searching arguments addressed to them. The Amendment would, of course, be rejected; but it would serve to show to the country the false pretences on which Gladstonian Members were now representing their constituencies.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick) said, if the Amendment was ludicrous, as the Prime Minister had described, it followed that the pledges of a good many of the right hon. Gentleman's supporters were also ludicrous. The statement applied to a great many hon. Gentlemen—it was a matter of common notoriety. Most hon. Members who had to conduct a contest with Gladstonians in the country would support him in saying that the tendency was to minimise all that was to be done. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister himself stated in June last in Edinburgh that one of the main principles upon which he proceeded was that what was to be done for Ireland should be of such a nature that it might also be done for the other parts of the Kingdom. That was the line which the right hon. Gentleman and a great number of his followers in different parts of the country adopted. As he had been challenged, he would give examples. The hon. Member for Mid Oxfordshire said—

“The Parliament in Ireland should have full power to legislate on purely Irish affairs, subject to the veto of the Imperial Government.”

The hon. Member for Accrington said—

“The Irish Parliament will have legislative and executive powers in respect of matters exclusively Irish, subordinate to the Imperial Parliament.”

These were by no means the strongest examples that could be quoted. What he claimed in regard to this particular Amendment was that it embodied the view which the Opposition would accept if it were taken by the Government. They were perfectly ready to give to Ireland those powers of Local Government which had been granted to other parts of the United Kingdom.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The Question is—

MR. AMBROSE (interrupting): There was an Amendment further down on the Paper in my name which I understand may be cut out if you put the whole words included in the present Amendment. I ask you to adopt the course usually adopted when it is desirable to save Amendments lower down by putting only the word “the” in the first instance. I claim that by the usages of Parliament I am entitled to that.

MR. J. MORLEY: On the point of Order, I submit that the words “peace, order, and good government” are, in fact, language of common form, and, therefore, must be put together.

MR. BARTLEY: May I draw attention to the fact that there is a subsequent Amendment to leave out the word “peace” and another to leave out “order”? Can those three words be considered as language of common form?

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Have you not put the Question from the Chair; what is the Question before the Committee?

Mr. Parker Smith

*THE CHAIRMAN: In answer to the first objection, the word “the” is part of the Bill and no part of the Amendment, and is in possession of the Committee. It would not help the hon. and learned Gentleman if I put the word “the.” “Peace, order, and good government” is a common form, and it is a form which is universal for this purpose; and, therefore, I propose to put the Amendment thus—to leave out the words “peace, order, and good government of Ireland,” in order to insert the words of the Amendment—

“Making, maintaining, and improving of railways, tramways, canals, waterworks, reservoirs, gas and lighting works, fisheries, and all other things which are the subject matter of Bills, known in either House of Parliament as local Bills, and also for the confirmation of Provisional Orders in.”

MR. AMBROSE: May I ask, Mr. Chairman, whether or not, when those words have been passed, I shall be precluded from moving my Amendment, proposing to transfer matters of local government?

*THE CHAIRMAN: I think that the hon. and learned Gentleman will be excluded if the Committee accept the words “peace, order, and good government.”

MR. AMBROSE: Mr. Mellor, may I ask on what grounds you rule this. My Amendment does not deal merely with local government, it deals with the Central Government; and surely peace, order, and good government equally appertain to that.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University): Am I not right in saying it is the usage of the Chair to put the question, if possible, in such a way as to include only the particular Amendment before the Committee, and not shut out any subsequent Amendment if it can possibly be preserved? What I mean is that if the Chairman puts the Question that the word “the” stand part of the clause, and it is resolved in the affirmative, an opportunity will be left for the hon. Member to propose the Amendment of which he has given notice.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I wish to ask, for the information of the Committee, what is the Question which the Chairman is about to put?

*THE CHAIRMAN: What I propose to put is that the words "peace, order, and good government" stand part of the clause. If I were to put the question that the word "peace" alone stand part of the clause it would shut out the hon. and learned Gentleman quite as much.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 296; Noes 251.—(Division List, No. 86.)

It being after Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside) moved—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the manner in which the Railway Companies have exercised the powers conferred upon them by the Railway Rates and Charges Order Confirmation Acts, 1891 and 1892, and to consider whether it is desirable to adopt any other means of settling difficulties arising between the Companies and the public with respect to the rates and conditions of charge for the conveyance of goods, and to report what means they recommend:

"That the Committee do consist of nineteen Members:

"That Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Burnie, Mr. John Ellis, Mr. Field, Sir Julian Goldsmid, Mr. Hanbury, Mr. Hickman, Mr. Hunter, Mr. Jacks, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Patrick M'Hugh, Mr. Mitford, Mr. Mount, Sir Joseph Pease, Mr. David Plunket, Sir Albert Rollit, Sir Bernhard Samuelson, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, and Sir James Whitehead be Members of the Committee:

"That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records:

"That Five be the quorum."

Several hon. Members objected to the Motion.

MR. MUNDELLA hoped the objection would not be persisted in. If any objection was taken to the names they should be put down as a first Order on Thursday; but he trusted the House would agree to the Reference to the Committee, at any rate.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.) considered that the sooner this Committee was agreed to the better; but he certainly should object to a Reference being taken without the names.

MR. MUNDELLA should be very happy if they could proceed with the names that night. ["No, no!"] He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that the sooner the Committee was appointed and got to work the better. They had arranged the names with both sides of the House.

MR. W. JOHNSTON said, the constitution of the Committee seemed to be a studied insult to Ulster, as there was not a single Member on it from Ulster. He objected to it on that account.

MR. MUNDELLA could only say that Members sitting on both sides of the House had nominated their full share of Members.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) considered it rather an extraordinary thing that the part of Ireland most interested in railway rates had been totally excluded from representation on the Committee, and he should object to it until such a condition of things was remedied.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) desired to know whether the names of the Conservative Members had not been nominated by the Conservative Whips?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. MARJORIBANKS, Berwickshire) said, the Committee had been nominated in the usual manner, and had been the subject of a good deal of discussion of a friendly character.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) considered that the President of the Board of Trade ought certainly to serve on the Committee.

SIR JAMES WHITEHEAD (Leicester) expressed the hope that the Reference to the Committee would be agreed to, and then the names could be taken on Thursday.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) remarked that if hon. Members objected to this Reference they must be prepared to stand before the constituencies of this country as doing their utmost to prevent traders getting that justice which the House had declared they were entitled to.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, what he and other Members felt was this—that the whole legislation of the United Kingdom was being neglected for Ireland. The Government had got the whole time of the House, and yet they would not agree to grant them an hour for the discussion of this important subject. It was a matter which ought to be considered at a reasonable hour, and the interests of the whole country ought not to be sacrificed for the Irish Question.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) reminded the House that he withdrew his Motion on the subject on the distinct understanding that after Easter the Committee should be nominated. The usual course had been pursued in regard to the Committee, and he appealed to the House to allow the Motion to be passed. This was a matter affecting the vital interests of the country. There was apparently little time for dealing with it, and he hoped the Motion would not be objected to.

MR. COHEN (Islington, E.) considered that the right hon. Gentleman ought not to be surprised that objection was raised against the proposal to pass this Motion after 12 o'clock at night. If on another night the Government would consent to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member for North Islington (Mr. Bartley) and report Progress on the Home Rule Bill at 11 or a quarter past, the question of the appointment of this Committee could easily be disposed of before 12 o'clock.

MR. MUNDELLA could not promise to accede to the suggestion of the hon. Member. A course such as he recommended had been tried the other night, in order to facilitate the progress of the North Sea Fisheries Bill, and the only result was that the Bill was talked out. As the Motion before the House was objected to, he would put it down again for next day. The responsibility for this and any subsequent delay must rest with hon. Members who continued to object.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN (Lambeth, Brixton) wished emphatically to deny that any arrangement was made publicly in any way with regard to the North Sea Fisheries Bill. If there was any arrangement at all it was some private arrangement.

Objection being taken, the consideration was deferred.

MADRAS AND BOMBAY ARMIES BILL.
(No. 66.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee upon the said Bill."—(The Earl of Kimberley.)

*LORD CONNEMARA said, he was anxious, with their Lordships' permission, to state his reasons for giving to the principle of this Bill his humble, but cordial, support, particularly with respect to those provisions which affected the Government and Army of Madras. He need hardly remind their Lordships that the Madras Army had an historical record of an interesting and remarkable character. By the bravery and loyalty of that Army under Lord Clive, Sir Eyre Coote, and the Duke of Wellington, the supremacy of Great Britain was firmly established in the whole of the Southern Peninsula. The battles fought under those great Commanders were fought not only against very brave native soldiers, but against European troops, and under the most able French General whom France ever sent to India. The result of those campaigns was to add to the sway of the British Crown nearly 30,000,000 of people, and to establish a peace throughout the whole of that great territory, which had lasted now for very nearly 100 years. Coming down to modern times, it would be in the recollection of their Lordships that the Madras

Army stood firm to its allegiance, and bore a distinguished part during the great Mutiny; and it was owing, to a great extent, to the gallantry of that Army that peace was restored in Northern India, while entire tranquillity prevailed during those terrible times in the South of India. Under those circumstances, he was sure their Lordships would desire that full justice and consideration should be shown to the sentiments and feelings of the Madras Army in those changes which their Lordships might think wise to sanction with respect to our Military Forces in India. The Papers on their Lordships' Table showed beyond doubt that the whole condition of affairs with respect to military defence had altered in recent times not only since the Afghan and Punjab Wars, but still more recently. Those who had been connected with the Foreign Office at any time during the last 20 years could not fail to be impressed with the gravity of those events which had taken place in Central Asia. With regard to our trans-Indus frontier, those who had had an opportunity of studying on the spot even with a civilian's eyes the great system of frontier defence; and the changes and reforms which had lately been introduced into the Military and Civil Administration by Lord Dufferin, Lord Lansdowne, and by the untiring energy and genius of Lord Roberts in our trans-Indian territory, could not fail to be deeply impressed with the enormous importance of the problems which our Army might one day be called on to solve without much warning. Again, the annexation of Upper Burmah had made a great alteration in military affairs in that quarter, and had changed altogether the status of the Commander-in-Chief of Madras. It was essential that the conduct of war should be with the Government of India; so Upper Burmah was placed under the direct control of the Government of India, and Lower Burmah under the military jurisdiction of the Government of Madras. Another great change had taken place in India with reference to the frontier tribes between Burmah and Bengal. The extension of the Empire in Burmah had brought under our rule new races who might be expected to contribute their quota to the defence of the Empire. Further, the creation and extension of railroads and telegraphs had not only changed, but revolutionised every factor in every military question in India. As an illustration of that, he might state that when the East Coast line, which was begun four years ago, was completed, and which he trusted would be pushed forward with vigour, Madras and the whole of the South of India would be in direct railway communication with Calcutta and the North-West, when materials and troops could be moved in safety from Cape Comorin to Lahore in a very few days. Under these circumstances, he fully recognised the wisdom of giving to the Commander-in-Chief in India that direct command and authority over the five armies of which the Indian Forces were composed, and which the Government of India had been struggling to obtain for the last ten years, so long as men of the different Indian races were kept segregated, which he believed to be the principle and intention of the Bill. As a matter of fact, he did not perceive that there was any great novel principle involved in the Bill which could affect the Sepoys or the Armies of India, for the Government of India could now, without the authority of Parliament and without the consent of the Madras Government, do most things affecting the welfare of the Madras Sepoys and the organisation and efficiency of the Madras Army that could possibly be imagined, very much to the benefit of the Public Service. During the last five years it had amalgamated the Transport, the Commissariat, and the Clothing Departments. It had abolished whole regiments; it had changed three regiments of Madras Infantry into Burmah Police, and recruited them with men from the North. He was far from thinking that the Government of India had been wrong in these changes. Therefore, this Bill only dealt with a remnant of those changes which required the authority of Parliament—changes which had been in progress and active operation for some years. He could not see in this Bill anything which could in any way injuriously affect the Madras Sepoy. On the contrary, he inclined to think that when the Commander-in-Chief in India obtained direct supervision of the Madras Army in common with the other Armies of the Indian Empire, the position of the Sepoy would be improved, and, what was more important, the efficiency of the Madras Army would be improved. Some people had thought there was, and had been for a long time, room for improvement in the Madras Army. He did not wish to dwell on the causes which had led to the loss of prestige by the Madras Army of late years in some particulars and in some classes. Amongst these causes might be mentioned the family system, which was a system that undoubtedly made the Sepoy contented and loyal, but was one which no one could say contributed to the efficiency or the mobility of the Army. Another cause to which sufficient attention had not been paid of late years was the classes from which the Army had been recruited. All Military Authorities agreed in thinking that the Madras Sapper was an excellent soldier, who had done good service in many parts of the world, and there was no reason why that corps should not be largely increased. The same might be said of the Madras Pioneers; and other regiments and other races from which those regiments were recruited might be mentioned of which the same things might be said. He wished to allude to the lamented and tragic death of General Sir James Dormer, than whom no more popular Commander-in-Chief ever ruled in India. For more than a year before his death this question of recruiting had been under that officer's consideration. A scheme, he believed, had been drawn up, and was to be found in the Madras Military Department for recruiting soldiers from among the more warlike races in India; and it was to be hoped that General Dormer's policy would be continued by his successor. He wished to say a word respecting the clause in the Bill which deprived the Governor's Council of the services of the General commanding the troops. He regretted that proposal, and he did not understand the Secretary of State to attach much importance to its retention, while he was quite sure that the change was undesirable, and hoped that the Secretary of State would see his way to erase it from the Bill. Every Governor must wish that his Council should be as strong as possible, and would, he should think, deplore the loss of an officer of the rank and ability of the Commander of the Army; and he could conceive a state of things in which the presence of that officer in the Council would be eminently useful. In the event of a political disturbance which rendered it necessary that troops should be sent to the scene of disorder, it would be highly desirable that the Military Authority should understand the political or other reasons why the troops were sent. On the whole, he trusted that this Bill would raise the Madras Army to a state of efficiency; and he trusted that no time would be lost in giving to the Government of India an opportunity of carrying the proposed reform into operation. He hoped most sincerely their Lordships would pass the Bill, and that it would be passed in the other House of Parliament without delay; because he was quite sure, if it had not been for the exigencies of modern political life, it would have been passed some time ago.

Motion agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 1.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of Kimberley): My Lords, I have some Amendments upon this clause to meet a criticism which has been made as to the wording of the Bill. I find, as I expected, that the present form arose in this way. There is a definition in the Act which says that the Governor shall mean the Governor in Council; but I think it will be better to make it quite clear in the Bill, and these Amendments will leave the matter without the slightest doubt. They are really all verbal in that sense, and all upon the same subject.

Moved in Clause 1, page 1, line 16, after ("exercised") to leave out ("and") and insert ("by those Governors in Council, and shall be exercisable by the Governor General of India in Council"); in line 18, after ("Governor") to insert ("in Council"), in line 19, after ("India") to insert ("in Council").—(The Earl of Kimberley.)

Amendments agreed to.

VISCOUNT CROSS: My Lords, in Clause 1, page 1, line 22, I have put down an Amendment, after "shall," to insert "not"; but I think the Amendment would be better carried out if the word "cease" is left out, and "continue" inserted. I will not take up your Lordships' time further upon it now, because the matter was argued the other day, and I hope the Government will not object to that Amendment.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Perhaps as this involves, in point of fact, the principle of the next Amendment, the noble Viscount would prefer to take the discussion upon that now.

VISCOUNT CROSS: I did not think I need state the reasons again. I thought it was clearly understood the other day.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I did not know whether the noble Viscount had anything more to say upon it.

VISCOUNT CROSS: No.

Moved, in Clause 1, page 1, line 22, to leave out the word ("cease") and insert ("continue"); and in line 23, after ("respectively") add ("the officers commanding the forces in the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay may be appointed members of council at the said respective Presidencies in the same manner as, and subject to the provisions under which, the Commander-in-Chief in the said Presidencies has hitherto been appointed").—(Viscount Cross.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, the first Amendment, although not in terms, really involves the principle of the second Amendment of the noble Viscount, and the one may be said to hang upon the other. Of course, I fully admit that in this House there is a very strong unanimity of opinion on the part of those noble Lords who have spoken in favour of retention of the Generals commanding the Armies of Madras and Bombay upon the Councils of these Presidencies. But I think hardly sufficient weight was given to the arguments which may be put forward upon the other side; and in reference to what was said just now by the noble Lord who spoke upon going into Committee, and who has himself a wide experience in the working of these matters, I would point out, when he speaks of the action of the Governments of Madras and Bombay in military matters, he must not forget that the very object of this Bill is to preclude those Governments from the management of military affairs. It may, undoubtedly, be the case that occasions will occur upon which the Governments of those Presidencies may have to call in the assistance of the Military Authorities, and in that way military affairs might have to be discussed by those Councils; but the very principle of the Bill is that those powers will cease to be exercised. What is felt is that there would be a considerable anomaly in the Generals commanding those Forces remaining upon the Councils when the questions upon which they would presumably require to be consulted are removed from the control of the Governments of those Presidencies. And I must also point out that if the system is carried into effect of dividing the Armies of India into four different Divisions, which, without anticipating the final decision, I may say will probably be the case, that is the Army of Bombay as at present constituted, the Army of Madras and the Bengal Army in two Divisions, the actual position of the Commanders of the Bombay and Madras Armies will be of as great importance as that of the Commanders of each of the Divisions of the Bengal Army. Therefore, by their retention, you would have this inconvenient result—that you would have the Commanders of two, not the most important of the four Armies, occupying a higher position than the other Commanders by their being Members of the Councils. There is also the question of salaries, for they would be receiving, of course, higher salaries than would otherwise be allotted to them. That, too, would be a point which would seem likely to give rise to some jealousy, and which might cause a feeling of inequality between the Generals in command of the different Forces. All these are arguments which are worthy of considerable weight being given to them. I would further observe that there is considerable apprehension on the part of those who have taken a different view in this matter to that which appears to be generally held in this House, that the position of Lieutenant Generals in Bombay and Madras might lead to certain friction between those Lieutenant Generals and the Commander-in-Chief, because they would occupy a somewhat anomalous position, as I said before; and that might occasion difficulties which would not otherwise arise. For these reasons, I certainly, upon the whole, prefer the clause as I had drafted it; but, considering the very strong opinion which has been expressed in this House by many of your Lordships, all having experience in this matter, I shall certainly not now trouble the House to divide upon these Amendments; but, at the same time, I must reserve my liberty of action in the future stages of the Bill.

VISCOUNT CROSS: I do not think I need detain your Lordships by answering at any length the observations of the noble Earl. I quite understand what were the views expressed the other day when I spoke on this matter; but I still think the balance of convenience is on the side of the Amendments I have proposed. In answer to the noble Earl's suggestion as to inequality in position, I would point out that the Commander-in-Chief will, of course, always be on the Governor General's Council; and, therefore, as far as the two Armies of Bengal are concerned, he will represent those Commanders.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: It was originally proposed to exclude him.

VISCOUNT CROSS: I hope that will not be done. Then, as regards friction on the part of the Commanders in Bombay and Madras, there can be nothing of that kind, because they are placed under the Commander-in-Chief. The Councils of Madras and Bombay are very small; and I think, therefore, it would be very objectionable to remove these officers, who, I think, will be still of very great use on those Councils.

Schedule.

VISCOUNT CROSS: My Lords, with regard to the Schedule, the noble Earl will, I am sure, excuse me if I ask him a question. I have not put down any Amendment in the particulars given here; but they do, I think, require very careful examination. I hope the noble Earl will assure us that they have been carefully examined.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I am able to inform the noble Viscount that they have been most carefully examined. I may say that I have gone through every one of the Acts myself, personally, and I believe I have ascertained that no alteration or Amendment is required in the Schedule. Of course, if there should be any mistake discovered there will be an opportunity of correcting it.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: Perhaps the noble Earl will state what is the reason why several clauses which have been recommended by the Governor General of India to be repealed are not included in the Schedule?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I am afraid I cannot answer that question at this moment; but I will endeavour to give an answer to it in the future stages of the Bill. I can only say again that every one of the clauses affecting this matter has been carefully examined, and that I have every reason to believe that every one which requires to be repealed has been included.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I do not think this is a Bill which need go to the Standing Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Are you quite sure?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I think it is unnecessary.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I would point out to the noble Earl that it is a Bill with a good deal of detail in it.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I have no objection if the noble Marquess thinks it desirable.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It is only that I think it would be unwise to run any risk, and it will not be looked after in the other House a bit.

Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee; and to be printed as amended. (No. 100.)

CHOLERA HOSPITALS (IRELAND) BILL (No. 40.)

THIRD READING.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order).

LORD ACTON said, this Bill was substantially an old Act of Parliament which was very familiar to both Houses. When it came before the Standing Committee the noble Marquess opposite suggested that it might be made more prompt and easy of operation; and accordingly Amendments had been drafted to the 1st clause with the approval of the Irish Government. He hoped and believed they would answer the purpose the Marquess of Salisbury had in view. As the Amendments were consequential and were in the hands of noble Lords, he would read the clause as it would now stand—

"Upon the publication in The Dublin Gazette of an Order made by the Lord Lieutenant in Council declaring that a case of the infectious disease known as spasmodic or Asiatic cholera has occurred in Ireland, the authority of any sanitary district, having first obtained the permission in writing of the Local Government Board for Ireland (hereinafter called 'the Local Government Board'), and given such notice as is prescribed in this Act, may take possession of any site, except as hereinafter mentioned, within or contiguous to that sanitary district, and specified in such written permission for the purpose of erecting thereon a temporary hospital."

Amendment moved,

In Clause 1, page 1, to leave out line 5 and insert ("upon the publication in The Dublin Gazette of an Order made by the Lord Lieutenant in Council declaring"); in line 7 to leave out from ("occurred") to ("the authority") in line 8 and insert ("in Ireland"); in line 8, leave out the second ("the") and insert ("any"); and in line 13, leave out ("the") and insert ("or contiguous to that").—(The Lord Acton.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: That appears to me, as far as I can judge, to meet the objection which I found to arise.

Bill passed, and returned to the Commons.

THE STRENGTH OF THE NAVY.

RESOLUTION.

*LORD HOOD OF AVALON moved to resolve—

"That taking into consideration the extreme importance of the vast interests in connection with the British Empire, which in time of war must be protected by the Navy, also the rapidly-approaching completion of the vessels building under the Naval Defence Act, and the very large increase which has been undertaken in the strength of foreign navies since the passing of that Act, it has become absolutely necessary that a further well-considered progressive scheme, extending over a term of years, for making such an increase to the strength of the Navy as will insure adequate protection being given to the vast interests of the Empire, should be prepared and provided for."

He said that the extreme importance of the subject set forth in his proposed Resolution would, no doubt, be considered a sufficient reason for bringing it before the attention of their Lordships. What were those vast interests which could only be protected by the Navy? They were, first, the protection of our own coasts; secondly, our valuable Possessions abroad; thirdly, our commerce on the high seas, the average value of which afloat at any moment was estimated at £150,000,000 sterling; and, lastly, but by no means least, the protection of our coaling stations and sea-borne food supplies. It was by no means over-stating the case to say that, in the event of this country being engaged in war with a powerful enemy or combination of enemies strong on the sea, its very existence as a first-class Power must depend upon having a powerful Navy thoroughly ready for war. In time of peace our sea-borne food supply was an important question for us; but if, through false economy, the Navy was again allowed to fall into a weak condition—which God forbid!—and this country was suddenly involved in war with a first-class Naval Power, or possibly with more than one Naval Power, our food supplies would be materially interfered with—nay, possibly cut off—in which case but very few months would elapse before we should have a famine throughout the country, and we should be simply starved into signing an inglorious peace with the enemy on their own terms. The strength of the Navy should never be made a controversial Party question. It was the bounden duty of all legislators, whatever their political views on other subjects, to unite in insisting that the Navy should be maintained at such a standard of strength as would insure adequate protection being given to the vast interests of this Empire. Then, and then only, should we be free from those panics which had hitherto occurred whenever a scare of war arose. He well remembered the anxiety which arose throughout the country in the early part of 1885, when the relations between Russia and this country were in a very strained condition, from fear that the Navy was not prepared for war, and how money was spent broadcast in the endeavour to provide hurriedly, and therefore inefficiently, for the deficiency. When at that time, having been appointed by Lord George Hamilton First Naval Lord of the Admiralty, it became his duty to look closely into the real state of the Navy, he formed a very decided opinion that we were not prepared to engage in war with a single first-class Naval Power with a well-assured certainty of success. The real state of the Navy at that time was this. We were decidedly deficient in battle-ships; our cruisers were far too few in number, and far too deficient in speed, to enable them to protect our commerce on the high seas; we had no first-class gunboats suitable for foreign service, not a single fast torpedo vessel, and very few torpedo boats. When the Conservative Government came into Office in 1885, steps were at once taken to remedy that state of things. Fifteen new vessels were commenced, including two first-class battle-ships, the Nile and the Trafalgar. Their successors in Office very wisely did not attempt to interfere with their building programme; but no additional vessels were commenced. From that time up to 1889, every endeavour had been made by the late Government to increase the strength of the Navy, so far as it could be done without largely increasing the Naval Estimates. At the end of that time, looking at the very large increase in the strength of Foreign Navies, the late Government most wisely decided to increase the strength of the Navy as rapidly as possible, and to raise it to a standard that should be equal, if not superior, to that of any two Foreign Navies in combination. With the building of the 70 vessels resolved upon under the Naval Defence Act great progress had been made, a large proportion having been completed; and they had passed their trials in a most satisfactory manner. As regarded rapidity of construction, he might give the instance of the Royal Sovereign of over 14,000 tons displacement, which within two years and eight months of its being commenced was commissioned as flagship of the Channel Squadron, a rapid feat of ship-building, which had never been approached either in this or any other country, and for which the highest credit was due to her designers and the whole of the officials connected with her construction. But since the passing of that Act a large increase had been commenced and was being rapidly proceeded with in the strength of Foreign Navies, especially in the case of France and Russia. In France five first-class battle-ships and four so-called coast defence vessels, which, for size, speed, and armour protection, might fairly be classed as battle-ships, were building; also five powerful armoured cruisers, 15 other protected cruisers, and five exceedingly fast torpedo gun vessels—a total increase of 34 vessels. In Russia, six first-class and one second-class battle-ships were building; also four armoured coast defence vessels and three of by far the most powerful armoured cruisers in the world, and six exceedingly fast torpedo gunboats—a total increase of 20 vessels; and both France and Russia combined an increase of 54 vessels, of which no less than 16 were battle-ships, four very powerful armoured coast defence vessels, and eight exceedingly powerful armoured cruisers. In order that our vast interests might be duly protected in time of war in future, he held it to be absolutely necessary that there should be a further well-considered progressive scheme extending over a term of years for increasing the strength of the Navy. In the Navy Estimates for 1892-3 Lord George Hamilton stated that provision was only made for commencing three battle-ships and building 10 torpedo boats in that year, and he added that in 1893-4 he should be prepared to bring forward a very largely-extended programme. Unfortunately, however, events had since occurred to interfere with that intention of the noble Lord; but he had sincerely hoped the noble Earl, his successor, would follow the same wise policy, and that they would have found that provision had been made for increasing the strength of the Navy in battle-ships, cruisers, and torpedo gunboats, to the extent necessary for the protection of the vast interests of this great Empire, looking at the large increase of the naval strength of foreign nations. Of these three classes of vessels he thought an increase of battle-ships was the first and most important point to consider, for there could be little doubt that the fate of future wars would be decided by that class of vessel. Fast cruisers were of great value in the protection of commerce; but they could not perform the fighting duties of battle-ships. They could be built in half the time, and could be largely supplemented when necessary by our large and fast mercantile steamers, and he was glad to say that a number of the best of these vessels had been subsidised by the late Government to act as cruisers in time of war. Armaments had been provided for them and fighting crews arranged. Torpedo boats would be of extreme value in any future war for protecting our ports and for protecting our commerce in the Channel from the swarms of torpedo boats which had been organised and arranged in groups all along the opposite Coasts. He had carefully examined the Estimates for the present year, but could find in them no trace of any such progressive scheme for increasing the Navy as he advocated. A certain programme had been laid down; but it was a very meagre one, though he had no fault to find with the class of vessels decided upon. They had wisely resolved to build two very large first-class cruisers, and this step had been rendered necessary in consequence of Russia building three of the most powerful armoured cruisers in the world—vessels which would be far superior in size, speed, armament, and coal-supply to any cruisers ever before built by any other country, and in time of war it was certain they must prove most formidable commerce-destroyers; and in this country, with our enormous commerce on the high seas, it was therefore absolutely necessary that we should build a certain number of still more powerful cruisers to protect our commerce from the attacks of such vessels. He trusted that when the Estimates for 1894-5 came to be considered—by which time the whole of the vessels building under the Naval Defence Act would be completed—they would find, whatever Party was then in power, that a comprehensive and progressive scheme for increasing the Navy to the necessary extent for providing adequate protection for our vast interests had been decided upon. If this was not done, through any consideration of false economy, then the British Navy, looking to the increase of Foreign Navies, would fall back into a state of comparative weakness, with regard to the vast interests which must be entrusted to its protection in time of war, such as it was in when the late Government took Office in 1885. During the time the late Government was in Office they increased the strength of the Navy by 130 vessels, including 13 of the most powerful battle-ships in the world, 69 fast and powerful cruisers, 17 gunboats of over 700 tons each for foreign service, and 31 fast torpedo gunboats. A remarkable advance was made in the same period in the speed of the vessels of the Navy. In 1885, when the late Government came into Office, the number of required to meet the necessities of the country in time of war. The Committee on Naval Estimates in 1888 declared in their Report—

“That the responsibility of the Board of Admiralty and Government, respectively, for the efficiency of the Navy would be more clearly defined and accentuated if the wants of the country were carefully considered, and a programme drawn up and submitted by the First Lord, on behalf of the Board, to the Cabinet before any decision is taken as to the amount of money to be spent during the year.”

He wished to know whether any such programme had been drawn up; and, if so, whether there would be any objection to laying it on the Table of the House? He did not believe that there would be any difficulty in obtaining as much money as was really required to render the Navy as efficient as it ought to be; and he held that it was a fatal policy to keep the nation in the dark. Whilst he was delighted that the noble Lord opposite had brought forward this Motion, with all his great authority and experience, he was bound to say that he was not a little surprised to see the Notice standing on the Paper in the noble Lord's name. It was impossible not to carry one's memory back to the year 1888, when the noble Lord (Lord Hood of Avalon) was the First Naval Lord at the Admiralty, and when he gave evidence before the Committee on Naval Estimates, presided over by Mr. Campbell-Bannerman. At that time it was a grave question whether the Navy was thoroughly efficient for the demands which in war-time it would be called upon to meet. Lord Hood was naturally one of the principal witnesses called before the Committee, and in his evidence he distinctly stated before that Committee that he was quite satisfied with the state of the Navy, that it was ample to fight any one Power, and that all was required would be six more cruisers to be finished in the year 1890. He was asked after speaking about battle-ships—

“Do you think we are building them sufficiently fast, or procuring them sufficiently fast?—As I said before, I should like to have a few more fast cruisers.

“You said, did you not, that you were only fairly well satisfied with the adequacy of the Estimates?—I was speaking of the fast cruisers. As I said half-a-dozen times before, I should have preferred by the end of 1890 to have had six more fast cruisers. I do not consider it a point of vital importance.

It was possible, of course, that when the noble Lord gave that evidence, he felt himself tied and bound by official restraint, and that he did not utter his own untrammelled opinion and unfettered judgment. The Navy was astonished at the evidence that he gave, because it was so totally at variance with the feelings and exigencies of the whole Service. The country, also, which at that time had been roused to the necessity of having a large increase of our Fleet, was at first inclined to think it had been wrongly advised, and that further additions were not necessary. Fortunately, soon after that evidence was given, a Committee was appointed by the Admiralty to consider the results of the Naval Manœuvres of 1888. The gentlemen selected were Naval experts of the highest authority—namely, Admirals Sir W. Dowell, Sir Vesey Hamilton, and Sir F. W. Richards. Their Report was of a very different character from the evidence the noble Lord had given. They spoke in the strongest terms of what the Navy wanted. That Report was so remarkable that he would like to quote from it to their Lordships, not because it was necessary to prove his point, but because it was the strongest programme which had ever been drawn up in this country, and, fearlessly issued as it was, was undoubtedly in antagonism to the opinion and evidence of their First Naval Lord of the Admiralty. He would, with their Lordships' permission, read a few extracts from the Report of the Committee on Naval Manœuvres, 1888—

“For all these services in July last the total number of battle-ships and cruisers, &c., available in home waters was a force altogether inadequate in our judgment to meet the requirements we have indicated, and to take the offensive in a war with only one Great Power; and supposing a combination of even two Powers to be allied as her enemies the balance of maritime strength would be seriously against England. The Mediterranean Squadron alone would have required to be more than doubled. We are decidedly of opinion that no time should be lost in placing the Navy beyond comparison with that of any two Powers. No other nation has any such interest in the maintenance of an undoubted superiority at sea as has England, whose seaboard is her frontier. England ranks among the Great Powers of the world by virtue of the Naval position she has acquired in the past, and which has never been seriously challenged since the close of the last great war. The defeat of her Navy means to her the loss of India and her Colonies and of her place among the nations. Without any desire to question the sums annually granted by Parliament for the maintenance of the Services, we cannot but note the disproportion in the appropriation when the magnitude of the issues involved is taken into consideration. It would, in our opinion, be far more in consonance with the requirements of the nation by the provision of an adequate Fleet to render invasion an impossibility than to enter into costly arrangements to meet an enemy on our shores (instead of destroying his 'Armadas' off our shores), for under the condition in which it would be possible for a Great Power to successfully invade England nothing could avail her, as, the command of the sea once being lost, it would not require the landing of a single man upon her shores to bring her to an ignominious capitulation, for by her Navy she must stand or fall."

The Report was signed by Sir W. M. Dowell, Admiral, Sir R. Vesey Hamilton, Admiral, and Sir Frederick W. Richards, Vice Admiral.

LORD HOOD OF AVALON asked the noble Lord to read his comments upon that Report. Having read the statements on one side, he might as well read the statements on the other.

*LORD SUDELEY was sorry that he had not the noble Lord's comments ready to hand. The noble Lord at the time certainly did his best to get out of what was a very difficult position, and in his reply he, no doubt, wrote strongly with reference to other matters; but, apparently, he did not say much in regard to that actual point.

*LORD HOOD OF AVALON said, he took up every point in the Report of the Committee and dealt with it. Having read the statements on one side, the noble Lord ought to read the statements on the other.

*LORD SUDELEY said, that the noble Lord undoubtedly gave that evidence before the Committee, and by those statements from such a high authority he did more than any other man to retard the passing of the Naval Defence Act.

*LORD HOOD OF AVALON: Why, I drew the Naval Defence Act. How can you make such a statement?

*LORD SUDELEY said, that he had no wish to irritate the noble Lord, for whom he had great respect, as certainly one of the greatest authorities in the Navy; but that it was impossible to let his statement remain unchallenged that he had done so much in favour of passing the Naval Defence Act of 1889, when it was known to everyone that he had given the strongest possible evidence before the Committee on Naval Estimates in that year that nothing beyond six cruisers was required in 1888 to increase the Navy. He would conclude by expressing the hope that the noble Earl at the head of the Admiralty would tell the House that the Government contemplated bringing forward a strong Naval Programme.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Earl SPENCER): My Lords, I am sure your Lordships will have listened with pleasure to the clear and able speech of the noble and gallant Lord, whose contributions to Debates on the Navy will, I have no doubt, always be welcome and valuable to your Lordships and the country. In thinking over the course likely to be taken by these Debates, I did not anticipate a long historical review of the Navy, and I was not prepared to go back to the year 1885 and what was done by the Government of that day. I was not a Member of the Board of Admiralty of those days, but I was a Member of the Cabinet; and, therefore, I shared with other Members of the Cabinet the responsibility for what was done at the Admiralty. Now, my Lords, the noble and gallant Lord attacked the policy of the Admiralty of which Lord Northbrook was the head; but when the Government, of which that noble Lord was a Member, went out and that of the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) succeeded, I failed to find any evidence of a new policy or programme adopted by the new Board of Admiralty. What they did do was to carry out and develop the programme of Lord Northbrook. I do not wish to dwell upon that, nor to go into the controversy between Lord Sudeley and the noble and gallant Lord opposite (Lord Hood of Avalon) as to the evidence given before the Committee of the House of Commons. At the same time, I am aware that some evidence of the noble and gallant Lord was quoted to show that very little was wanting in the Navy of 1888. I am also well aware that the noble and gallant Lord was First Sea Lord when the Naval Defence Act was introduced. Perhaps the noble and gallant Lord was more responsible for advice given and the programme adopted in the Act than any other person except the First Lord himself; and it is due to him to say so much. Now, the Motion contains three propositions. As to the first, nearly everybody agrees with the doctrine it lays down. I, for one, have more than once declared my opinion in this House that it is necessary the Navy should be in a thoroughly efficient state in order to protect the vast and varied interests of this great Empire. I would even go further, and say that not only is it necessary for the interests of the State in time of war that the Navy should be efficient, but that even in time of peace the interests of the country require the support of the Navy in various parts of the world. Then it has been stated that the programme of the Naval Defence Act will shortly be completed. The Admiralty believe that all the ships will be completed, with the exception of about nine, by the end of the financial year 1893-4. The Act requires that they should be completed, as far as practicable, by the end of that financial year. As regards certain ships, there has been some delay which it was impossible to avoid, arising out of the conditions of the shipbuilding trade; but, on the whole, the position we are in as regards the fulfilment of the conditions of the Act is eminently satisfactory. We believe that only £283,000 would be wanted to complete the programme after the beginning of the next financial year. The next proposition which the noble and gallant Lord makes is, that since the passing of the Act the increase in the strength of Foreign Navies renders necessary an increase in the strength of ours. It was always contemplated that there would be increase in the strength of other Navies, but it is possible that increase may have gone beyond our expectations. At all events, I cannot plead ignorance of it. We admit that there has been a considerable development of shipbuilding, in France and Russia particularly; and all that was taken into account by us in considering the position of these nations with regard to our own Navy. Now, my Lords, I come to the Resolution which the noble and gallant Lord asks your Lordships to agree to; and that Resolution, founded upon these propositions, that a further well-considered, progressive, and large scheme should be adopted on the completion of the work created by the Naval Defence Act. That is as I understand it. Now, I am not quite certain what the noble and gallant Lord means with regard to that. If it is meant that he does not consider the programme with which he was so much connected in 1889 adequate, and which is known as the Naval Defence Act Programme, then I do not find myself able to agree with the noble and gallant Lord. I cannot help thinking that the standard of strength on which the programme was based still holds good, and that it is adequate and sufficient to meet all the just demands of the nation. Having regard to the necessity for considering the strength of Foreign Navies, as well as the defence of the great interests of this country, my belief is that the fulfilment of the programme of the Naval Defence Act attains the necessary standard of strength for our Navy, and I am not prepared to say that that standard should now be increased. A point which has a material bearing upon this question is the great rapidity with which we are now able to construct our ships. The noble and gallant Lord has referred to what was done in the building of the Royal Sovereign, and has justly stated that the greatest credit was due to the Dockyard officials for the rapidity with which that vessel was built. I fully endorse that view. That ship was ready for service within three years of the time she was commenced. In other countries five years have been found necessary to build a ship of that kind. That illustrates one of the sources of the strength of this country—that we are able to build ships much more rapidly than other countries. We are thus enabled to watch carefully what other countries do, and, if necessary, we can overtake them on an emergency by laying down ships enough to make up for any possible deficiency, as we can build so much more rapidly. Now, my Lords, I am not quite clear as to what the noble Lord desires. Does he desire that we should have at once a new Naval Defence Act? I do not gather that entirely from his remarks, and I will not, therefore, discuss that question. I will only repeat what I said before, which is well known to the noble and gallant Lord, that there has been a considerable difference of opinion as to the policy of having a scheme of construction laid down in an Act of Parliament. There are strong financial reasons often urged against that policy, although I am ready to admit that there are also great advantages to be got from it. I did not wish in any way to support the policy of the necessity of having a Naval Defence Act to carry out the programme for the Navy. But, my Lords, when I say I do not consider an Act is necessary, I thoroughly admit that it is necessary to look forward and take a comprehensive view of what is wanted for the Navy. Besides what is absolutely wanted to maintain the strength of the Navy, it is exceedingly desirable that ships should be built and should be at different stages of construction in the Dockyards of the country. This is important, in order to avoid spasmodic increases in the Navy, such as often took place in former years, which mean spasmodic increases in the men employed in the Dockyards, with rapid diminutions in their number when the pressure is past. That I do not think at all a desirable policy. If the noble Lord means that we must keep up the strength of the Navy by substituting new ships of the most modern types for old ships which are becoming obsolete, then I entirely agree with that view of the case. In my belief the duty of the Admiralty at the present time and for the next few years is to maintain the standard of strength which has been laid down of late years, to introduce those ships which are necessary to take the place of vessels which are becoming worn out, and to give the newest types of ships in place of the old ones. I do not want to go again over the ground which I covered in the Debate some time ago. I regretted at the time that the noble and gallant Lord was not present to take part in the Debate; but I will refer shortly to the programme which I stated that the present Board of Admiralty were ready to adopt — a programme which, in my opinion, is sufficient for the present wants of the Navy. I am not aware that what we now propose comes very far short of what, at all events, was first intended by the preceding Board in regard to the programme for this year. There may be modifications on certain points from that programme; but certainly the present Government has decided on those large cruisers to which the noble Lord referred — and I was glad to find approvingly — in his speech. We propose in new construction this year to spend £2,493,731. That exceeds, to a certain extent, the generally estimated cost of filling up the normal waste of the Navy. My Predecessor, in another place, spoke of it as roughly £2,300,000. There may be some difference of opinion upon that point. It may be put lower to some extent; but on the whole, I do not, from what I have heard, think it necessary to differ materially from that figure. At all events, for new construction, we exceed this year the sum estimated to represent the normal waste of the Navy. Therefore, I do not think we can be justly accused of having such a very meagre programme as the noble and gallant Lord has stated. We propose to build three battle-ships—one, the Renown, laid down by my Predecessor, and we propose to lay down two more battle-ships of the Royal Sovereign type in the Royal Dockyards. We propose to build three second-class cruisers and two sloops. We propose, moreover, to increase very considerably the number of torpedo-catchers, and we also propose at the end of the year to build two large cruisers, those large vessels all being built out at contract. My Lords, I have not much more to say. I am not prepared to promise a further programme. I adhere to what I stated on the last occasion when I spoke in your Lordships' House. I consider it absolutely necessary to look forward to the future; and that, you may be quite sure, the present Board will do—that they will frame their policy not simply with a view to the present, but to the future. I think there are many reasons why it was not desirable to have too long a programme. First of all, we were new to Office, and it would have been exceedingly wrong on our part to take any new line. We were content to carry on the programme which we found; and, no doubt, if we continue in Office it will be our duty to consider whether any larger programme would be needed. The proper time, it seems to me, for considering the question of a programme is when the Estimates are produced, and when a discussion is raised on the programme that is then put forward, with regard to the policy of construction which it is necessary for the country to know. No doubt other countries have longer programmes than for one year. France has such a programme, but France does not publish beforehand the exact programme which she intends to carry out for the next few years. I have very little doubt that the late Board had, as we have, a programme; but they did not publish what that programme should be for a series of years. I am quite aware that the Naval Defence Act was carried for a very special occasion when it was considered necessary to largely increase the strength of the Navy. An opportunity was then given of consulting Parliament for a considerable number of years ahead, and I think that was a different position of affairs to when you are merely keeping up the strength of the Navy to a given standard. I am unable, therefore, to say more than that I adhere to what I stated in the Paper which was circulated to the two Houses of Parliament, and what I explained on the previous occasion in this House. My noble Friend, Lord Sudeley, has put down a Motion which, no doubt, he expected me to answer; but I do not suppose he wishes to make a separate Motion of that question. With regard to what he says, I think it is very probable that before the late Government laid down the principles of the Naval Defence Act a proposal was made in accordance with what he suggests—that a statement was probably laid before the Government of the views of the Naval Lords of the Admiralty and of what they considered necessary to maintain the strength of the Navy. But it is manifestly impossible, even if I had the means, to lay such a Paper on the 'Table of your Lordships' House; and with regard to doing this in future, I think it is quite impossible for me to lay before the public any programme which may be made with regard to the future construction of ships for Her Majesty's Navy. I do not think it would be in the interests of the Navy or the country to do this, and therefore I am afraid I cannot agree to the doctrines which my noble Friend has laid down in the question he has placed on your Lordships' Paper. I thank your Lordships for listening to these remarks. I regret that I cannot, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, agree to the Motion of the noble and gallant Lord. There is much that he has said which meets with my sympathy and support; but I cannot go so far as to promise a further programme certainly at the present moment.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK desired to add his congratulations to those of the First Lord that the House had so able an authority as the noble and gallant Lord for the discussion of naval affairs. He did not intend to go back to the history of Admiralty, over which he had formerly had the honour to preside. He would only mention that the Board of his successor, Lord George Hamilton, continued to work on their programme for three or four years, and the only criticism to be made on that policy was a failure, rather, in laying down battle-ships. Therefore, he did not think that the policy of the Board to which the noble and gallant Lord belonged justified the criticisms he had made, after the lapse of eight years, on the policy of the previous Board. However, that was now an old story, and he quite agreed there should be no jealousy between different Boards of Admiralty—no question of Party or politics on one side or the other. What they all wished to do was to maintain the Navy in a state of efficiency, and ready for any service that might be required for it. He had always heartily supported the policy of Lord George Hamilton as First Lord, and was prepared now to support the spirit of the Motion of the noble and gallant Lord opposite in regard to the Naval Defence Act, though he presumed it would not be pressed to a Division. He understood that what his noble Friend (Earl Spencer) wished to do was to keep up the Navy in accordance with the policy of the late Government, and that he had distinctly given his opinion against opposing the Naval Defence Act. For his part, he regarded the Naval Defence Act as marking an economical and valuable change in the manner in which Naval construction had hitherto been carried on; and he trusted his noble Friend, if in his present Office next year, would reconsider his views, and would bring before his Colleagues arguments in support of that valuable policy. As regarded programmes, he agreed that it was not particularly advisable to advertise any grand scheme of Naval construction lasting over a great number of years. Opinions might change about the type of ships that were most desirable and necessary; and, besides, to advertise a great programme only tended to excite other nations to go and do likewise. He had of late years had so little opportunity of getting any practical knowledge of the present condition of the Navy and of the present programmes, that he would only be occupying their Lordships' time to no purpose by adding anything upon a subject which had been brought before the House so ably by the noble and gallant Lord opposite.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, as it fell to my lot—somewhat anomalously—to bring forward the Naval Defence Act, I merely wish to make one or two observations in reference to what we have heard. I think we all agree that the noble and gallant Lord has contributed a very valuable element to discussions in this House, and has performed a great public service in drawing attention to this question. I am inclined to agree with the noble Lord that programmes in themselves, considered abstractly, are not desirable. Programmes are remedies when there has been neglect; but a healthy Admiralty ought not to require them. On the other hand, I think such a speech as that of my noble Friend Lord Hood and the Motion which he has brought forward, backed as they are by solid professional knowledge, are exceedingly valuable; because unless the Admiralty is kept up by Parliamentary pressure to its duties, however virtuous, however angelic, Boards of Admiralty may be, I am sure they will fall short of the duty imposed upon them. One thing I should wish to say with regard to history. I think it is only fair to say that the first person who awoke Parliament and the country from the torpor into which we had fallen in respect to Naval construction was the noble Lord who has just sat down. It was Lord Northbrook's Administration undoubtedly, I perfectly well remember, which first called attention to the necessity of a new and better state of things. I earnestly hope that the initiative which the noble Lord commenced will not be dropped, and that the First Lord of the Admiralty will not allow himself to be deterred by any absurd Constitutional scruples from following the example which we set in the Naval Defence Act—I refer to the special point of avoiding paying back the balances which have once been voted. The advantage of the Naval Defence Act has been that a plan as a whole, when laid down, has been kept to, and not altered backwards and forwards according to the requirements of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in each succeeding year. Whatever Party is in power there is always a danger of that pressure which everybody must feel; and the practice of putting the design of a ship, if I might use the phrase, into an Act of Parliament, avoids one of the greatest dangers which our Constitutional system inflicts upon the Navy. I only wish to make this general observation, because I feel how out of place it would be for me to attempt to speak on professional matters. Perhaps my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty will allow me to make the remark as one who has been Foreign Secretary. In the course of his speech the First Lord stated that the Navy was necessary, not only for meeting other Navies, but for conducting a great deal of the business of the country in time of peace, for representing the country on many occasions in various parts of the world where the sense and sight of the power of this country were necessary. I believe that is a most important branch of the duties of the Navy, and it is not always sufficiently considered by our critics. They always seem to imagine that the one duty of the Navy is to fight battles of Trafalgar. It has a great deal to do besides fighting battles of Trafalgar; it is valuable in times of peace; it is a valuable aid to the diplomacy of the Foreign Office, especially when we are dealing with less civilised Powers. But what I want to press upon the First Lord is how that bears upon the question between big ships and smaller ones. I have no doubt that for fighting battles of Trafalgar the big ships are necessary; but they are not so valuable for conducting the ordinary business of the country. They cannot get into small harbours, and that is a very practical evil. We have got battle-ships of such size now that we cannot send them through the Suez Canal, and there are many harbours into which it would be exceedingly difficult for a sufficient English force to go; and on that ground I earnestly hope the noble Earl will not decide too resolutely against multiplying the smaller class of cruisers.

EARL SPENCER: Battle-ships I was speaking of, not cruisers.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : But in forming your Navy you must have a sufficient number of powerful cruisers which can be used on a coast and in small ports. I would also urge on the noble Earl to consider the old proverb about "putting all your eggs into one basket." I confess, when I see the extreme complication of a modern man-of-war, my feeling is that, when we do go to war, after the first naval action the ships of both Navies will return into dock and will remain there. Of course, it will add very much to the nervousness or caution of your Admirals in conducting their operations if they know that every ship they are commanding represents something more than £1,000,000. I have not been able by reading or listening to ascertain whether it is absolutely impossible to have small ships with very heavy armament and of speed equal to the larger ships. If it is not possible, if speed is solely and entirely the characteristic of large ships, there is an end of the question, because the quickest ship will win; but if you can have a small class of ship with a powerful armament and very high speed, I believe that that class of ship would do more for carrying on the business of the Empire, and be more valuable when the day of struggle comes, than the leviathans which will be only too likely to frighten with the sense of responsibility those to whose charge they are committed.

LORD SUDELEY said, there was one remark which had been made by the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Hood) upon which, with the permission of their Lordships, he would like to offer a few words of explanation. The noble Lord took exception to his reply to the Report on the Manœuvres not having been quoted. He had not the paper by him at the time, but had since obtained a copy from the Library, and found that he was quite correct in stating that whilst the noble Lord went very fully into details in his Memorandum he said very little as to the question of the efficiency of the Service generally, but what he did write was practically to confirm his evidence before the Committee of 1888—namely, that he was satisfied with the then present condition of things. These were the words of his own Report—

"And whilst at once admitting that our Naval Force is not of sufficient strength to perform efficiently the various services sketched out by the Committee, in the case of war with one maritime nation, I believe it is of sufficient strength to engage the forces of any single Maritime Power with success; to protect our coasts from the possibility of invasion, and to afford fair protection to our commerce abroad and good protection to our commerce in the Channel and its vicinity, and I am certain that by the end of next year the strength of our Navy will be very largely increased as compared with the advance which can be made by any other Maritime Power in the same time."

EARL SPENCER : I have already said it is impossible for me to agree to the Motion the noble and gallant Lord has made, and I trust he will not press it to a Division.

LORD HOOD OF AVALON said, he had no wish to press it.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ACT (1882) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 35.)

Returned from the Commons with the Amendments agreed to.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION FOR THE STANDING COMMITTEE.

Report from, that the Committee have added the Lord Tyrone (M. Waterford), the Lord Churchill, and the Lord Monckton (V. Galway) to the Standing Committee, for the consideration of the Barbed Wire Fences Bill; read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

METROPOLITAN COMMONS PROVISIONAL ORDER (BANSTEAD) BILL. (No. 51.)

Reported from the Select Committee with Amendments, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

OYSTER AND MUSSEL FISHERY PROVISIONAL ORDER CONFIRMATION BILL [H.L.].—(No. 63.)

Amendments reported (according to Order), and Bill to be read 3^a on Thursday next.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER (No. 2) BILL.—(No. 71.)

Read 3^a (according to Order), and passed.

MAGISTRATES (COUNTY OF LANCASTER).

Ordered to be laid before the House,

"Copy of the Memorandum made in the office of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in the year 1870 on the subject of the appointment of County Magistrates in that county, and of any Correspondence which has taken place between the Chancellor of the Duchy and the Lord Lieutenant of the county on that matter."—(The Viscount Cross.)

House adjourned at half-past Seven o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 16th May 1893.

QUESTIONS.

THE SUPREME LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL OF INDIA.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN (Banffshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State for India has received a Memorial adopted at a public meeting held at Nagpur on the 19th of April last, protesting against the exclusion of the Central Provinces from the right to recommend a Representative to the Supreme Legislative Council, under the Rules framed in accordance with Section 1 of "The Indian Councils Act, 1892"; and whether, having regard to the interests of the 10,000,000 inhabitants of the Central Provinces, and to the fact that all their laws are enacted by the Viceroy's Council, the Secretary of State will consider the desirability of granting to the Central Provinces the right to recommend at least one nominee to that Council, as has been granted to Provinces which have the advantage of Legislatures of their own?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL, North Beds.): The Secretary of State has seen the Memorial on the subject referred to by my hon. Friend, but it has not been received by him officially. The question of the best method of securing the representation on the Viceroy's Council of the Provinces which have no Legislatures of their own, was fully considered by the Government of India, who decided that simple nomination, guided by consultation with the persons best qualified to give advice, will be the best means of securing Representatives from them. This decision has been approved by the Secretary of State in Council.

THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY POLICE COURT.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether there is any Regulation in force in the Bombay Presidency which requires that the Chief Magistrate of the Presidency Police Court should be a practising barrister; and whether a Junior Magistrate of the same Court, being a barrister, is disqualified because he is debarred from practising by reason of his magisterial duties?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: No, Sir. The Secretary of State knows of no such Regulations as those to which my hon. Friend refers. It is obvious, therefore, that, so far as he is aware, no Junior Magistrate can be disqualified in the manner suggested.

THE RIVER CLWYD.

MR. WILLOX (Liverpool, Everton): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is now in a position to state what are the results of his communications with the person against whom complaint is made that he is dredging gravel in the River Clwyd, to the destruction of the natural barrier of the town of Rhyl; whether he is aware that these dredging operations are still being continued by the removal of gravel from the weakest part of the foreshore; and whether he will take immediate measures to stop the continuance of a practice which exposes Rhyl to danger from the inroads of the sea?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): The Rhuddlan Marsh Embankment Trustees have, I am advised, in pursuance of an Act passed in 1794, full power to dredge the River Clwyd and the Harbour of Foryd below Rhuddlan Bridge. The Chairman of those Trustees has acquired from the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods and Forests certain tidal lands, on which, it is stated, dredging operations are now being carried on by the person complained of. I am not aware that the town of Rhyl is exposed to damage by the operations now in progress. The Town Commissioners, with whom I have communicated, make no such complaint.

MR. WILLOX: Has the right hon. Gentleman seen a copy of the Town Surveyor's Report?

MR. MUNDELLA: I cannot call it to mind just now; and if the hon. Member wishes to put a question on it, perhaps he will place a Notice on the Paper.

JABEZ SPENCER BALFOUR.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is in a position to make any definite statement to the House with reference to the arrest and extradition of Jabez Spencer Balfour; whether it is true that the Argentine Republic have offered to give up Mr. Balfour if the British Government will agree to give up a person similarly accused for similar alleged offences or crimes; and whether the Government will consent to lay on the Table of this House the Papers and Correspondence relating to the negotiations upon this subject?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): The Argentine Government refuse to grant the extradition unless reciprocity is conceded. In the absence of the ratification of the Treaty signed in 1889, Her Majesty's Government are precluded by law from giving this reciprocity. It is hoped that the Argentine Congress may ratify the Treaty of 1889; and, under these circumstances, it does not seem advisable to lay any Papers at present.

STEAMSHIP COMMUNICATION BETWEEN CANADA AND AUSTRALIA.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the new steamship service between Australia and Canada via Honolulu has been brought to the notice of his Department; whether he has received any representations in this connection on behalf of the Canadian and Australian Governments; and whether, having regard to the utility and importance of this new link of communication between two great divisions of the Empire, he is in a position to give any assurance of Imperial recognition and support in conjunction with the Canadian and Australian Governments?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): An application was lately received by the Colonial Office, and by them communicated to the Admiralty, that the subvention for armed cruisers may be granted to the steamships in question. The application is now under consideration.

THE SECONDARY EDUCATION GRANT FOR SCOTLAND.

MR. MACFARLANE (Argyll): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he has now received the opinions of the County Committees on the subject of the allocation of the Secondary Education Grant; and whether, under the distribution proposed by the Minute, Glasgow would receive upwards of £11,000, and Orkney, Shetland, Sutherland, Caithness, Ross and Cromarty, Inverness, Argyll, and Bute together only £5,000?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): I have already laid before the House the replies of the County Committees in a Return moved by the hon. Member for Partick. In the Appendix to the Circular issued on 1st May, the amount payable to each county and burgh on the basis of population is shown. From that it appears that Glasgow would receive £8,011 16s. 9d., and the counties named would receive £5,377 4s. 11d.

MILITARY RATIONS.

MR. BEITH (Inverness, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is the generally understood practice that officers in charge of the commissariat departments of the various depôts and head-quarters of regiments at home should provide the necessary food and canteen supplies from the district which they respectively occupy, and not from distant or foreign sources, especially where the local articles are equal in quality and price to that which can be procured elsewhere?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): Rations of bread and meat for the troops are obtained under contracts entered into by public competition, and the rule is to accept the lowest offer received, provided the tender is in every respect satisfactory. It is not always possible to ascertain the locality from which the flour or animals are obtained. Canteen supplies are obtained regimentally under arrangements made by officers commanding, with which the War Office does not interfere.

THE "LABOUR GAZETTE."

★ MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in the new official publication, The Labour Gazette, it is his intention to confine the reports on labour questions and disputes to those received from correspondents representing only the workmen; or whether he will appoint similar representatives competent to furnish such information from the employers' point of view, so as to secure a complete review of the subject?

MR. MUNDELLA; If the right hon. Gentleman will turn to the Memorandum of the Labour Department circulated this morning, he will see that it is not the intention to confine reports in the manner suggested, and that arrangements have been made to receive and consider information supplied from Chambers of Commerce and Employers' Associations.

THE DUBLIN MAIN DRAINAGE SCHEME.

DR. KENNY (Dublin, College Green): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the delay in the production of the Report of the Army Sanitary Committee which met in Dublin on the 13th of April ultimo to inquire into and report on certain objections raised by the War Office Authorities against portions of the Dublin Main Drainage Scheme in connection with the precipitation tanks, is productive of much inconvenience and expense to the Dublin Corporation and of much disappointment to the working classes in Dublin, who are anxiously looking forward to the initiation of the proposed works for the employment so much needed; whether the said Army Sanitary Committee has met since the 13th April to consider their Report; and, if so, has their Report been yet presented; if not, can he state when it is likely to be presented; and whether he will take measures to expedite its production?

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): On the same subject, may I ask whether the War Office Authorities have yet received the Report, the absence of which is given as a cause for delaying the Dublin Main Drainage works; and whether he will endeavour to expedite this matter, as already promised, because favourable time is passing, and the employment is much needed?

MR. WILLIAM KENNY (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green): I also beg to ask if the Army Sanitary Committee, which held an inquiry in Dublin on the 13th April last, with reference to the proposed Dublin Main Drainage Scheme, have as yet made their Report; if he will state what is the cause of the delay; and, having regard to the fact that the present period of the year is regarded as the most convenient and desirable for the initiation of the projected works, if he will take steps to expedite the furnishing of the Report?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Army Sanitary Committee have had two meetings on the subject of the Dublin Main Drainage Scheme since their return from Dublin, besides various informal meetings and discussions. The Report has not yet been presented; but the Committee hope to be in a position to do so shortly, and of this the Corporation of Dublin have been officially informed within the last few days. The Committee thought it desirable to inspect and obtain information regarding certain sewage works in England which had been referred to by the Drainage Committee of the Dublin Corporation. This inquiry will be completed this week.

DR. KENNY; Seeing that it is a notorious fact that the works can only be carried on in very fine weather, will the right hon. Gentleman endeavour to expedite the Report, so that the work may be commenced in Dublin during the continuance of the present fine weather?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am anxious to expedite the matter in every possible way. I have stated the reasons for what I cannot say is an unreasonable delay.

DR. KENNY: May we hope to have the Report within a very brief period?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have said so.

RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES.

SIR JAMES WHITEHEAD (Leicester): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Railway Companies decline to give an analysis of their actual rates and charges when they are below the maximum; and whether the law gives them the right to do so; and, if not, whether he will undertake to proceed against them?

MR. MUNDELLA: Yes, Sir; I am aware that certain Railway Companies decline to give an analysis of their actual rates and charges when they are below the maximum. The Board of Trade considered this matter so important that they took the opinion of counsel upon it; and they are advised that—

"Upon a proper application being made under Sub-section 3 of Section 33 of the Act of 1888 the company are bound to dissect the actual charge made, on the ground that the sub-section applies not only to a maximum rate, but also to the charge made or claimed."

The Board of Trade are advised that the language of Section 33 implies that the person whose private right is infringed by a company's refusal is the person to proceed under Sub-section 7. This question, however, is receiving further consideration, and is one which will be brought under the notice of the Select Committee which we are anxious to appoint.

SIR J. WHITEHEAD: Do not the Board of Trade consider it their duty to take proceedings under the circumstances?

MR. MUNDELLA: I have stated the actual advice given by counsel on the matter. It now becomes a question for the consideration of the Committee.

MR. FIELD: And we shall have no chance of getting an early reduction of the rates?

MR. MUNDELLA: It is not a question of the reduction of rates; it is a question of the splitting up of rates. Traders have the remedy in their own hands.

MR. FIELD: These things are so involved that it is quite impossible to understand them.

WEIGHING CATTLE.

MR. WHARTON (York, W.R., Ripon): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he will consider the propriety of introducing a short Bill defining a suitable machine for the weighing of cattle, within the meaning of the Acts of 1887 and 1889?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden): Under the Markets and Fairs (Weighing of Cattle) Act, 1891, Market Authorities are required, unless specially exempted, to provide and maintain to the satisfaction of the Board of Agriculture sufficient and suitable accommodation for weighing cattle. Under the law as it stands, the Board are enabled to take into account the particular circumstances of each particular market in giving effect to the requirements of the Statute; and my impression is that any attempt to lay down any statutory rule as to what would in all cases constitute sufficiency or suitability would impede rather than advance the practice of buying and selling by live weight.

THE SEAFORTH HIGHLANDERS.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will give effect to the resolution of the Ross and Cromarty County Council, and other resolutions passed at meetings in various parts of Ross-shire, in favour of the annual assembling and drilling of the 3rd Battalion Seaforth Highlanders (Ross and Cromarty Militia) at Dingwall; and also of the appointment of the depôt of the Ross-shire Buffs at the same place?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: This battalion is mainly composed of fishermen, and, at the special request of the Commanding Officer and Military Authorities in Scotland, is always trained in the winter. It would be impossible to place the battalion under canvas at that time of year, and there is not sufficient billet accommodation in the town of Dingwall. The question of transferring the depôt of the Ross-shire Buffs to Dingwall was fully considered some time ago, and the change was judged to be inexpedient, mainly owing to the great expense that would be incurred in providing barrack accommodation.

TOTTENHAM FEVER HOSPITAL.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will withhold his sanction to the establishment of a permanent Fever Hospital in St. Anne's Road, Tottenham, until the Metropolitan Asylums Board have made bonâ fide efforts to obtain an alternative site?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): The matter is now under the consideration of the Local Government Board. It will have the most careful attention, and a decision will be arrived at as soon as possible.

ARMY MEDICAL SERVICE EXAMINERS.

DR. KENNY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has received a Memorial from the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland, dated 25th April, on the subject of the recent change in the mode of selecting Examiners for the Army Medical Service; whether it is correct, as therein stated, that the War Department or any branch thereof has given undertakings to the Royal College of Surgeons of England and to the Royal College of Physicians, London, that the selection of Examiners for the competitive examinations for admissions to the Army Medical Service shall in future be confined exclusively to past or present Examiners of those Colleges; whether it is also true, as stated in said Memorial, that out of a total of 891 officers constituting the Army Medical Staff, 429, or nearly one-half, hold Irish qualifications; and whether he will take into consideration the prayer of said Memorial that the War Department should constitute its Examining Board of Examiners selected in fair proportion from the teaching centres of the Three Kingdoms?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes, Sir; the Memorial from the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland, dated April 25, on the subject of the recent change in the mode of selecting Examiners for the Army Medical Service has been received. The statement in that Memorial of the number of officers of the Army Medical Staff who have Irish qualifications is approximately true, the number being 380 out of a total number of 857. It is not the case that any undertaking has been given to the Royal Colleges in London restricting the appointment of Examiners to those who have been Examiners to those Colleges; but it was announced to be the present intention to appoint Examiners from that list. As I before explained, the appointment, for reasons of efficiency, will now be only for four years; and on vacancies occurring it will be quite open to the Secretary of State to consider whether he should appoint the new Examiners from among gentlemen with a similar guarantee of competency from the Scotch and Irish schools. I may say, however, that Examiners from the English schools have been employed for the last 35 years without any grievance being alleged; and from the numbers quoted it would not appear that Irish candidates have been unfairly excluded.

DR. KENNY: As to the last part of the answer, is it not a fact that they were permanent Examiners totally disconnected from any Licensing Bodies. The point of my question is that, inasmuch as the Examiners are now being selected from Teaching Bodies, it will necessarily induce the students to go to those Teaching Bodies to the detriment of the Irish and Scotch schools?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have already said it will be open to the Secretary of State to consider applications from Examiners connected with those schools.

DR. KENNY: And in the meantime the mischief is being done.

MR. CARSON (Dublin University): What is the percentage of Irish candidates as compared with the candidates from England?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I cannot say.

BOYCOTTING AT KILLAVULLEN.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the report of a meeting held at Killavullen on the 7th instant, at which Thomas Barry, a Poor Law Guardian, publicly stated that the two persons whom he recently denounced as having signed a Petition against the Government of Ireland Bill, and whose house was subsequently burned, were his own personal opponents; whether Barry has been already twice convicted, once for being drunk and disorderly, and once for systematic and organised boycotting; whether Barry, at the meeting referred to, invited the ratepayers of the diserict to contest, inch by inch, and to the end, the claim of the persons whose house had been burned, to any compensation; and whether it is proposed to take any steps to stop any further persecution of the two persons who have been denounced by Barry?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I have seen a newspaper report of the statements contained in the first and third paragraphs. The question whether the burning was malicious or otherwise will be one for consideration at Presentment Sessions; and, the matter being thus sub judice, it is obviously inconvenient to discuss it in this House. As regards the fourth paragraph, the local Police Authorities will take such steps as they may deem necessary.

MR. CARSON: Did not Barry denounce these persons for signing Petitions against the Home Rule Bill?

MR. J. MORLEY: I said I had seen the newspaper report.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: I did not catch the words of the right hon. Gentleman. May I ask whether he answered that portion of the question in which I inquired whether Barry had been twice convicted?

MR. J. MORLEY: I did not answer that portion of the question, because I conceived that whether the man was convicted or not has nothing to do with the matter. It is rather unfair, on putting a question on another matter, to refer back to bad antecedents, if bad antecedents there be.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: But may I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is not aware that one of the previous convictions was for a precisely similar offence to that now alleged—namely, boycotting and persecution of innocent persons?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am not aware, from the reports I have seen, that the present is a case of organised boycotting.

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork): Were Barry's convictions under the Coercion Act?

MR. J. MORLEY: I cannot say.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.E.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that one of the convictions was under the disinterred Statute of Edward III.?

[No answer was given.]

SWAZILAND.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS (Liverpool, East Toxteth): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Transvaal Government, in accordance with the conditions of Clause 9 of the Convention of 1890, gave notice on or before the 8th of this month of their intention to withdraw from that Convention on 8th August; and whether he will now state whether any and, if so, what agreement has been arrived at by Sir Henry Loch and President Krüger relative to the future of Swaziland, and will he present Papers on the subject?

MR. S. BUXTON: The Government of the South African Republic have, in accordance with Article 21, given notice of the termination of the Convention of 1890. Certain bases of future negotiation were discussed at the Conference between Sir Henry Loch and President Krüger, and we believe that a satisfactory arrangement will be arrived at. I am afraid I cannot at the present moment say more in reference to the actual bases of agreement than I stated in my speech in Committee on the 4th instant; and I would refer the right hon. Gentleman to the Hansard report of my speech. I will give further information on the subject, and lay Papers at the earliest possible moment that this can be done without detriment to the Public Service.

IRISH DISTRICT LUNATIC ASYLUMS.

DR. KENNY : I wish to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland a question of which I have given him private notice. It is whether, in regard to the abolition of visiting Medical Officers to district lunatic asylums, he will make further inquiry, with a view to either the modification or abolition of the new Rule ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I will make further inquiry.

IRISH BUTTER RAILWAY RATES.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Great Southern and Western Railway Company are charging 4d. per firkin more than last year for single firkins sent from Ennis to Cork and intervening stations ?

MR. MUNDELLA : I communicated with the Company on the 12th, and have not yet received their reply. Perhaps the hon. Member will repeat his question later.

THE HANSARD UNION PROSECUTION.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR (Leeds, Central) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state what is the total of the costs, charges, and expenses incurred in the recent prosecution of Sir Henry Isaacs, Mr. Horatio Bottomley, and others, in connection with the affairs of the Company known as the Hansard Publishing Union, Limited ; also the amount of the costs, charges, and expenses of the public examination of the Directors and Officers of the said Company ; and, out of what Vote such costs, charges, and expenses will be paid ?

MR. MUNDELLA : The cost of the public examination of the Directors and Officers of the Company which will, in the absence of any assets in the liquidation, fall upon the Vote of the Board of Trade, amounts to £90 12s. 7d. The Board of Trade have no knowledge of the costs, charges, and expenses incurred in the prosecution referred to, which was instituted and conducted by the Director of Public Prosecutions.

GUERNSEY.

MR. CHARLES ROUNDELL (York, W.R., Skipton) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether representations have reached him from the inhabitants of Guernsey, Jersey, and Sark as to their grievances in the administration under the feudal constitution of these Islands ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.) : No such representations have been received.

DERBY DAY.

LORD STANLEY (Lancashire, S.E., Westhoughton) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the fact that last year the number of Members attending on Derby Day was insufficient to form a House, he will consider the advisability of prolonging the Whitsuntide Holidays till Thursday, 1st June ?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian) : I think the feeling of the House is that the proposal we intend to make is a very moderate one, and the holiday as long as it should be under the circumstances. We shall certainly do our best to make a House on Derby Day.

THE GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

MR. COCHRANE (Ayrshire, N.) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the postponement of the Committee stage of the Financial Clauses of the Government of Ireland Bill, and the consequent impossibility of an early discussion on the subject of the financial relations of England, Scotland, and Ireland, the Government will now consent to the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the financial relations of Scotland to the Imperial Exchequer ?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I am sorry to say that I cannot undertake to promise the appointment of the Committee referred to in the question.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, in view of the fact that the amount that may still be advanced for the purchase of land in Ireland to enable tenants to buy their holdings under "The Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891," exceeds £33,000,000, whether, if the Government of Ireland Bill becomes law, this amount is to be advanced if applied for; and, if so, on what security, and also out of what funds the money is to be obtained, and whether from taxation or loan from the taxpayers in the United Kingdom, or is it to be limited to taxpayers in Ireland only?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It is the intention of the Government that all proceedings under the Land Purchase Act shall go on as before, and that the Home Rule Bill shall not interfere with them in any way. Full information as to the way in which the intentions will be carried out will be given when the Government move their Amendments, which are necessary for that purpose. The hon. Member seems to think that advances under the Act are made in cash drawn from the taxpayers of the United Kingdom. But there is no question of taxpayers at all unless the Guarantee Fund should fail, and at present there is no reason to believe that that fund will fail.

*MR. BARTLEY: But is not the Guarantee Fund now really allocated for other purposes?

[No answer was given.]

TRADE DISPUTES.

MR. CAYZER (Barrow-in-Furness): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government will give facilities for obtaining the Second Reading of the various Bills now before the House relating to the establishment of Boards of Arbitration and Conciliation in trade disputes, in order that they may be referred to the Standing Committee on Trade or otherwise considered, with a view to providing means for settling trade disputes?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The President of the Board of Trade has stated that he is disposed to refer his Bill to the Grand Committee on Trade as suggested in the question, and that he is perfectly willing that in the rear of his Bill all the other Private Bills on the same subject introduced by independent Members should also be referred to that Committee. But we are not prepared to allow time for discussion on such a Motion while we have still more important business.

MR. CAYZER: Then are we to understand that all these questions, which are so important to the industrial classes, are to be shelved until the Home Rule Bill has been got rid of?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I consider it would be very much indeed to the interests of the working classes of this country if means of persuasion could be used to remove the impediments in this case.

THE SCOTCH DISESTABLISHMENT QUESTION.

MR. ANSTRUTHER (St. Andrews, &c.): I beg to ask the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow if, in view of the meeting this week of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, he can hold out any hope that the Bill he introduced last week on the Disestablishment Question will be printed and circulated before the adjournment?

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I hope to receive the final revise from the printers to-night, and to be able at once to authorise the printing and circulation of the Bill.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): May I ask whether, as Supply is to be taken on the first day after the holidays, the Supply to be taken will be ordinary Supply, or in the form of a Vote on Account?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It will be necessary to take a Vote on Account as part of the business of the evening.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): What will be the business on Tuesday.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It is our intention to take the Home Rule Bill on that day.

ARMENIA.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he is correctly reported by The Daily News of Saturday last to have said, on the occasion of his receiving a handsome silver cup and inkstand from the Armenians of England and France, that Great Britain ought to continue to point out to the Turkish Government the dangers which would subsist and even increase so long as the reforms promised with respect to Armenia in 1878 were not carried out; and whether Her Majesty's Government have so continued to point out the alleged dangers in question?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): The report referred to appears to be substantially correct. I have no doubt that every British Government will continue to point out whenever a suitable opportunity presents itself, as I believe every British Government since 1878 has pointed out, the dangers involved in the failure to carry out the reforms promised in 1878 for the Armenians.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the second paragraph?

*MR. BRYCE: I have answered it; the answer is, that the statement in the report refers to "Great Britain," and that I trust Great Britain will always so act.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: The right hon. Gentleman is a Member of the Cabinet. He must know.

*MR. BRYCE: If the hon. Member will refer to the terms of his question, he will see that I have answered him. The report of my remarks did not refer to the present Cabinet in particular, but to Great Britain. I have said I trust that Great Britain will continue to make these representations.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

(No. 209.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 15th May.]

[SEVENTH NIGHT.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Legislative Authority.

Clause 2 (Powers of Irish Legislature).

MR. MACFARLANE (Argyll): I rise to a point of Order. I wish to know whether, if an hon. Member who has put an Amendment upon the Paper, and either is absent when called upon to move it or does not wish to move it, it is open to any other hon. Member to move such Amendment? In that case I wish to know why the hon. Member for the Harbour Division of Dublin was prevented from moving the Amendment he proposed to move yesterday?

THE CHAIRMAN: I cannot answer abstract questions of this kind, but am prepared to rule on matters as they arise. Had this question been put yesterday I would have replied to it. With regard to the Amendments that stand upon the Paper, in my opinion the subject-matter of the first, in the name of the hon. Member for the Guildford Division of Surrey; and the second, in the name of the hon. Member for North Islington, could be better discussed on the Amendment in the name of the right hon. and learned Member for Bury.

MR. BARTLEY: That being your ruling, Sir, I do not desire to press my Amendment to the prejudice of that in the name of the right hon. and learned Member for Bury.

MR. BRODRICK (Surrey, Guildford) said, the Amendment which he had to propose—the second in his name on the Paper—had for its object to insure the practical retention by the Imperial Parliament of the power of restraining at any moment the undue exercise of the powers granted to the Irish Legislature. As regarded legislation, of course, they had the veto of the Crown, which could exercise a restraining influence; but as the Bill stood there was no power to which effect could be given reserved to the Imperial Parliament to restrain the action of the Irish Executive. It might be urged that what was given by Statute could be restrained by Statute, but exceptional circumstances demanded exceptional remedies; they were bound to look not only on the theoretical side of the case, but also on what was likely to be the practical effect, and they ought to reserve to the Imperial Parliament powers far in excess of those reserved in the case of the Colonial Legislatures. Look at the number of subjects which they intended to prevent the Irish Parliament dealing with. There was, for instance, a distinct reservation under Section 3 which prohibited the Irish Government from making Treaties with

Mr. Gibson Bowles

Foreign Powers ; but there were many cases independently of making Treaties in regard to which the Irish Government might be brought into contact with Foreign Powers. By way of illustration, he would suppose that the Irish Government decided that Germans should be excluded from Ireland from a given day. Such a proceeding might be a source of complaint against the Imperial Government on the part of Germany. The German Ambassador would approach Lord Rosebery ; and although Lord Rosebery might reply that his Government regretted the action of the Irish Government, his power over the latter would be nil, and the Irish Government might be expected to stand their ground notwithstanding any representations he might make or any advice he might tender. Where, then, was the supreme power ? He would take another case which was absolutely certain to arise. Under this Bill, the Government reserved the whole question of the land for a period of three years. No doubt this was done with a bonâ fide desire to settle the question. But let them bear in mind that this subject had been under the doctor's knife 23 years, and then they would see that the Prime Minister was over-sanguine if he thought he was going to settle it within three years. If this Bill passed in 1893, the Land Question would have to be settled before 1897, and, if this were not accomplished, a Bill would have to be brought in to extend the time. Under such circumstances, he would have thought that any Ministry would consider that an Address to the Crown by both Houses limiting the time to a further period of three or five or seven years would be a better mode to adopt than by bringing in a Bill for the purpose and occupying the time of the House in discussing it. He believed that not one in ten Members opposite would vote for this Bill, unless they thought that it would clear this Parliament of Irish affairs. They all hoped that if the Bill passed—and their great hope was that it would never pass—it would be a final measure. But what hope of finality was there in this Bill ? The Land Bill of 1881—which was to finally settle the question—had been amended four times in important particulars, and it was obvious that many causes for intervention, now unforeseen, would arise, and have to be dealt with in supplementary legislation. The new Parliament would be able to legislate for Ulster. They might desire to legislate in a satisfactory manner ; but they would then have a Catholic Parliament legislating for Protestants—a Parliament elected by the poorer class of farmers legislating for capitalists ; and he would be a bold man who would say that the legislation in Dublin would be satisfactory to Ulster. Supposing that legislation were passed by the Parliament in Dublin, affecting Ulster in such a way as to cause riots in Belfast, it would be a long time before the feelings thus aroused could be set at rest. The only possible means which could be effectively applied would be to interfere at once by summary process ; but no summary process was provided in the Bill. They were thought to be unduly inclined to attribute evil motives to hon. Members from Ireland ; but, without attributing evil motives to them, it might fairly be said that, with the exception of the hon. Member for South Longford, those hon. Members had no experience whatever of legislative authority or constructive statesmanship. They were, therefore, sure to make mistakes at the outset, and mistakes would be very dangerous in the present condition of Ireland. The Solicitor General, when appealed to last night by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, would not deny that the supremacy of this Parliament over Ireland rested upon Statute ; and it therefore came to this : that questions of supremacy would have to be interpreted by judicial authorities. That which had been given by Statute could be also taken away by Statute.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar) : No.

MR. BRODRICK, continuing, said the hon. and learned Gentleman told them that it was a statutory authority derived from the Act of Union. Well, he himself was not a lawyer, and he must leave it to lawyers to discuss the point with the Solicitor General. The supremacy, from the Opposition point of view, was being watered down by the Government from day to day. The Home Secretary assured them that he would have no objection whatever to the insertion of certain words in the body of the Bill, and the Opposition desired to see the supremacy put into a practical form. They did not want this already overburdened Parliament to be constantly discussing Irish affairs if this Bill were passed. It was for these reasons that he suggested by his Amendment the most practical and ready form of meeting the difficulties which would hereafter arise.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 18, at the end of the Clause to add the words—"But it shall be lawful for Her Majesty, upon the Address of both Houses of the Imperial Parliament, to diminish or restrain the whole or any part of the powers herein granted to the Irish Legislature."—(Mr. Brodrick.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : The hon. Member's speech was evidently prepared for delivery on another Amendment, for it certainly was not directed to the Amendment which he proposed, and I will not, therefore, follow him through it. So far as I am able to judge from the tone and terms of his speech, there exist no substantial difference between the hon. Member and the Government except our expressed disinclination to put into the Act itself what is already contained in the Preamble. So far as restricting the Executive action of the Irish Government is concerned, there is not the smallest necessity for the Amendment, because the Executive action of the Irish Government will be restrained by the Viceroy in respect of all its decisions and actions, just as the Executive action of the British Government is restrained by the intervention of the Sovereign. The Bill does not propose to invest the Executive Council, of which it contemplates the creation, with governing powers. I am not conscious of any ground upon which the existing machinery will be found to be insufficient. The hon. Gentleman did not accurately represent the scope of his Amendment. His Amendment deals with the exceptional powers to be conferred by the Bill. Executive powers are not given by this Act, but I am very doubtful whether any Executive power would fall within the scope of the Amendment. But what might plainly be within the scope of the Amendment, and what is the object of the Amendment, is that the whole of the legislative powers given by this Act would be liable to be revoked upon an Address from both Houses of Parliament.

Mr. Brodrick

The Government cannot, of course, concede that the House should spend months and months upon the discussion of this Bill and upon the construction of a system of government for Ireland, and that then it should be possible for a single vote of each House to abolish it at will. That would be a proceeding absolutely without precedent ; it is entirely contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, and it is entirely contrary to the usages of common sense. The House never could be disposed favourably to entertain such a proposition, and it is one which it is totally impossible for the Government under any consideration to entertain. The hon. Gentleman appeared to think that the Imperial Parliament would not be able to restrain the Irish Government from interfering with the arrival and landing of German immigrants in Ireland.

MR. BRODRICK : Foreign immigrants.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : The hon. Member will recollect that during the present Session a Debate was raised in this House in the interest of the protection of native labour for the purpose of promoting legislation in restraint, if not of the importation, yet of the existence and employment of foreign immigrants in this country. [Hon. MEMBERS : Paupers.] The Debate did not turn upon paupers at all, because it was expressly for the purpose of getting rid of persons who were employed ; and, so far as it turned upon paupers, it was declared that the Motion considered as paupers those who were actually in employment, and who would be paupers if they were not employed. Any attempt to restrain the importation of immigrants from abroad would be a question affecting the law of navigation, which would be excluded from the purview of the Irish Parliament. Such a proposal would involve negotiations with all the Powers with which we had Treaties, and that would be a strictly Imperial concern. It would be the absolute duty of the Viceroy to refuse compliance in any action of that kind. The hon. Gentleman said a difficulty would be created owing to the fact that there would be no Minister responsible in this House for Irish affairs. That is not a matter which requires notice in the Bill. There is no provision in any Act of Parliament making a Minister responsible to the House of Commons for anything, but the House of Commons has no difficulty in bringing home responsibility to Ministers by the simple expedient of turning them out of Office. Let the hon. Gentleman bear in mind, first of all, that the Viceroy will be an Imperial officer, and therefore susceptible to the action of this House if the House chooses to interfere.

MR. BRODRICK: Will the Viceroy be a Member of the Cabinet?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: There is nothing to prevent his being a Member of the Cabinet; but responsibility is not limited to Members of the Cabinet. They can turn out anybody else who is not a Member of the Cabinet just as well as they can turn out a Member of the Cabinet; and when they do choose, in the exercise of their discretion, to turn out a Cabinet, the hon. Gentleman knows from his own personal experience that the other Members of the Government are also turned out. The fact is this—and I say here what I have said elsewhere again and again—if this Bill were criticised by the Irish Nationalists in the same manner and the same spirit as it is criticised by its present opponents, I should not know how to answer them. Such are the securities and safeguards taken in this Bill for the action of the Imperial Parliament, and for an entire reservation of every power necessary for the government of the Empire, that, in my opinion, if these captious objections were taken by the Irish Nationalists, I should not know how to answer them. There is no principle by which you can handle a Bill of this kind except that of reasonable trust in those who are to work it, and avoidance of the preliminary presumption that seems to be at the bottom of every suggestion that has been made, that, wherever power is given to other than Irishmen it will be reasonably used, but where it is given to Irishmen it will be unreasonably used. What is there to prevent the House of Commons from interfering to procure the dismissal of the Viceroy or from stopping the Royal Assent to a Bill which is altogether unreasonable? The hon. Gentleman said there would be great difficulties in finding fit persons in Ireland to carry on the work of government, because the Irish had had no practice in the work. I have seen a good deal of the action of Irish Members. I am not speaking of purely political action, but of practical action. I recollect, for instance, one of the most complicated Bills ever passed through Parliament—the Land Bill of 1881—and I am able to say that of the few Members who mastered the complicated details of that measure there were certain of the Irish Members who had the most complete mastery of it, whereas I do not think I found one or two Englishmen who understood its machinery. The right hon. Gentleman who was formerly Chief Secretary for Ireland, I think, would also say that he had not found in those gentlemen any incapacity for such work. Where, then, is the difficulty? I have often known the wretched plea set up that because they had had no practice, the people of a country were not fit for free Institutions. Free Institutions carry with them their own education. In the case of Ireland, I rejoice to say that, notwithstanding the lamentable degree to which Irish personal action has been excluded from the work of government, the atmosphere of that House and the duties of Members have constituted those who sat on the Benches below the Gangway opposite perfectly competent for the discharge of the duties which will accrue to them under this Bill. I make no complaint of the tone of the hon. Member's speech, and consider that he was perfectly entitled to raise this question. I believe the hon. Gentleman has acted in perfect and absolute good faith; but it would be unprecedented, un-Constitutional, impolitic, and most unreasonable that the powers conferred by the Bill should be made revocable by the sudden and momentary action of a Resolution passed through by the Houses of Parliament.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman has made an appeal to me with regard to the political capacity of the Representatives from Ireland, and certainly I am the last person in this House to dissent from the account which he has given of their capacity for Parliamentary debate, their mastery of difficult details of highly technical Bills, and their power of dealing in a free Assembly with all the points that arise on discussions of great questions of policy. Undoubtedly many of the hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway have shown the very highest qualifications described by the right hon. Gentleman, and certainly neither I nor my hon. Friends never intended to impute want of capacity to the Members who so ably represent the Nationalist Party in this House. But this is really not a question of capacity, nor is it a question of character. Two distinct points have been raised—one referring to the Irish Executive and the other to the Irish Legislature. The right hon. Gentleman stated to my very great surprise that the Bill did not create an Executive in Ireland.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : What I said was that it did not confer Executive powers. Unquestionably, it creates an Executive in appointing the Council of the Viceroy.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : My mind is not always subtle enough to follow the right hon. Gentleman in his distinctions. But I quite accept what I now understand him to have said, that the Bill did not create Executive powers, which being an abstraction could hardly be created, but that it did create the machinery by which the powers are to be carried into effect. That is the creation of an Executive, and the point we have to discuss is not whether the Executive is going to be composed of wise men or of foolish men, of good men or of bad men, but whether, when you have created this Executive if you leave it wholly uncontrolled by the Imperial Parliament, it might not perform acts in Ireland by which the Imperial Government might be very seriously embarrassed. I believe it will be found that in certain cases the separate States of America have done things which have very seriously embarrassed the Central Government at Washington ; and all the consolation the Central Government could give to foreign countries which have felt themselves aggrieved by the action of the State Legislatures was to say they were very sorry, but that the Constitution of the United States prevented them from exercising any jurisdiction over the State Legislatures in the matter. The right hon. Gentleman is, of course, aware of these dangers, and he thinks they could be met by the fact that the Viceroy could be dismissed by a vote in the House of Commons. It is, no doubt, possible by the elaborate machinery of a Vote of Censure to get rid of a Viceroy ; and as it is possible to get rid of him, it might, to a certain extent, be possible to control his actions. But I deny that in all cases the Viceroy would have the power of controlling the Executive machinery. The Viceroy might have the very best will in the world to carry out the wishes and maintain the interests of the Imperial Parliament as distinguished from the Irish Legislature, but under the Bill you give him practically no power. The power rests with the Executive Council, with whose action there is nothing in the Bill which enables you in any way to interfere. Therefore, it is highly desirable that either in this clause or at some later stage of the Bill we should provide adequate machinery by which the vagaries, errors, or crimes—if vagaries, errors, or crimes there are—of the Executive Council might be restrained. I admit that the Amendment does not touch the question in an effectual manner, because, reading the words in their most natural sense, they deal with the powers not of the Irish Executive, but with the powers of the Irish Legislature. I now come to the second question raised, which is, whether it is possible or desirable to restrain the action of the Irish Legislature, and, if so, how far the Amendment effects that object. That the Irish Legislature may pass laws inflicting great injustice and great hardship has really been admitted. The very fact that three years, however inadequate a term that may be, are even by the Government themselves required to elapse before one great class of domestic legislation is touched, is sufficient proof that in their opinion it is not impossible that the Irish Legislature might use its powers in a manner which the Government themselves would very greatly regret. But there is force in what the right hon. Gentleman said with regard to the particular means of meeting the danger which my hon. Friend has proposed. My hon. Friend proposes that, in whole or in part, Amendments to a Bill passed by the Irish Legislature shall be introduced not by a fresh Bill, but by a Resolution passed in the House of Commons and in the House of Lords. I admit that that is a very great innovation, and to discover whether it is justifiable we must wait till we know what is to be done with the Irish Members in this House. This is another example of the extraordinary embarrassment in which we are placed by the total ignorance in which we stand as to the Resolution of the Government with regard to the presence or absence of the Irish Members. If it is the intention of the Government to revert to their plan of 1886, and exclude the Irish Members—a plan accepted by all the Irish Members at the time—then the suggestion of my hon. Friend would certainly be wholly unnecessary. The action of this House would not be in all probability impeded by the proceedings of a powerful and a united body of gentlemen absolutely determined that no change should occur, and, if any change were requisite, no doubt it could be effected without any very undue control. But suppose it became clear that, unless some restraint in regard to particular matters was imposed upon the Irish Legislature, great injustice was likely to occur, then the concentrated and uncompromising opposition of 80 gentlemen representing Nationalist opinions might undoubtedly have the effect of preventing the Imperial Legislature from taking any action whatever in restraining the Irish Legislature until the time for action was passed. Therefore, Sir, I say I cannot pronounce an opinion upon the expediency of my hon. Friend's suggestion until the Government vouchsafe to tell the Committee how they mean to deal with Clause 9, and I think it might be worth while to defer a final decision on the point to a later stage of the Bill, when it can be raised with far more effect and with far more complete knowledge of its necessity and its bearing. But at the present time we are kept by the Government in darkness so complete and absolute as to be unable to judge how far it is expedient or inexpedient to adopt the suggestion of my hon. Friend.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) had listened to the speech of the Prime Minister with a good deal of astonishment. Last night the right hon. Gentleman described an Amendment as ludicrous, and that night he had described the Amendment now under discussion as captious.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I did not use the expression.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, then he, in common with many hon. Members of the House, was really incapable of understanding the plain meaning of the English language. The right hon. Gentleman was not unintelligible if he was heard; but not infrequently hon. Members found great difficulty in hearing him; and perhaps it was for that reason that he had made a mistake. But what was the real point here? The real position of the Government was this. They looked at the future of the Irish Parliament with perfect confidence. They (the Unionists) did not. The Government were prepared to trust hon. Members opposite. They (the Unionists) were not. [AN hon. MEMBER: Why?] Why? Because of the record of these men; because of the lives they had led during the last 13 years, of the iniquities they had been guilty of, of the cruelties they had perpetrated, and of the dishonesty that they had openly avowed. A Government that was prepared to take these men on trust and to have perfect confidence in them had no right to object to those who did not trust them and had no confidence in them trying to obtain all the securities and safeguards they could get. The real point of difference was this—and he would deal with the matter not from an Executive standpoint, but from the standpoint of the Legislature. Let them assume that this Irish Legislative Assembly passed an oppressive Statute, what was to be the course of procedure in that House in regard to it? He should be told by hon. Members above the Gangway that the Imperial Parliament did not part with its power to set matters right if they were put wrong. Yes; but what chance would the Imperial Parliament have in reference to an oppressive Statute to put it right? Look at the situation that would be created under the Bill if a Statute were passed that the majority of that House considered oppressive! They had got 80 Irish Members, first of all, hanging on their flank to deal with; and what was more certain than that one Party would make terms with the 80 outside and bring them in, and the position of the Imperial Parliament in endeavouring to right the wrong done in Ireland would be almost intolerable? What was suggested by the Amendment was that, instead of going through all this difficulty and facing this uncertainty, it should be possible by an Address of both Houses of Parliament promptly to apply such remedy as Parliament might think necessary. He did not think that was captious criticism of the Bill at all, and those who were concerned for the loyal minority in Ireland had a right to see that these safeguards were made real and should not be shams.

MR. BLAKE (Longford, S.) said, the hon. Member for South Tyrone suggested that there would be a practical impossibility of redressing wrongs and remedying gross abuses of the powers entrusted to the Irish Legislature by the normal action of the Imperial Parliament if this Bill should pass, because there would be a solid body of 80 Irish Members who would dominate the situation. No one knew better than the hon. Member that out of the 80 Members there would be 20, at any rate, on the side of the oppressed.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: No; there will not. Look at your own Schedule.

MR. BLAKE believed there would be 20; but, at any rate, there would be some; therefore, the statement of the hon. Member was not correct. If they took 20 from the 80 Members that would leave 60, and take 20 from 60 that gave a net of 40 on the side of wrong and injustice, which was to overbear the sense of right and justice of that House. If this Bill, giving a Constitution to Ireland, was to proceed as it was proceeding, and to pass through that House in spite of the firm and uncompromising opposition of more than 300 Members, he wanted to know what the danger would be which was to prevent a Bill redressing palpable wrong and injustice passing through that House, though there were 40 Members presumably on the side of wrong and injustice? When Irishmen were content to accept the situation which put their Constitution—their permanent Charter—at the mercy, so to speak (although he preferred to say the sense of justice) of that House—when they were content to leave every Act of theirs to be subjected to the possible action of that House in future, when they would have only 40 or thereabouts to speak for Ireland according to his computation, was it not enough without suggesting that they, who were painfully building up that Constitution by the ordinary process and with the ordinary securities of Parliament against a compact Opposition of more than 300 Members, were not to have the benefit of the same Parliamentary securities which hon. Members were now using so extensively and unflinchingly to prevent the construction of a Constitution, and that they were not entitled to use these same securities to the extent that 40 might use them in preserving unimpaired and in presenting their view with reference to subsequent Acts which might be impugned in that House? Irishmen acknowledged the right of the Imperial Parliament to interfere. They acknowledged that by a Bill any Act of theirs might be undone in England; but they contended that they were entitled to insist upon it that their Acts should only be interfered with by a Bill.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.) said, the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken when he suggested that anything might be overt or wrong in the operations of the Executive of the Irish Government—if it ever got one—

MR. BLAKE: I did not say one word about the Executive; the clause does not, and the Amendment does not.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS thought they were speaking to an Amendment which concerned the Executive of Ireland. ["No, no!"] Then, like other hon. Members of that House, he had failed to understand the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. But his object was rather to deal by way of illustration with a point which was raised by the Leader of the Opposition. That right hon. Gentleman referred to the United States of America, and to the difficulties which had arisen in their Constitution through the very large powers which the States possessed; and he said that very often all the Central Government could do, when cases of difficulty arose involving their relations with foreign countries, was to say—"We are very sorry." But they had had to say something a good deal more substantial than that they were very sorry, for in certain cases they had had to pay heavily through the unconstitutional action of certain States. He would remind the Committee of what recently took place in New Orleans affecting the Italian Government. There was an attack upon the Italian inhabitants of New Orleans. A certain number of them were killed, and the Italian Government immediately claimed from the United States that there should be remedies—

Mr. T. W. Russell

MR. T. M. HEALY : Mr. Mellor, is this relevant to the Amendment ?

THE CHAIRMAN : It is merely an illustration.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (continuing) observed, that the Italian Government claimed from the Government of the United States that there should be remedies for these deeds, and that the perpetrators of them should be brought to justice. But what did they find ? The Central Government of the United States declared they had no power whatever to interfere with the Executive of the particular State. They remonstrated with the State of Louisiana entirely in vain ; and, as a result, the Central Government, through the action of an independent Executive which it had set up in one of its own States, had to pay a sum of 25,000 dollars as compensation to the families of the persons killed. Then they had a distinct, concrete case of a difficulty arising with a foreign State, and he did not think they could have a stronger illustration of the necessity of keeping their hand and power directly upon any possible unconstitutional action of the Executive it was proposed to set up in Ireland.

MR. ROSS (Londonderry) commented on what he described as the invincible repugnance of the Government to every Amendment which proposed to deal with supremacy, or the method of asserting that supremacy. The Members of the Government had declared they were ready to accept a proper Amendment in the enacting part of the Bill declaratory of the supremacy. He was sure that, ancillary to that, they would be willing to accept some reasonable method for making that supremacy effective ; but, to all Amendments up to the present which had been put forward by the Opposition, they had shown a most determined resistance. There were two things on which the Opposition were determined. There were, first, that there should be in the enacting part of the Bill an ambiguous expression of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament ; and, secondly, that there should be some means for making that supremacy effective. The whole question of supremacy seemed to have got into a haze. There was no clear idea on the other side of the House of what the supremacy should be, and he fancied that hon. Members who supported the Government differed very much among themselves on the subject. He ventured to say if the average hon. Member opposite were asked what was meant by the inalienable supremacy, it would be found that all he had in his mind was that England was the stronger Power and could at any time enforce her wishes by the exercise of vis major. They should never arrive at any clear method of supremacy so long as the confusion existed. There could be no degrees of supremacy, and when once supremacy existed, it must pervade all branches of——

THE CHAIRMAN observed that the hon. Member was not keeping to the Amendment.

MR. ROSS said, his argument was that hon. Members had no clear idea of what supremacy was ; but he would not pursue the subject. As he understood the Amendment assuming supremacy to exist, it proposed a summary method of enforcing it. No matter how great the faith of hon. Members opposite might be, they surely must admit that the people in the North of Ireland had some grounds for suspecting that the great powers to be entrusted to the Irish Parliament might be abused, and they demanded as a matter of right that some means should be given to the Loyalists to protect themselves. They could not wait for an Act of Parliament, which might be obstructed in that House. The point he wished to put before the Committee was this—when any great danger arose on account of the exercise of some of the powers on the part of the Irish Parliament the Loyalists asked for a summary remedy. In his judgment the Amendment suggested a reasonable remedy ; and he really failed to understand, if the Government were sincere in their professions, why they would not accept some Amendment of that character. The Home Secretary had said that if right hon. Gentlemen agreed to give these powers to Ireland, they must not have a petty, peddling interference with the powers they so conferred. This method, which was suggested by the Amendment, would not be made use of on every petty occasion, but would only be exercised on occasions of great danger and emergency ; and, that being so, he had as yet heard no real answer against the adoption of the Amendment.

SIR E. REED (Cardiff) preferred to speak of the Amendment from the point of view of one who hoped that if a Legislature was established in Ireland it might work wisely and well, and that it might not be hindered and restrained by unnecessary and unjust restrictions. He very much doubted whether it would be fair to any Legislature to subject its legislative power to interference by mere Address to both Houses of Parliament. He was one of those who thought it was highly probable, judging from the different methods and spirit that animated many of the Irish Members from those which prevailed among those who were not honoured by being Irishmen, that the Irish Legislature would pass laws which would be very painful and objectionable to the Imperial Parliament. It was desirable, therefore, if such laws were passed, that means should be found to enable them to be corrected by the Imperial Parliament. But he thought the Irish Legislature would have no chance whatever of conducting the affairs of the country with success and advantage if the Imperial Parliament was to set it up, as it were, with a lash of this nature held over it. Hon. Members opposite seemed to demur to the suggestion that their methods and spirit of action were somewhat different from his and that of other Members near him. But it was a remarkable fact that the moment an hon. Member ventured to speak a word of criticism about the Bill his Irish supporters flew at him. He should like to know why the Irish Members of any constituency were to dictate to Representatives as to whether they should speak and discuss any measure in its details or in its principles? It must be borne in mind by hon. Members that the Committee were discussing this Bill under conditions which the Prime Minister had told them in 1886 were dangerous. He, for one, at almost every stage of that Bill felt that they did run considerable risks from passing a Home Rule Bill for Ireland against the majority of voices in Great Britain and under the practical dictation of an Irish majority. He thought there was a danger, and for the reason that it was dangerous he thought that the Government should grant every possible opportunity of debating points of danger as they arose. He should claim the right to discuss the measure from that point of view, and to point out what he thought would be of advantage alike to the House of Commons, to the Empire, and to Ireland. He objected to the Amendment and should vote against it, because he did not think that it was a proper method of exercising the authority of the Imperial Parliament over a subordinate Parliament. He believed conscientiously that Irish Nationalist Members were most anxious to profit by the present situation by entering into reasonable engagements for the purpose of guaranteeing the propriety and efficiency of their action in the future Parliament of Ireland; but he could not attach too much value to that. He was rather surprised himself to hear occasional speeches from the Front Bench in which they were reminded that the Irish Nationalists accepted this or that, and did not criticise this or that, but accepted the Bill most readily, and seemed to show a statesman-like quality in doing so. He agreed with that view. He thought nothing would be more unstatesmanlike than to expect from the Irish Nationalists anything but a most cordial support of the Bill. But he said, on the other side of the question, that if he were an Irish Representative and wished to make the future Legislature worth anything, he should object in the strongest possible manner to this proposal, because he did not believe that, if it were adopted, the Irish Legislature would have a fair chance. Could they expect that the Legislature of Ireland would be as good a Legislature if they fettered it by unwise methods and proceedings as if they gave it the reasonable freedom which any Legislature might enjoy for the purpose of doing its work properly? He thought not. He hoped before the Bill passed through Committee to see some sort of a clause introduced which would give greater expression and security to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament; but he must say he did not think this was a proper mode of dealing with it. If this Irish Parliament was properly constituted and if it was left reasonably free he should not have any great fear of Irish legislation, because Irishmen would know well that any oppressive legislation passed by it would be met and dealt with by the Imperial Parliament. He did not think it would be a right thing to put the Legislature of Ireland under the control of this Amendment. He thought to do so would have an irritating and injurious effect; and he should, therefore, vote against it.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) ventured to suggest to the Prime Minister that if, as appeared to be the case, they had not the advantage of entirely apprehending all that the right hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to make clear to them, he, on his side, had also failed to understand one very essential portion of their case. Had the Government looked at matters in a proper light they would have saved considerable time and trouble. It was said that the Amendment was not justified. Well, the justification for the Amendment was that there was a radical discrepancy between the views of the Government and those who represented the minority in Ireland with regard to the main issue. And what was the main issue in Ireland? It was that the Government did trust, but the loyal minority did not trust, the future Legislature which it was proposed to set up in Ireland. The Prime Minister urged them to show confidence in hon. Members opposite. He (Mr. Arnold-Forster) had not long been a Member of that House; but as a visitor he had often listened to its Debates, and on four occasions he had heard the eloquent perorations of the right hon. Gentleman, in which he assured them that if some particular legislative change were effected with regard to Ireland they would see an absolutely new state of things. He had heard other speeches of like purport since he had been in the House. But not one single prophecy of the right hon. Gentleman had come true. Hon. Members had some right to be suspicious; they had some reason for their distrust on the ground of what the Prime Minister had done, but more especially on the ground of circumstances that were within the common knowledge of them all. The Prime Minister said that free institutions brought their own education. But what free institutions had Ireland lacked during the last 20 years? There had been no distinction between the free institutions of the two countries, except that the laws regulating Ireland were more favourable than the laws in England and Scotland; and if there had been any departure from those institutions it had been when the right hon. Gentleman himself had thought fit to curtail certain powers because they had been abused. That being so, had they not some reason for mistrusting the honesty of the men who would be their future rulers? He did not want to put the matter too finely; but he supposed that such an occurrence as this might take place:—They might have hon. Members opposite sitting in the Upper or Lower Divisions of the Legislature in Dublin and lending themselves to a policy which, to their minds, was right and honourable, but which, to the minds of hon. Members of that House, was neither right nor honourable. If hon. Members of that House were to find themselves face to face with the results of the policy that had been promised by hon. Members opposite, they would be in a very serious position if they could not give an immediate counter to the execution of that policy. The very fact that the Committee was now asked to accept the clause upon the assumption that hon. Members opposite had on a few recent occasions given their testimony in favour of a policy of conciliation was only worth anything at all if they assumed that everything that these hon. Members had said scores and hundreds of times was absolutely not to be believed. Without some such provision as was suggested in the Amendment, they might have hon. Members opposite bringing in some legislative project affecting the police in Ireland and carrying it. There might be hon. Members who would believe it was the duty of the Irish Legislature to act vindictively towards the Royal Irish Constabulary; and the views of hon. Members in Dublin of what was just to the Irish Constabulary led him to doubt very much whether their views as to what was just and right would coincide with the views of hon. Members in that House. There might be the widest divergence of views, not only with regard to persons, but also with regard to property. He could understand hon. Members saying, as had been said, that they did not consider that the Irish Legislature would be under any finicking obligation of honour in dealing with the landlords in Ireland, and they might think it would be a very good thing to disregard the obligations of honour. If that view were carried out, they would be face to face with an amount of injustice and tyranny that would require instant action by that House. He would venture to remark that the Prime Minister had not grasped the depth, intensity, or reality of the position under this clause; he did not appear to remember that he was dealing with the lives and fortunes of men and women. That was the whole point of the Bill. The Unionists insisted upon this and other Amendments, because they knew what had been done in the past, and because they had been promised in black and white by the hon. Member for East Mayo and others that worse things would be done in the future. They wanted protection. The hon. Member for South Longford had said that the Imperial Parliament had a right to interfere with any unjust legislation that the Dublin Parliament might pass. He told them that some 40 Members would be returned—

MR. BLAKE said, he did not say that. He said there would be 20 of a minority and 60 on the majority side, leaving a majority of 40.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said, he apologised if he had misunderstood the hon. Gentleman. But did he forget the position of the Irish minority under the Bill? He hoped that the Committee would not forget that the Bill provided that in county after county the representation, which was now a Loyalist representation, would be interfered with. In one case 15,000 persons would return five Members to support the Party to which the hon. Member belonged, while 36,000 persons would only be able to return five Members to support the Party to which he (Mr. Arnold-Forster) belonged. [Cries of "Order!"] He was not transgressing—he was merely speaking to the point raised by the hon. Member for Longford. They were told there would be effective protection, but the practical gerrymandering of the Schedules to the Bill would place the minority in Ireland absolutely at the mercy of hon. Members opposite. If this clause did not pass in its amended form it would be necessary to insist upon some parallel Amendment; for, unless some power which had its origin in the Imperial Parliament should stand between the Loyalists in Ireland, and especially in the South of Ireland, and the direct oppression which had been promised to them over and over again in the clearest words by hon. Members opposite, and which they had declared it would be their duty and their pleasure to put in force when they got into power, they would deprive Her Majesty's subjects of that liberty and protection which made life tolerable.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, North-wich) said, as there appeared to be no intention to press the Amendment, and as the discussion had gone on long enough, he had to move that the Question be now put.

Several hon. MEMBERS rose—

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he rose to a point of Order.

THE CHAIRMAN: What is the point?

MR. RUSSELL said, he desired to ask whether, after the ruling of the Speaker on the subject the other day, it was competent for the hon. Member to preface a Motion for Closure by a speech?

THE CHAIRMAN: The matter does not arise. It is hardly time for the Closure to be moved.

Debate resumed.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) said, that the criticism of the hon. Member for South Longford, assuming that the hon. Member was entitled to take the Bill as it stood, entirely lost all its force, unless the Prime Minister was now prepared to state to the Committee that Clause 9 was to remain as it appeared in the Bill. If the Government continued to leave the Committee in obscurity on some of the most important clauses of the Bill they must expect that hon. Members representing the minority in Ireland would continue to move Amendments for the purpose of mitigating the evil effects of the Bill, and so securing that peace, order, and good government should be maintained. They were asked to rely on the ability of the Irish Members. He agreed with the Prime Minister that the Irish Members had shown considerable ability; but that did not prevent their ability from being directed into wrong channels. It had been directed to the destruction, and had been destructive of peace, order, and good government. Surely the Prime Minister was not justified in supposing that the considerations and influences which affected the Irish Party in the past were to cease active operation because a Legislature was established in Dublin? He (Mr. Macartney) was convinced that those considerations affecting the prosperity and welfare of Ireland would be more likely to be active, because the seed which had been sown by prominent politicians in Ireland would only then begin to bear its full fruit. There were, no doubt, hon. Members on those (the Irish) Benches who would wish to conduct the business of an Irish Parliament in a manner consistent with the traditions of the English Parliament; but those few hon. Gentlemen would not be able to control the forces behind them. They had aroused a spirit which they would have to satisfy. To put it as it had been roughly put to him, the Nationalist feeling in Ireland was in reference to the present representation—"Oh," it was said, "the men who are in Parliament now are good enough for what they have to do. When we get Home Rule, we will send to Dublin men more accurately representing opinion in Ireland"—and these new men, without experience of Parliamentary life in England, or of ever having been in touch with Executive power, would control the Irish Government! As to the misuse of the ability of the Irish Members, he would remind them of the ability displayed at Tipperary; if the same extravagance were shown in the Irish Legislature it would soon lead to the bankruptcy of the Irish Exchequer. They had also seen how this ability had been exercised in commercial life. There was the spectacle of The Freeman's Journal. [Cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN asked the hon. Member to confine himself to the Amendment.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he was only giving an instance of the spirit in which an Irish Legislature would be conducted. [Cries of "Order!"] He was speaking in a perfect covey of Deputy Chairmen, and, therefore, it was difficult to keep the chain of his argument. He would content himself by saying that he should support the Amendment, because, whether it was the best method for attaining its object or not, it would, at least, assert the right which the Irish minority claimed.

*MR. H. S. FOSTER (Suffolk, Lowestoft) said, he had not intended taking part in the Debate, but he had not previously taken part in the proceedings of the Committee, and he thought English Members had as much right to be heard as the Irish, for they had just as great an interest in the matter. It was refreshing to hear a Member of the Gladstonian Party suggesting, as the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir E. J. Reed) had suggested, however timidly, the right of private judgment. Most of the Party opposite—[Interruption]—had abandoned that right. The Government were not prepared to listen to any arguments. [Cries of "Question!" and "Order!"] They were entirely in the hands of their Irish followers. [Renewed interruption.] Unless there was an indication from the Irish Party that they were prepared to accept the Amendment, the hands of the Government were quite bound, and he offered them his sympathy. [Cries of "Order!"] Many hon. Members of the House had had to complain of these interruptions—even eminent Members. He had hoped that a new Member might not be subjected to them; but courtesy was a practice unknown on the Nationalist Benches. He said the Government was entirely in the hands of the Irish Members. Since the Prime Minister had decided to follow the Irish Party all argument was lost upon him. [Renewed interruption.]

THE CHAIRMAN: I am afraid I must say that the hon. Member is out of Order. The hon. Member must confine himself to the Amendment.

*MR. H. S. FOSTER said, he was merely pointing out that the Government were in the hands of the Irish Members. If the Mover went to a Division he should certainly support the Amendment, because it would restrain the future action of the Irish Legislature; and with respect to that Legislature the Opposition had grounds of reasonable suspicion. The Government ought to understand what that meant, because a good many of their Irish supporters were imprisoned by the Prime Minister on grounds of reasonable suspicion. [Interruption.]

THE CHAIRMAN: It is absolutely necessary for the hon. Member to keep to the Amendment. ["Cries of Divide!"]

*MR. H. S. FOSTER said, that his reasonable suspicion was grounded on the action of the Irish Members both inside and outside of the House. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Cardiff had told the Committee that as soon as he exercised the right of private judgment his Irish constituents flew at his throat. [Cries of "Question!" and interruption.] Was the conduct of the Irish Party in the House on this present Bill worthy of any deliberative Assembly? It was hardly possible for any opponent of the Bill to string two sentences together without perpetual interruption from the Irish Party. ["Hear, hear!" and cries of "Divide!" and "Question!"] Were they not justified in coming to the conclusion that if the same men had power in Ireland they would show the same intolerance there as they did to their opponents in that House? No independent Member wanted better example of what an Irish Legislature would be like than to watch the action of the Irish Party towards their opponents in the House of Commons. [Interruption.] They could have no confidence in these men. Their conduct justified him in saying—and he submitted to the Committee—that they were entitled in face of it to vote for every restriction that would fetter the hands of the Nationalist Party in Ireland.

MR. BRODRICK, who rose amid cries of "Divide," said, the discussion had brought out from the Prime Minister the declaration that he was not at variance with the Unionist Members in regard to giving the Imperial Parliament proper control over the Irish Parliament. Having regard to that opinion, and in view of the fact that the Government seemed to think that his object would be effected in a better form than that suggested, he would ask the leave of the Committee to withdraw the Amendment—["No, no!"]—reserving to himself the right, unless a more satisfactory arrangement were secured, to re-introduce it on Clause 9.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick) rose—

Mr. John Ellis rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 300; Noes 244.—(Division List, No. 87.)

Question put accordingly, "That those words be there added:—"

The Committee divided:—Ayes 247; Noes 303.—(Division List, No. 88.)

MR. DARLING (Deptford) said, he had given notice of the following Amendment:—

"Provided always, that if any Irish Act is inconsistent with an enactment made by Parliament after the appointed day, and expressly extended to Ireland, it shall be read subject to that enactment made by Parliament, and shall, to the extent of such inconsistency, be wholly void and inoperative."

He thought it would be better to move the Amendment on Clause 33; therefore, he would not now ask the Committee to consider it.

*SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I beg to move to add at the end of the clause—

"Provided that in the making of such laws, and in all matters pertaining to the carrying out of the powers conferred by this Act, both Houses shall, except as in this Act provided, have equal rights, powers, and privileges."

I can assure the Committee that this Amendment is not submitted in a spirit of "captious criticism." I hope that some hon. Members who support the Government will see that the question ought to be dealt with in some practical manner. The Committee has determined that there shall be two Houses of Legislature in Ireland. This decision was arrived at on arguments used by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. A section of Members—a large section—sacrificed the opinions they entertained in deference to those arguments, for there are many strong supporters of the Government who hold the view that Second Chambers are objectionable. Arguments were addressed to them to the effect that in this particular instance a Second Chamber was necessary in order that there should be a safeguard established—that they should give up their opinions and apply to the conduct of legislative affairs in Ireland the safeguard of a Second Chamber. I am sure that hon. Gentlemen who support the Government, and who voted in favour of the creation of a Second Chamber, even if they sacrificed their opinions, did not intend to make this Second Chamber a Second Chamber in name only. I would submit to the Committee that if the Bill remains as it is framed, without Amendment in the direction suggested, the Second Chamber will become, or may become, perfectly useless, will afford no safeguard whatever, and supporters of the Government who voted for it will have voted for it in vain, without receiving any return for their sacrifice of principle. I would point out the position in which this Second Chamber now stands. In the 1st clause it is provided that the two Houses of Legislature shall make laws for Ireland; and I think that does bring within it the necessity that the two Houses shall take some part in making laws; for, although there is no express declaration to that effect, it is implied that the two Houses shall take part in making laws. Beyond that this House has done nothing in respect to the construction of a Second Chamber as a part of the Constitution. And the Committee must recollect that when a statutory Legislative Body is constitutionally formed, subordinate to the body forming it, that Legislature so constructed never can, without receiving express powers, interfere with its own Constitution. All the power conferred must be defined by the Body which creates the subordinate Parliament; and unless we take care in the construction of this new Constitution we shall find that we have left to the statutory Parliament the right to alter its Constitution. We must see that the Second Chamber is not merely a name, but that it shall have real powers conferred upon it, so that it may act as a check upon unwise legislation. The only references I think you will find in this Bill to anything that can approach what I have termed the construction of the constitution are those in Clause 2, Clause 8, which I think deals merely with a question of procedure, and Sub-section 2 of Clause 32. At present the Bill confers no power on the Second Chamber except, by implication, gathered from the words of Clause 2. I understand the intention to be that the Second Chamber should take an equal part in making laws with the Legislative Assembly. If it is said that the Legislative Council is only to take a very small part in the work of the Irish Legislature, the power of that Body might be reduced to such small dimensions as practically to be non-existent. Inasmuch as the Bill does not attempt to confer power on the Second Chamber, you are going, in fact, to leave to the Irish Legislature the limitation of the power of that Chamber. That, I am certain, is not the intention of the Committee, and it is only to remedy this defect that I ask the Government to consider this Amendment. Let us see how the matter would work out. In the Legislative Assembly, without a doubt, the Nationalists would be in a majority. As to the Legislative Council, I have heard no calculation of the relative strength of the two Parties that would not give to the Nationalists a majority in the Chamber. I think the most sanguine calculation of the numbers places the minority at 20 out of the 48 Members of the Council. If you leave to the Irish Legislature the power of settling what are to be the duties of the Second Chamber, you will leave it to the majority to destroy the safeguards which are intended to be the protection of the minority. Supposing the question has to be dealt with by Irish Act of Parliament. In that case, immediately after this Bill came into operation it would be necessary to determine the powers of the Chamber. Of necessity a Bill would be introduced into the two Chambers, the voting upon which would be controlled by the Nationalist majority in each Chamber. That Bill might reduce the power of the Second Chamber to nothing at all. It might say that the Second Chamber should not initiate a Bill. I ask the Committee is that its intention, and ought that to be its intention, when we are framing the Constitution of a subordinate Body? Ought not we ourselves to bear the responsibility of saying what the powers of the Second Chamber should be? The 2nd sub-section of the 32nd section provides that—

“The privileges, rights, and immunities to be held and enjoyed by each House and the Members thereof shall be such as may be defined by Irish Act.”

I do not think that that means that the power of the Second Chamber is to be defined by Irish Act; but if it is not so, the whole subject is left untouched. In the 18th section it is provided that Money Bills shall not be introduced in the Second Chamber. That section makes the Legislative Assembly something like the House of Commons, and makes the Second Chamber something approaching the House of Lords, where Money Bills cannot be introduced. What can be the objection to inserting an Amendment providing that the Second Chamber shall not be entirely crippled by the vote of the Irish Legislature, but that it should have powers which may constitute it a safeguard? Unless such an Amendment be adopted, the Second Chamber may be a skeleton house, and nothing more. The hon. and learned Member for Haddington (Mr. Haldane) said it was only a skeleton, and that the procedure of the Legislature in Ireland would be filled up with what he called the Common Law procedure of Parliament. I deny the accuracy of that argument. There can be no Common Law pervading the procedure of the Irish Legislature. Where would it come from? The Legislature will be a Statutory Body, and can, therefore, have no powers beyond the powers which are conferred upon it by Statute. It will be unable to introduce the traditions of the old Irish House of Commons, and we cannot convey to it the traditions of this House of Commons, or the spirit of our procedure here. If we shrink from the duty of ourselves defining what the powers of the Legislative Council are to be, and leave it to the majority in the Irish Legislature to say what shall be the relative powers of the two Chambers, we shall not set up a Second Chamber which can be a safeguard to the minority, but shall simply erect a sham which will be worse than useless. There is much more that I think could be said in support of this Amendment. I am not asking that we should proceed in an arbitrary manner; I simply ask that we should declare that in all matters respecting the making of laws and pertaining to the carrying out of the powers conferred upon the Bill both Houses shall, except as otherwise provided, have equal rights, powers, and privileges. May I respectfully ask the Prime Minister not to use one argument against my Amendment? I hope he will not say—"If we give you this Amendment, will you support the Bill?" I think that would be a one-sided bargain. The price he offers me is not good enough.

Sir H. James

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I have not offered it.

*SIR HENRY JAMES: I was asking him to be kind enough not to offer it. That was the offer he made to my right hon. Friend (Mr. J. Chamberlain). [Cries of "No!"] I beg pardon, but it was so. The question was put to my right hon. Friend—"If I accept this Amendment, will you support the Bill?" and that offer was cheered very loudly. But how can such an argument be used against us? This Bill contains 40 clauses. We suggest an Amendment on one clause, and my right hon. Friend wants us to accept the other 39 clauses if he agrees to the one Amendment. If we say no to his offer the cheers are very vociferous at our expense. I will tell my right hon. Friend what would be a sufficient offer. If he would agree to let us amend every clause in the Bill we would consent to accept the Bill, but I do not think my right hon. Friend would afterwards recognise his measure, and I admit I do not think the Committee would regard the Bill as worthy of being passed in its amended form.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 18, at the end of the Clause, to add the words—"Provided that in the making of such laws, and in all matters pertaining to the carrying out of the powers conferred by this Act, both Houses shall, except as in this Act provided, have equal rights, powers, and privileges."—(Sir H. James.)

MR. CARSON (Dublin University): I desire to say only one or two words with regard to this Amendment, and I do so because I do not think it at all clear what, under the terms of the Bill as it stands at present, the intentions of the Government are in relation either to the First Chamber or the Second Chamber. As far as the 2nd section is concerned, I should certainly be of opinion that if the Bill is to pass in its present form the two Chambers would have exactly the same rights. Of course, if I was perfectly satisfied that that was the intention of the Government, and if I thought that was the construction of the Bill, taking the measure as a whole, I should not have thought it necessary to intervene in the Debate. But when I come to look at the 8th section, I think it throws an entirely different light on the 2nd section ; and it leads me at once to the idea, which may be entirely erroneous, that it is not proposed by the Bill to confer equal powers on the Upper Chamber, if I may so describe it. The 8th section says—"If a Bill or any provision of a Bill adopted by the Legislative Assembly is lost by the disagreement of the Legislative Council," the two Chambers are to sit together for the purpose of seeing whether they can amend their differences or whether it is necessary to hang up the Bill or have a Dissolution. To my mind, it is plain that the only originating power recognised by the 8th section is in the Legislative Assembly. The section does not go on to provide or suggest that if the Legislative Council performed the same functions they would have the same power of summoning the Legislative Assembly and going through the same process. Taking the two sections together, the real construction is that the Legislative Assembly only are to have an originating and initiating power, and that no such power whatever is to be conferred upon the Legislative Council. Is that the intention of the Government? It certainly seems extraordinary that the matter should be left in a state of doubt. I think the Chief Secretary is under the impression that the Second Chamber will, under the Bill, have equal originating powers. I should like to have some explanation as to what is to be the method of procedure by which the Upper Chamber, after originating a Bill and passing it, may force the Lower Chamber against its will to consider it. Is there any reason why the Upper Chamber should not have originating or initiatory functions conferred on it? You will observe the mode of procedure is this : that when the Lower Chamber passes a Bill, and the Upper Chamber refuses to agree to it, the two Chambers will deliberate together ; then why should not the same process be followed when the Bill is initiated by the Upper Chamber and objected to by the Lower Chamber? I have been of opinion all along that the Second Chamber will be of no use as a safeguard ; but, at the same time, I think that, as the House is going to give this safeguard against our will, we have a right to see that it is a real and not a sham safeguard. It seems to me that if the Upper Chamber had an originating power, that might be a substantial benefit and protection to the minority, because, assuming that the Chamber is a real Second Chamber, many persons represented in that Chamber will not be represented in the Lower Chamber, and their views could be put forward in the shape of a Bill which never could be brought into the Lower Chamber at all. For these reasons I respectfully press on the right hon. Gentleman that there is really a substantial question involved in this Amendment, and that unless you give the Upper Chamber co-equal originating powers with the Lower, it will be no use as a safeguard.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : If my right hon. Friend is content to provide for the exercise by the Upper Chamber of the powers properly and ordinarily appertaining to a Legislative Chamber the Government will have no objection whatever to the substance of the Amendment. Our opinion, however, is that it would come in more properly in Clause 32, and probably it would be better that the Amendment should stand over until that clause is reached. It has always been the intention of the Government that the Second Chamber shall have initiating powers, and I am astonished at the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite. He said he thought it was quite clear that there never was any intention of allowing the Upper Chamber to initiate legislation. The fact that it is stated in the Bill that they shall not have the power to introduce Money Bills is enough to show the contrary. The hon. and learned Gentleman said he would admit it was doubtful. There is no question at all of abridging the privileges of the Second Chamber with respect to those powers which ordinarily attach to a Legislative Body. The Government desire that those powers shall be possessed as fully and largely by the Upper Chamber as by the Lower, except with reference to Money Bills. I trust my right hon. Friend will see there is no substantial reason for taking a Division, and I hope he will be inclined to acquiesce in the view that this Amendment should be introduced in a subsequent clause.

*SIR H. JAMES : I quite admit, as a general rule, the claim of those in charge of a Bill, when they accept an Amendment, to select the place in the Bill in which it should be inserted. I shall be glad if the right hon. Gentleman will indicate what words he will accept.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: My opinion is that the Government would be disposed to accept the first portion of the Amendment, as to the making of laws and all the other offices and powers ordinarily attaching to a Legislative Chamber.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) was glad that the statement of the Prime Minister had removed existing doubts with reference to the exceptional power provided by the Bill, and that he had promised that the two branches of the Legislature should have equal power. But in the 8th clause there was a provision settling the disputes between the two branches of the Legislature. Amendments had been placed on the Paper establishing perfect equality between the two Chambers, and when the proper time came they could discuss the desirability of providing for cases in which the Lower Chamber rejected a Bill initiated by the Upper Chamber. The Prime Minister said that this Amendment would come more appropriately on Clause 32, but the clause said that the privileges of the Houses should be settled by Irish Act subject to a Proviso. They were anxious, however, to have this equality settled by this Bill.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: That will be done by Imperial enactment. I desire to keep a free mind in regard to the provisions against a dead-lock, but I repeat that the intention of the Government is to provide that on matters and powers which ordinarily attach to a Legislative Chamber there shall be a perfect and bonâ fide equality between the two Chambers.

*SIR H. JAMES: After that statement of the Prime Minister I will ask leave to withdraw the Amendment. I hope we shall not have any difficulty in determining the words to use when we come to Clause 32.

MR. SEXTON said, that the Amendment was a very important one, and the Committee ought to consider the language in which it was to be phrased. The Prime Minister had done nothing more than was absolutely necessary in determining to reserve the question of reciprocal action of the two Chambers, in regard to a joint Session, until the Committee reached Clause 32. He was not prepared to say that absolute reciprocal action between the two Houses would be desirable or convenient; but he understood that the question was an open one. He shared the perplexity of the Prime Minister as to the meaning of some of the words in the Amendment. He had no objection as to the making of the laws by the two Houses being equal; and in all that ordinarily attached to the functions of a Legislature, the two Chambers might have equal powers. But he was doubtful what might be intended by including in the language of the right hon. and learned Gentleman—

Sir H. James

“And in all matters pertaining to the carrying out of the powers conferred by this Act.”

This meant Executive action. If the right hon. Gentleman meant that the tenure of office by the Executive Committee of the Privy Council in Ireland was to be affected in any way by the Legislative Council, the Irish Members should meet the proposal with a flat denial.

*SIR H. JAMES: I do not intend to go back from what I have said, but there must be no misunderstanding as to our position. We do not intend that the Legislative Council shall be reduced to an absolute nullity in the way in which the hon. Gentleman has stated. In the power of expressing an opinion we claim that there shall be equal power of action, except in cases specially provided for.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend, and subscribe to everything he has said. The Upper Chamber ought to have the power of censuring the Government in the same way as the House of Lords possesses it. Of course, we cannot in this Bill provide what effect such a condemnation ought to have, either on the Government or on the country.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth) said, he wished to secure the insertion at the end of the clause of the words—

“The question, whenever it arises, whether any law passed by the Irish Legislature does or does not relate exclusively to Ireland, shall be determined by Parliament, in manner herein-after provided.”

The object of this was to secure for this Parliament the right of interpreting its own Acts. He was aware that in Clauses 22 and 23 there were provisions dealing with the powers of the Irish Legislature, and no excess of jurisdiction on its part by referring such questions for decision to the Privy Council. But that would not meet all grievances or cases of hardship which might arise in the dim, distant, and uncertain future after the passing of the Act. Some cases might arise in which it would be a denial of justice to refer them to a costly legal tribunal like the Privy Council. It seemed to him very fitting that this House should be the interpreter in any cases that might arise, and that they should reserve to themselves the right of decision. He had frequently known cases in which the Judges had been puzzled as to what the mind of Parliament was with regard to some particular Statute. He submitted, therefore, that some machinery of a simple character ought to be erected by which any Party could appeal to this Parliament to express its opinion as to any act done by the Irish Legislature, or as to any law that might be passed by it; and he thought it would be a denial of justice to compel a person aggrieved to go to the Privy Council by instituting a suit, or to the Lord Lieutenant or the Secretary of State in order to get him to move in the matter. He therefore referred, in the concluding part of his Amendment, to the machinery he proposed to add in a separate clause at the end of the Bill, and which he had already down on the Paper. It was simply that any subject of Her Majesty who felt aggrieved by any law passed by the Irish Legislature, or by any Act of the Irish Executive, or by any proceedings, either civil or criminal, that might be taken against him, should be at liberty to state his grievances by simply writing a protest, and stating the grounds upon which he considered he was aggrieved; and that Her Majesty's Attorney General should then place that protest before Parliament, unless he should certify upon the protest that there was no reasonable grounds for the appeal. The protest would thereupon come before Parliament for its decision; and if either House should resolve that the act done, or the law passed, exceeded the power of the Irish Legislature or the Executive, such act done or law was to be suspended in its operation. He implored the House not to part with the right of the interpretation of its own laws; and for these reasons he moved the Amendment with the three words omitted.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 18, at end, add—"The question, whenever it arises, whether any law passed by the Irish Legislature does or does not relate exclusively to Ireland, shall be determined by Parliament, in manner herein-after provided."—(Mr. Kimber.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I have no right to appeal to the hon. and learned Gentleman, but I can hardly think he seriously intends to press his proposal upon the Committee. This is a subject of very great importance, and one upon which we have established a complete system of legislation after a long and, I believe, thoroughly satisfactory experience; this question of ultra vires in regard to the conflict of Legislatures is a very high question. It is a question upon the consideration of which, beyond almost all other questions, all passion, all ignorance, and all collateral motive in the matter ought to be excluded, and which ought to be dealt with entirely and exclusively in a judicial frame of mind and by judicial institutions. This is not my opinion alone; these are the established principles of our law. Wherever we have subaltern Legislative Authorities, whether in India or the Colonies, and the laws of those Institutions come into conflict with Acts of Parliament, we have a machinery for dealing with the matter. Cognizance is taken of any question that arises in the first place if it so happens in the Imperial Courts, and their Judgments are liable to review in the last resort by the Privy Council. In the opinion of the Government, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is a tribunal which has acquired in a very large and notable degree the confidence of all parts of the Empire. The hon. Member proposes to supplant and expel the idea of reference to this judicial tribunal, and to provide that the question of the interpretation of Acts of Parliament in the matter of ultra vires as between the subaltern and Imperial authority shall be decided by a political vote in a political Assembly.

MR. KIMBER said, he expressly stated that he did not wish to get rid of, or exclude, the jurisdiction of the Privy Council should any suitor desire to appear before it.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member wants as a rival to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council a Reference, in the first place, to a political officer, the Attorney General, and then to either House, and not to both Houses of Parliament. The House of Lords has a judicial character as well as a political character. I should have thought if there was one thing we could be quite clear about it was that the Reference, if it is to go to the House of Lords, must go to it in its judicial capacity. No; that judicial capacity is to be cast aside when a question of the highest importance has to be decided. I think the hon. Member will recognise that his proposal is one that ought not to be pressed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: While sympathising with the hon. Member in his desire, as shown in his Amendment, to make the supremacy of Parliament a living reality, I do not think he would be well advised in pressing the Amendment to a Division. The question is whether the matter should be dealt with by a legal tribunal or by a Legislative Assembly animated by Party feeling. Such an Assembly would give a series of decisions, which in the nature of the case might, and probably would, be somewhat contradictory, according as one Party or other in the Assembly gained the upper hand. That would bring about uncertainty and confusion, which would be not only extremely unfair to the Irish Legislature, but also extremely inconvenient to the very individual whom the hon. and learned Member desires to protect. Above all, what is required is that decisions on matters of this kind should be clear and based on a settled principle acted upon throughout. That would be quite impossible, I think, if we were to leave the decision to the fluctuating majority of a popular Assembly, and for that reason, if for no other, I am rather inclined to think that the Amendment, even if supplemented by the proposed clause, would not conduce to the smooth working of the Bill if it should ever become law, or to the interests of the suitor, and I therefore would suggest that the hon. and learned Member should withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*SIR H. JAMES, in moving in Clause 2, page 1, line 18, at the end to add—

said: I will not enter into any wide discussion upon the question of the supremacy of Parliament; I will only touch upon the subject in order that it shall not be supposed that I agree with the views expressed by the Solicitor General. When by the Act of Union the Parliament of Great Britain and the Parliament of Ireland came together, there then came into existence a Parliament which was supreme, though it might be called statutory in the sense that it derived its existence from the Act of Union. I put it to my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, if the Act of Union had not been successful, and it was thought desirable, and enacted, that two Parliaments should exist—one for Ireland and one for Great Britain—and that they should be co-ordinate and equal, the Parliament of Great Britain would have no supremacy over Ireland any more than the Parliament of Ireland would have supremacy over Great Britain. I take this opportunity of protesting against the view that it is unnecessary we should take means to protect the supremacy of Parliament. We ought most certainly to take means to protect the supremacy of Parliament. I admit that with respect to this Bill the question is almost academic, because I do not assert that there is any attempt in the Bill to get rid of the supremacy of Parliament. But as many persons do think that this supremacy is practically got rid of, there ought to be no possible doubt left upon the matter. I refuse to regard the question of doubt arising only from a legal point of view. If the question had to be discussed according to judicial rules before a legal tribunal we might trust that the supremacy of Parliament would be recognised. But we have to look to what might take place, not only from a legal, but from a political, point of view. We shall have the question raised as to whether the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament is maintained under many different political considerations and aspects. We shall have many men saying—"You have no right to legislate for Ireland, because virtually you gave up the supremacy of Parliament." I can understand this House of Parliament or the Irish Parliament saying—"We look at this question in a broader light than the Judges. We heard Ministers say that the Irish Parliament was not to be interfered with except in extreme cases, which would never arise." Irish Members may say they always intended they should never be interfered with; and that when Parliament granted this power, it was asked expressly to declare that it retained its own supremacy, and it refused to do so. If the supremacy is to be a living force; if it not only exists, but is to be exercised, it is absolutely necessary that there should be a declaration of that supremacy. It can never be maintained if we do not assert it. I fully accept all that has fallen from the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary on the subject. I fully accept their view that the supremacy of Parliament is to be maintained, and is not to be interfered with. But while I accept those assertions, I must say that they are of no value either for the construction of the Act or to control the action of politicians. Therefore, I trust that this assertion of supremacy will be placed on the face of the Statute. My right hon. Friend objected to the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Deptford, on the ground that it was too narrow, and that it was something in the nature of a Preamble. My right hon. Friend also objected to it on the ground that it limited the supremacy and confined it only to Ireland, and he asked why not say that the supremacy remained unaffected over the whole Empire? I have accepted that view of the Prime Minister, and I have declared in my Amendment that the supremacy exists, notwithstanding anything in this Act, over all the dominions of the Queen, and thus the power will be asserted of making laws for Ireland. But, having thus framed the Amendment in general terms, I must ask that this should be the place in the Bill in which this declaration should be inserted.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 18, at the end of the Clause, to add the words—"Provided that, notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, the supreme power and authority of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland shall remain unaffected and undiminished over all persons, matters, and things within the Queen's dominions."—(Sir Henry James.)

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I and my Colleagues have been perfectly clear and distinct in proceeding in this matter since 1886. We are perfectly convinced that, without any mention of the supremacy at all, it would remain absolutely unaffected, unlimited, and one over the whole Queen's dominions. I know of no limitation whatever of the supremacy of Parliament except the limitation of geography. I do not believe that the assertion of it is in itself necessary, or adds any strength to it whatever. But when there are those in large numbers and in good faith who attach great importance to the re-assertion of that supremacy, the Government are not disinclined to meet them. The whole question is as to the terms in which it is to be re-asserted, and whether it is to be by preamble, by proviso, or by clause. My right hon. Friend has avoided the rocks and shoals which surround the question if we were to try to clothe in exact terms powers with respect to which the sound doctrine is that it ought not to be limited, trammelled, or confined by any exact terms. I will not criticise the language of the Amendment, because if supremacy is unaffected it remains undiminished. Apart from the particular place in the Bill where the declaration should be inserted, I think the course adopted by my right hon. Friend is judicious, and one to which we cannot make any objection. Some hon. Members are not satisfied with the assertion of supremacy in the Preamble, and want it expressed in a more drastic form, either in the shape of a proviso or a separate clause, which would imply its being put at the end of the Bill. To a certain extent, the question has been obscured by a feeling of suspicion and jealousy being imported into it, and in these circumstances the Government think it would be better that a proposal on the matter should come rather from those who feel the necessity of it than from ourselves. I am glad the matter has fallen into the hands of my right hon. Friend, and I do not think I shall be inconsistent if I were to ask him to agree to bring up this proviso as a separate clause. The most effective form of proceeding is by a clause, which does not hang upon any one particular proposition of the Bill, but affects all the Bill alike. The Government, therefore, think that direct enactment by clause rather than by the kind of subordinate place that is assumed by proviso is the best and most satisfactory method of showing their respect and homage for this great doctrine of supremacy, which, in our judgment, should be esteemed as a hallowed thing. I hope my right hon. Friend will resolve to deal with the matter by bringing up an additional clause to the Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Before the right hon. and learned Gentleman responds to the appeal which has just been made by the Prime Minister, I will venture to lay before the Committee some reasons which I think ought to induce him to keep his Amendment in the place where he has proposed it. The object of the Amendment, according to the Prime Minister, is to reinforce and hedge round the supremacy of Parliament, which the Prime Minister has called a "hallowed thing." The supremacy of Parliament may be a hallowed thing, but, like other hallowed things, it has very little influence upon some of those who pretend to worship it. I wish the political religion which is embodied in the words "assembly of Parliament" to be a real religion, and I value those words not so much for themselves as because they are a fitting introduction to other Amendments to be proposed which will give them practical value. The words will make it clear that the Legislative Body to be established in Dublin derives its descent in no manner or way from Grattan's Parliament. They will also act as a kind of instruction and indication that, so far from Irish matters having passed beyond the control of this House, it will be their business still to control them, and, if need be, to manage them. I want the supremacy of Parliament to be a practical thing. If the supremacy of Parliament is to be a practical thing under the Bill, we must insert machinery to make it so. It may be a very hallowed thing, but not practical; and if it is not made real and practical, if its influence is allowed to be ignored or disregarded, the result will lead straight to the road of separation. What is the view of the Government on this point? Do they mean this "hallowed thing" to be the kind of supremacy, and that alone, which exists in relation to Canada? Will they be good enough to answer that question "Aye" or "No"?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I thought I had answered that question by stating that, in my opinion, the supremacy of Parliament is absolutely one throughout the Queen's dominions.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman will hardly go the length of saying that as a practical machine the Imperial Parliament is as efficacious a machine in Australasia and Canada as in Kent and Surrey. It may be one from the lawyer's point of view, but it is not one from the statesman's point of view; and no man who turns his mind from the unrealities of a Constitutional lawyer to the realities of everyday political life will maintain that this one and indivisible supremacy is really the same in every part of that geographical area to which alone the right hon. Gentleman has said he limited it. I do not desire, if Home Rule should be ever given to Ireland, that the Imperial Parliament should deal with Ireland in the same minute manner as it now does with England and Scotland; but neither do I desire that the Imperial Parliament should be deprived of all practical meaning and be reduced to the hallowed nothing which is the object of the right hon. Gentleman's political adoration, or to the mere abstraction which it is in relation to Australasia and Canada. It is because the words are of inestimable value as a preface and indication of what we mean to do in this Bill, if we can, and what we mean to do in subsequent Parliaments, if we must, that I hope they will be allowed to remain as they are. For these reasons I desire they should be made part of the Bill in this place, and I strongly urge my right hon. and learned Friend not to yield to the suggestion of the Prime Minister.

MR. J. MORLEY: I think the speech with which the right hon. Gentleman has just favoured the House shows how difficult, how impossible it is to carry on the discussion on this most important subject in anything like a serious and even partially amicable spirit. I would appeal to the Committee whether the tone of the speech of the Prime Minister is not a model which should be followed on a great and serious occasion in a great deliberative Assembly? But my right hon. Friend had no sooner made his conciliatory speech than the right hon. Gentleman opposite rose and made a mockery—[Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Not a bit of it.] I do not wish to use any derogatory phrase, but it seems to me that the tone of the right hon. Gentleman's speech was nothing else than pure mockery. No one knows better than the right hon. Gentleman how serious are the issues before the Committee.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I may, perhaps, be permitted to remind the right hon. Gentleman that throughout the Debates on the Bill I have consistently expressed my own personal indifference to the retention of a mere paper supremacy. In the observations which I have made I have merely expressed the views from which I have never wavered.

MR. J. MORLEY: It is quite true that the right hon. Gentleman stated on a former occasion that he cared no more about proposals such as the right hon. Member for Bury wished put into the Bill than he cared about the order of precedence at a London dinner table. The value that the right hon. Gentleman sets upon these proposals being so slight, I regret that the right hon. Gentleman should have joined in the controversy in so polemical a spirit. On behalf of my Colleagues and myself, I wish to say emphatically that we do not intend that this declaration of supremacy, whether it is agreed to in the form of a proviso or in the form of a clause, should be used as a platform upon which to raise a number of Amendments. That we do not intend, and to that we will not be parties. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite contended that there must be effective provisions to secure "a vitalising supremacy." Our position is that no such Amendment as my right hon. and learned Friend proposed is needed for that purpose. The Bill is saturated with supremacy. Supremacy stares us in the face from every page in the Bill. There is the legislative power reserved to the Imperial Parliament; there is the veto, and there are the other provisions which provide in the most effective way for the exercise of the supremacy when occasion arises, although the Government believe that such occasions will not often arise. In spite of what the right hon. Gentleman has said—indeed all the more on account of what the right hon. Gentleman has said—I hold that the best plan would be, if the Committee insists upon an additional declaration of supremacy, to embody the declaration in a clause at the end of the Bill. In assenting to the words proposed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman—whether they are agreed to in the form of a proviso or in the form of a clause—we wish it to be clearly understood that we do not mean to go one inch further in the way of accepting Amendments such as will give satisfaction to the Leader of the Opposition and will assist him in his sinister purpose, avowed in public, of destroying the Bill.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had replied in a very polemical way to a speech which might have been polemical, but which did not seem to him to have been so polemical as the reply. The Chief Secretary for Ireland would do well to remember that "a soft answer turneth away wrath." The Prime Minister, he understood, had assented to the principle of the Amendment. He admitted that the place where it was proposed to insert the Amendment was not quite the proper place, and was of opinion that it ought to have taken the form of a Proviso to the 1st clause. He thought that progress would be facilitated if the Government would consent to the addition of the words to the clause under consideration as a temporary expedient, and to their transference at the Report stage to the 1st clause in the form of a Proviso where they would properly find a place. The Government would still be able to safeguard themselves. They had already done so by expressing very clearly what they meant by assenting to the Proviso.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am sorry to say that I consider it an extraordinary demand to make upon us, that the words should be inserted here with a view to their being subsequently transplanted in another place. That is not the proper method of proceeding.

*SIR H. JAMES: Do I understand my right hon. Friend to suggest that the Amendment should stand as Clause No. 2 of the Bill?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I do not think a new clause is always necessarily at the end of a Bill; but, certainly, I am disposed to think the best course would be to place it at the end.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.) asked whether it would be in Order, assuming the Government accepted the proposal for a new clause at the end of the Bill, to discuss the clauses of the Bill in relation to the new clause?

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) said, the right hon. Gentleman had stated with regard to his last Amendment that it rested upon the responsibility of the Government as to the place.

*SIR H. JAMES: We have really got so near together that I had hoped my right hon. Friend would have agreed to its insertion early in the Bill. It is for the Committee to decide the position of the Amendment and not for me; but, personally, sooner than lose the Amendment I would consent to place it as Clause 2.

MR. J. COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) said, that after the construction put upon the Amendment by the Chief Secretary it hardly mattered much where it was inserted. The right hon. Gentleman, whose warmth was the flush of political fever rather than the glow of political health, had given them to understand that wherever the Amendment was placed it would only mean in the eyes of the Government that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament over the Irish Legislature was to be just the same as the supremacy of Parliament over the Legislatures of Queensland, Victoria, and Canada, and everybody knew we could legislate for Canada and Queensland; but would Canada and Queensland take any notice of our legislation? That seemed to him a little trap the Unionists were running into. The Government were proposing another paper guarantee. He could quite understand the pleasant tones of the Prime Minister and Chief Secretary. It was a sort of invitation to walk into my parlour; and the Government would be able, when doubt was expressed as to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, to point to these words as a proof of the explanation—[“Question!” and cries of “Go on!”] It was all very well for Gentlemen on the Front Bench to say “Go on”; but there had been no remonstrances from that Bench against the disorderly interruptions which were continually practised on Unionist speakers. He thought it was high time the Government should try to keep their allies—or rather their masters—in something like order. The real reason why the Chief Secretary and his friends would like to put this in Clause 41 was so as to remove it from any apparent connection with Ireland. The Leader of the Opposition very well pointed that out, and he hoped the right hon. and learned Member for Bury would act on the advice of the Leader of the Opposition. If this were inserted in the 1st or 2nd clause or put in in immediate connection with the Legislature for Ireland it would indicate clearly what they wished to do, and would give force to the declaration which was contained in the Amendment; whereas if it were put in later, where it had no immediate connection with the Legislature in Ireland it would be another paper safeguard.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE thought he could satisfy his right hon. Friend. He would rather not come to an absolute decision at once; but he would undertake that the clause should come before Clause 8.

MR. SEXTON said, the Unionist Party, in their general scheme of opposition to the Bill, were involved in some contradictions, and they might take the present case as an illustration. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury, the parent of this Amendment, no doubt considered it of some importance; but the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Jesse Collings), sitting beside him, had subjected it to ridicule as a “paper safeguard.” Neither the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney), one of the most acute debaters in the House, nor the right hon. and learned Member for Bury (Sir H. James), appeared at all to enjoy the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. Certainly, he could understand the feelings, of the right hon. Member for Bury, who, having drawn this expressive Amendment, and having achieved in reference to it what might be called a Parliamentary triumph, had his triumph ridiculed by the right hon. Gentleman who sat beside him. This Amendment added nothing to what was contained in the Preamble;

Sir H. James

it added nothing satisfactory to what was contained in Clause 33; it did not increase or render more intense the supremacy with which, as the Chief Secretary said, the Bill was saturated. It added nothing to the facts, so that really he was disposed to treat the question whether the Amendment was or was not inserted in the Bill as a matter of no practical importance. Whether the Amendment was inserted in the Bill or not, everything would go on just the same; it would make no difference whatever. But he did think considerations of importance were found on matters connected with the question of the place of the Amendment in the Bill. In the first place, he did not think the Amendment was a Proviso. They might call it a Proviso, but it was not in the nature of a Proviso, though it began with the word "provided." A Proviso was something growing out of the clause, related to the clause; but this was a proposition of the most general, unlimited, and absolute character, which really applied wherever they put it; and, therefore, he should object strongly to treating it as a Proviso limited to any clause. The clause to which it was proposed to add it was one which merely dealt with the making of laws; but the Proviso spoke of "power over all matters and things" which would go beyond the sphere of simply making laws; therefore it was clear it was not a Proviso to the clause to which it was intended to be put. If there were ten thousand reasons for the Proviso, there was one conclusive reason against treating it as a Proviso, which was given by the Leader of the Opposition, when he said—"We want it put in here, because we want to make it a platform for further obstruction."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I did not say that.

MR. SEXTON: That is what it came to.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I said it would be the preface to other Amendments which, of course, the Government are not bound to accept.

MR. SEXTON said, the principle of the Government was that the supremacy did not need to be vitalised in the sense of the word used by the Leader of the Opposition. The principle of the right hon. Gentleman was that he wanted this Proviso inserted here, so that in future clauses, and perhaps future sub-sections of the Bill, he might introduce Amendments interfering with the scheme of the Government, and endeavouring to alter the whole scheme and framework of the Bill; and this, in his judgment, was a conclusive reason why it should not be inserted here, because if it was inserted it would enable hon. Gentlemen to carry on their opposition and prevent the passing of the Bill through the House in the longest Session. His view of the matter was that this was a general proposition relating to the whole Bill, and it should be inserted at the end. If it was inserted in connection with this clause it would be held to have special relation to the making of laws; and why should the supremacy have any more immediate connection with the making of laws than anything else? The supremacy was intended to affect everything—Executive action as well as the making of laws, and why was it wanted to be put after a section relating solely to the making of laws? Because the right hon. Gentleman wanted to use it hereafter as a justification and an invitation to that House to interfere and to intermeddle vexatiously with the Irish Legislature. This was evident, both from the nature of the Amendment itself and also from what he thought was the intention of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, that the supremacy should be in Ireland as elsewhere, and he thought this Proviso should not be appended to a clause affecting the Legislature, because it would be held hereafter that it was inserted there to justify an interference with the Irish Legislature, which they hoped would not be necessary.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.) said, he hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would not recede from his Amendment, or accept the offer of the Prime Minister to introduce a clause asserting the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament some time at the end of July. He was under some disadvantage in arguing the point, inasmuch as not one Member of the Government was present.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. RENTOUL, continuing, said, it was pleasant to find that the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. H. H. Fowler) was now present, and that he, at least, among Members of the Government, took some interest in the supremacy of Parliament. It had been said all along on this matter that it was unnecessary to declare the supremacy of Parliament as it already existed, and that it could not be expected to exist in stronger force than it did. That might be so in a legal sense; but they knew very well that they could not enforce the supremacy without the insertion of words in the Bill. At one moment they were told the supremacy was covered by the Preamble of the Bill; at another that a clause should be introduced to assert the supremacy. For his part, he was glad to think that the Government were now willing to declare in the authoritative part of the Bill that the supremacy of this Parliament did exist, and that it could not possibly be taken away. It would be impossible to assert it in action unless they put it in the Bill. It would be of no vital force whatever unless it were inserted in the Bill, and they on his side of the House wanted a clear declaration in the Bill. They did not share the trust of the Government in the Nationalist Members—a trust which, in the case of right hon. Gentlemen opposite, had only been shown during the past six or seven years. They believed that the Government really meant that this Parliament should be supreme; but the Nationalist Members did not mean that. It was perfectly true men might change their opinions, but if Irish Members had done that they had not said so, for there had been no retraction of former views on the part of those hon. Members. The late Mr. Parnell had not withdrawn any of his declared views; neither had the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond); the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. J. M'Carthy); the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor); nor had the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon). If they had withdrawn or altered their expressed opinions he had not seen any evidence of it. They had been told that the supremacy of this Parliament existed in all parts of the British Empire in a condition that was one and indivisible. If those words meant anything, they implied that the supremacy in Canada and the Colonies was the same as it would be in Ireland. That was not enough. They desired that the supremacy in the case of Ireland should be the same as in Kent or Suffolk. They wanted a supremacy capable of being enforced in a practical manner. Until that evening the statement had not been made that the Government would consent to have the supremacy declared by a clause. The Prime Minister had offered that if the right hon. and learned Member for Bury (Sir H. James) would draft a clause the Government would accept it. In that case it would not come before the Committee until the months of July or August. Under the circumstances they desired the right hon. and learned Gentleman to adhere to his Amendment. What was the value of any legal enactment if there were no machinery for carrying it into effect? They wanted the enactment to come in at the end of Clause 2, and they would then be able to propose machinery for carrying it out. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour) had pointed out that the announcement made by the Prime Minister showed that the new Parliament would not derive its existence from Grattan's Parliament, but by Statute, and that which that House created naturally that House could at any time destroy or modify. The Leader of the Opposition had well said that a declaration of supremacy in the Act would serve as an Instruction to the Irish Parliament which would be constantly before their eyes. If no such declaration were inserted in the Bill the Irish Parliament might say, not without reason, that they had been led to believe that no such supremacy was ever to be exercised. The hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton), in his extreme desire to have the suggestion of the clause negatived—

MR. SEXTON: No.

MR. RENTOUL said, that gave them the idea that there was something very considerable at stake. The Prime Minister offered a clause to be inserted in the Bill after Clause 2—that was to say, it was to be Clause 3. But such a clause could only be inserted in the Bill after all the other clauses had been discussed. Their point was to get the declaration of supremacy into the Bill now. The hon. Member for Kerry said that they wanted a platform for obstruction. That was not so. What they did this for was as a platform for machinery. The declaration of supremacy was not merely for the purpose of preserving the dignity of the Imperial Parliament, but as a safeguard for the loyal minority in Ireland. They wished to have machinery to carry out effectively the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament and to preserve its dignity. That was the chief object of the loyal minority in Ireland. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury would stand to his Amendment, as, by postponing the matter until July or August, they would be precluded from applying the machinery necessary to the fulfilment of the purpose they desired carried out.

MR. CAMERON CORBETT (Glasgow, Tradeston) said, it seemed to him that the assertion of the supremacy was the more necessary after what had been said in the course of the Debate. When the Government had urged that the supremacy was inalienable, and when they had refused to call the Irish Legislature subordinate, because they wanted to draw no distinction between it and the Colonial Legislatures, it had become plain that the supremacy over the Irish Legislature was to be of the same character as that over the Colonial Legislatures. If that were the case it seemed to him that the constituencies throughout the country were, to a very large extent, deceived during the last Election. In the Colonies the people realised that the only safeguard for their interests consisted in the character of the sense of fair play of Members elected to represent them in their Legislature. In the present Bill, as it stood, absolutely the only safeguard the minority in Ireland would have would be the character and the sense of fair play of the Representatives of the majority of the people. He believed that when the people of Scotland at last realised that the fate of their brother Presbyterians in the North of Ireland had no stronger guarantee than the sense of fair play and the tolerance of the Representatives of the majority of the Irish people they would be very slow to support a measure of this character. In the future, if the measure were carried without Amendment, the Imperial Forces would be maintained to force men to obey laws which Englishmen believed to be unjust and cruel—laws which were in accordance with Irish ideas, but not in accordance with the ideas of the people of the United Kingdom, who, however, would still have the responsibility of enforcing those laws in which they did not believe.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) remarked that the two sides of the House did not look upon the question of supremacy from the same standpoint. What had been said by the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) went a certain way to prove this; but he should like to draw the attention of the Committee to an article which appeared in October last in The Nineteenth Century from the pen of the hon. and learned Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond.) The hon. and learned Member in that article quoted a long extract from a statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce) declaring that the supremacy of Parliament was inalienable, and the hon. and learned Member subscribed to that doctrine, but went on to say—

“For my present purpose I accept that as a true description of the position from a strictly Constitutional point of view. The rights of the Imperial Parliament, after the creation of the Irish Legislature, would remain intact. Those rights would remain dormant as far as Irish affairs are concerned.”

That was the hon. and learned Member's view of supremacy. It was, however, the very opposite of the view of the right hon. Gentleman who had moved the Amendment. The hon. and learned Member went on to say—

“A Parliamentary compact would be entered into binding the Imperial Parliament to leave these rights dormant.”

Was the assertion in the Bill part of the “Parliamentary compact”?

“Such a compact, of course, cannot in strict theory bind successive Governments; but in practice it must have that effect, by imposing a moral obligation on Parliament not to act contrary to the Statute. We would expect a clause in the Home Rule Bill to specially provide and undertake that whilst the Irish Parliament continued in existence the power of the Imperial Parliament to legislate for Ireland would never be used.”

He (Mr. T. W. Russell) would like to know from the Government whether this was their idea of supremacy? Of course, they could not possibly concede the demand of the hon. and learned Member for Waterford ; that would be too absurd. Had they come to a compact with the hon. and learned Gentleman, who sat silent during the Debate, that he was not to press for a specific clause, on the ground that the assertion in the Preamble was all nonsense ?

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Waterford) : No compact has been entered into with me.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he was quite sure that there had been no compact with the hon. and learned Member. Had his Party numbered 19 instead of nine he would have got all he wanted. The hon. and learned Member must, however, see that the position of the Unionists with regard to supremacy was a different position from his. The hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) had objected to the insertion of the Amendment in the Bill at this point, because, in his opinion, it would pave the way for further obstruction.

MR. SEXTON : That was one reason.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he would tell the hon. Member the way in which he viewed it. The Amendment undoubtedly amounted to the assertion of supremacy ; but the mere assertion without machinery to make it effective would be of precious little use. Let there be no mistake about it. Let the Government and the hon. Member for North Kerry understand that if the Amendment were carried, it would establish a basis for the adoption of effective machinery to carry it out. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. J. Morley) had maintained that the supremacy intended to be given by this Bill was, practically, the same supremacy as was given elsewhere. But were there any safeguards in the British North America Act for any minority ? In 1867, when the Canadian Confederation was agreed upon, the Canadians were practically unanimous, and there was no minority to safeguard like that in Ireland. If there had been, he had no doubt safeguards would have been provided. The supremacy which suited Canada without a minority demanding protection was not a supremacy that would suit Ireland with a minority which the Government admitted ought to be protected. Let the Committee, therefore, thoroughly understand that the Amendment of his right

Mr. T. W. Russell

hon. Friend was the first of a series designed to make the supremacy effective. The question of enforcing the supremacy, if ever occasion should arise, would have to be dealt with. It would be perfectly legitimate to establish an Imperial force in Ireland for the assertion of the Imperial supremacy. What was the good of Imperial supremacy if it had no power to enforce its will ? The two sides of the House, as he had said, were not talking about the same thing. The supporters of the Government wanted a paper supremacy ; they wanted a mere fraud——

MR. MANFIELD (Northampton) : Mr. Mellor, I rise to Order. Is it right for the hon. Member to make such a charge against us ?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, that if he had hurt anyone's feelings he would at once withdraw the expression. The ideal of the Ministerialists, at all events, was a mere paper supremacy. The Unionists, however, wanted an effective supremacy. If the Committee adopted the Amendment and went no further, the supremacy would be a sham. He had never asked for safeguards, and did not believe in them ; but, if there were to be any at all, he was determined that the Government should not go to the British electors and parade before them sham safeguards as being beneficial to the Irish minority. The Unionists intended to let the electors know exactly what the Government and their supporters were doing. They intended to make it clear that, instead of adopting real safeguards, the majority of the House were simply inventing shams to deceive the electors.

MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow) said, he had been of opinion from the first that mere words, either by way of preamble or by way of enactment, would have little or no effect in securing that supremacy which the Government and their supporters were pledged to the country not to interfere with by the Bill. If the House wished to secure the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament it must do so by machinery, and not by mere words either of preamble or of declaration. He had no hesitation in saying that if the clauses of the Bill were to be turned out of the Committee in the same shape as that in which they had entered it and the preamble remained as it was, the measure would be a fraud and a pretence.

The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. J. Morley) said not only that the Bill was redolent of supremacy, but that it was saturated with supremacy. He did not wish to say anything that would be considered rude; therefore, he would refrain from making the comment that was on his lips. They were told, however, that the Bill was saturated with supremacy. Without complaining of the ruling of the Chairman last night, he might allude to the Amendment ~~he~~ (Mr. Ambrose) had been prevented from moving to show what their position would be if the Proviso proposed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury were not accepted. They had adopted the words "for the peace, order, and good government of Ireland," and he had had an Amendment on the Paper proposing to give to Ireland a central Local Government Board, and to transfer various other Departments to Ireland in the same way. The ruling of the Chairman had been that that Amendment was inconsistent with the words he had quoted, and which had already been incorporated in the Bill. If the clause were not amended with the proposed Proviso when hon. Members came to propose their Amendments which were intended to secure the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament they would be told that their Amendments were inconsistent with this clause. In the clause itself there was matter which was absolutely inconsistent with the supremacy of the Parliament at Westminster. The Irish Parliament was to have powers in respect of the "peace, order, and good government" of the country; and though there were certain exemptions in Clause 3, if they took Clauses 2, 5, and 10 there was sufficient in them to exclude, he would not say the theoretical supremacy to which the Solicitor General referred, but the practical supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. Clause 2 gave a general power—that was admitted. Then there were exemptions which withdrew from the Irish Parliaments nearly every subject of interest which the Irish Members would like to deal with. There were two points on which there was no exemption. There was no exemption whatever with regard to the subject of taxation. The Bill left power to the Irish Parliament to tax Irish subjects at pleasure, except in so far as that power was modified by subsequent sections of the Bill. Now, if the Irish Parliament had the right to tax, it followed that, in addition, they had the right to refuse taxes. They had the right to refuse the necessary supplies for the maintenance of the Imperial Government in Ireland, and for the maintenance of the Government of Ireland, whether Imperial or Irish. As he had said before, he cared very little for mere words. He should not think that this Proviso would in itself do anything to accomplish the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. He believed in machinery. Well, one of the important points and tests of supremacy was the power of taxation. Give away their power of taxation, and they gave away their supremacy. What was it that gave to the House of Commons its power in the British Constitution? It was its right to impose taxes, and with the right to impose taxes the right to refuse taxes when they thought proper, and to originate Money Bills. So important was that consideration that from the earliest times the right had been asserted and jealously maintained. Even at the present day the House of Lords was not allowed to amend a Money Bill. When a Money Bill was sent up to the House of Lords from the Commons the House of Lords must either reject it or pass it. That indicated the importance of the money question—and our relations with the United States also indicated it. It was on that point that we lost America. The Northern States resisted the taxation by Great Britain, and Great Britain gave up its power of taxation; but with that power it gave up its supremacy, and America acquired absolute independence. He wished to ask the Solicitor General his opinion on the 10th clause. ["Order, order!"]

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Gentleman must not discuss the 10th clause.

MR. AMBROSE said, that he did not intend to discuss the clause, and, with all submission to the Chairman, he was within his right. [Cries of "Order!"] The point of Order was a matter he had considered, and he maintained that he was within his right, because he was justifying his construction—[Renewed cries of "Order!"]—he did not often speak therefore, he would appeal—

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Gentleman may refer to the 10th clause, but I have pointed out that he must not discuss it.

*MR. AMBROSE said, he only wished to refer to it for the purpose of proving the construction he had put on the 2nd clause. The 2nd and 3rd subsections, of the 10th clause set forth—

“(2) The duties of Customs and Excise and the duties on postage shall be imposed by Act of Parliament, but subject to the provisions of this Act the Irish Legislature may, in order to provide for the Public Service of Ireland, impose any other taxes.

“(3) Save as in this Act mentioned, all matters relating to the taxes in Ireland and the collection and management thereof shall be regulated by Irish Act, and the same shall be collected and managed by the Irish Government and form part of the Public Revenues of Ireland.”

If the Irish Parliament refused Supplies, or attempted to pass a Bill forbidden under the restrictions of the 3rd and 4th clauses, what would happen? Everyone knew the power of the purse. Suppose the Irish Parliament said to the Lord Lieutenant—“If you don't pass this Bill we will not grant you Supplies?” If that occurred, where are you? How would the money be obtained to keep and maintain the officials of the Government and to prevent absolute anarchy from taking place? Could the Solicitor General say, in face of the 2nd and 10th clauses, that the Imperial Parliament could impose taxes in Ireland? If they parted with the power of taxation, as he thought he had shown they had, where was the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament? The Executive in Ireland, as the hon. Member for North Kerry had rightly said, would be the servants or agents of the Irish Parliament. How, then, were they to be at the command of the Imperial Parliament? The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Haddington had said that the power of levying taxation must be given whenever the power of legislating was conferred. That power, he had pointed out, was inherent in Local Boards and County Councils. But in the case of those Bodies, if they sought to levy unjust rates, their proceedings could be quashed in a Court of Law; or, if they did not exercise the functions they were required to exercise, they could be compelled to do so by a mandamus. In these cases the power of levying rates was controlled by the Imperial Government through the medium of the Law Courts. But that would not be the case with reference to Irish legislation. There would be no Courts to keep the Irish Legislature within its proper jurisdiction—to quash their orders when they exceeded their powers, or to compel them to issue orders when they neglected to do so. It was said that a remedy would be found in the Privy Council; but that body would be useless from that point of view.

*MR. STRACHEY (Somerset, S.) did not wish to give another silent vote on the subject of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman pressed his Amendment to a Division, it would be necessary for him (Mr. Strachey) to vote for it, because he could not see what harm there could be in giving expression to Imperial supremacy on the Bill itself. He thought that the Amendment would satisfy, not only many hon. Members, but many persons outside the House—satisfy their prejudices, or whatever they might be called. The argument of the Government was that the Irish people were to be trusted to carry out the Bill in a fair and proper spirit; and, that being granted, why on earth could not the Government say—“We may run the risk of the supremacy not being so strong, but if the Amendment satisfies a great many persons inside and outside the House we accept it.”

*SIR E. CLARKE (Plymouth): There is one point which, I think, will interest the Committee at this moment, and that is—what is the position which the Government propose to take if this Amendment is pressed to a Division?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am interested in knowing what is to be the response to my invitation. I have had no answer to the appeal I made to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury.

*SIR E. CLARKE: The right hon. Gentleman says he has had no answer to the appeal he made to my right hon. and learned Friend; therefore I may be allowed to call to the recollection of the Committee what took place at the beginning of the discussion. When the right hon. and learned Gentleman proposed the Amendment the Prime Minister expressed himself as entirely satisfied; and the right hon. and learned Member gave some reasons, which, I think, were very good reasons, for believing that the part of the Bill in which he proposed to introduce these words was the right part at which their declaration should be inserted. Then the Prime Minister, in his gracious and winning manner, made the most charming of Ministerial answers. He approved of the form of the Amendment; he sympathised with the object of it; he was at one with my right hon. and learned Friend in substance and intention; but, at the same time, he asked, not as a stipulation on which he was going to insist, but as if it were a favour, that the right hon. and learned Member would be good enough not to insist upon this Amendment at this time, but allow it to be postponed until we come to deal with new clauses. I listened to that appeal, and I did not wonder that my right hon. and learned Friend for a moment yielded and did not see to what point he was being led. The important thing with regard to this matter is that we should get this Amendment in, as early as possible in the discussion, as a definite declaration of the supremacy.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The hon. and learned Member is mistaken. The purport of my offer to my right hon. Friend was to insert the clause somewhere before Clause 3—that is as early as he proposes.

*SIR E. CLARKE: I heard the whole discussion, and I will point out to the right hon. Gentleman that his supposed concession is no concession at all. It does not matter a jot where the new clause is put in the Bill. To my thinking, the thing that matters is this. If this Amendment is relegated to the position of a new clause it will come on for discussion somewhere in July, when the whole Bill, including the Financial Clauses, will all have been subjected to discussion in this House; and if we are unwise enough to part with this clause and allow it to be postponed until the latest stage of the Bill, whenever on the intervening clauses we may desire to discuss their effect on the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament we shall be met by the declaration—"We, the Government, have promised you a clause, and you must wait till the moment you see it before you can discuss it." I am glad that my right hon. and learned Friend did not accept the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, and I sincerely hope that he will be firm in his resolve to have this declaration, of which the Prime Minister has in terms approved, inserted in this part of the Bill. If we want an illustration of the importance of the point at which we have now arrived we should find it in the interesting fact that the long silence of the Irish Benches has been broken. The hon. and learned Member for Louth and the hon. Member for North Kerry have actually made speeches—not ejaculations, not epithets, but actually speeches—on the proposal before the Committee. It is perfectly clear, from the speech of the hon. Member for North Kerry, that he means to resist now and at any time the insertion of this declaration.

MR. SEXTON: No; not at all.

SIR E. CLARKE: That he meant to resist what we believe to be essential.

MR. SEXTON: On the contrary, I agreed to the declaration; but I pointed out that this is not a Proviso; it is not limited to this clause, but it applies to the whole Bill, and it ought to be inserted as an independent clause.

SIR E. CLARKE: I think it was clear from the hon. Member's speech that he meant to say that no such declaration was necessary in the Bill at all, and that he would resist the insertion of any such declaration in the Bill.

MR. SEXTON: I said the very reverse. I said it added nothing to the declaration already in the Preamble, but that I had no objection to the insertion of it as a clause.

*SIR E. CLARKE: That is exactly my point—that the Government, under the inspiration or direction or advice of the hon. Member for Kerry, and those who act with him, are resisting the putting of this declaration into the Bill.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: We propose to accept it.

SIR E. CLARKE: The right hon. Gentleman says he proposes to accept it.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I said I was waiting for the answer of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury.

*SIR E. CLARKE: I think that answer has been given to the right hon. Gentleman. ["No, no!"] The right hon. and learned Gentleman said the question was one for the Committee. It is clear that the Committee will not permit the withdrawal of this proposal, but will persist on its being put from the Chair. We are, therefore, entitled to know whether the Government are going to vote in favour of or against this proposal, the principle of which they say they agree with. I should like to add that the 2nd clause, to which it is proposed to attach the proviso, is exactly the right place at which to make such a declaration. The 1st clause constitutes the Legislative Assembly; but the 2nd clause grants to the Irish Legislature power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Ireland. It is when we are conferring that power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Ireland, that it becomes essential to show that these powers are not granted in derogation of the power which the Imperial Parliament possesses in all parts of the Empire. I do not agree with my two hon. Friends who spoke last. I do not agree with the hon. Member for South Tyrone and the hon. Member who spoke from this side as to the worthlessness of paper declarations in an Act of Parliament; and I am quite prepared to hear the flouts and jeers that are given to those who are merely Constitutional lawyers. I attach some importance to declarations in Acts of Parliament, and I cannot forget what the conduct of the Government was in 1886. In that year they put into their Bill the 37th clause, which was a specific declaration with regard to the powers of the Imperial Parliament. When the draftsman of that Bill (Lord Thring) wrote his article explaining the drafting, he said that it had been the desire of the Government, when legislative power was given to the Legislative Assembly, that there should be a clause by which the Irish Members, in accepting the gift, should accept the limitation of it at the same time. They put that into their Bill of 1886. Why is it not desirable or necessary to put it in the Bill now? I may be allowed to speak on this matter, because I think I was the first to protest against the enshrining in the Preamble of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. I am glad we have got to the point when the Government accept the proposition I made, and agree that the Bill itself shall contain a declaration as to the powers of the Imperial Parliament.

Sir E. Clarke

It is no use for the Government to tell us that they are prepared at some future time to accept this proposal. What we want to know is whether they will accept the proposal made to them to-night. If they will, then I do not want to consider what other Amendments may be proposed. I agree that the Government are free—as declared by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant—not to consider any Amendment as consequential, but to meet all Amendments fairly and independently when they are proposed in this House. It is not with that view that I desire to have this declaration in the Bill. I wish to have in the effective clauses, as early as can be, in the most appropriate place, a declaration of the undiminished, unaffected supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister is in a position to see that he will have to deal with the question, aye or no, will he or will he not accept, this Proviso in the Bill? I venture to think that it would very much tend to the shortening of this discussion and to the clearing of the views of the Committee on the subject, if the right hon. Gentleman would now tell us, aye or no, whether, when this proposal is put from the Chair, he will support it?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am only waiting for the answer of my right hon. and learned Friend.

*SIR H. JAMES: The right hon. Gentleman says he is waiting for my answer. I thought I had given my answer before the adjournment. When my right hon. Friend said that he would insert the proposal as a new clause I categorically replied, and said that the matter was in the hands of the Committee, and that it was not a matter on which I could bind the Committee. I also added that, as far as I was personally concerned, if the alternative lay between losing the words of the Amendment and the suggestion which the Prime Minister made—personally I should accept the suggestion.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am aware of the fact that the right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the matter was in the hands of the Committee. But what I understand is, that he is satisfied with the proposal made.

*SIR H. JAMES: My extreme desire was to have these words inserted in the place at which I moved their insertion.

The right hon. Gentleman will recollect that in moving the Amendment I gave my reasons for wishing their insertion at this particular portion of the Bill.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I intend to adhere to the offer I have made, and I have not yet got an answer to that offer.

*SIR H. JAMES: I have stated as distinctly as I could the position I occupy. I am sorry if I have not made my meaning clear. I can only repeat what I have already said. I hope the Prime Minister will accept the answer I have already given.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): Ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I think my right hon. and learned Friend has made his meaning perfectly clear. As far as he is personally concerned he has moved his Amendment, and he stands by it; but, rather than lose it altogether, he himself is prepared to accept the suggestion of the Prime Minister. I am only repeating what has been said by my right hon. and learned Friend. Now, I think it is for us to ask the Prime Minister, under these circumstances, what is the position of the Government? Do they insist upon the alternative which they have suggested to my right hon. and learned Friend, which he personally is willing to accept under stress, but which he has told them plainly he thinks not so favourable as his own original proposition, or will they accept the Amendment as a Proviso to Clause 2? That is a plain question—we in our turn are entitled to a categorical answer.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: My answer to that is that if, as I understand, my right and learned Friend agrees to accept our proposal, though he prefers his original plan, obviously his course is to ask the Committee for leave to withdraw his Amendment. That is my proposal. If he asks leave to withdraw his Amendment, then he accepts my proposal; if he does not ask leave to withdraw his Amendment, then he rejects my proposal. If he will state what course he will take, then I will state what course I will pursue.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Of course, my right hon. Friend has not given an answer to the question put to him. It is no use asking my right hon. and learned Friend to withdraw his Amendment, because it is perfectly evident that, if he did, leave would be refused.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I do not ask him to withdraw. I wish him to ask leave to withdraw.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Surely we want to come to practical business. What is the good of my right hon. and learned Friend asking the leave of the Committee to do anything which he knows beforehand it will not grant? The Prime Minister knows as well as anybody that the Amendment will not be withdrawn. Very well. I ask, under these circumstances, what is the Government going to do? The difference between the two sides of the House would appear to an uninstructed stranger as absolutely infinitesimal. The question before the Committee is whether the proposal made by my right hon. and learned Friend shall be put as a separate clause, between Clauses 2 and 3, or whether it shall be added as a Proviso to the 2nd clause? Can anyone conceive a smaller issue than that? [Cries of "Why not agree" from the Ministerial Benches.] My hon. Friends say, "Why not agree?" That is precisely what I ask; I am not going to tell the Committee why we shall not agree. I have said it would "appear" to be infinitesimal. If it were infinitesimal, why on earth should the Prime Minister have made any difficulty? If the Prime Minister thought it to be not of the slightest importance, do you suppose that he would have delayed the proceedings on this Bill for two or three hours? No; this is one of the cases which not infrequently arise in Committee in which, where apparently a difference is infinitesimal, a difference in words or a difference in methods cover a very serious difference in principle. The difference in principle is this. We know that the Government are perfectly ready to grant any words we like to ask for which do not go beyond a paper supremacy. I admit that in a Preamble or a clause the Government are willing to give us all the satisfaction we can desire, provided that the promise of supremacy in the Bill is not made effective in the Bill. The Nationalist Members are willing to accept this Amendment. The hon. Member for North Kerry said he did not think it went one jot beyond the Preamble. The Amendment, however, has been raised with a distinct view, in order to put it before the House as the first of a series of Amendments which would make the supremacy effective. We take this as a datum line, and we want the Government to accept it as a foundation for the subsequent Amendments. When the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary said, as he did in answer to the Leader of the Opposition, that when the Committee came to these subsequent Amendments the Government would reject them, in so doing the right hon. Gentleman took away all interest in the present Amendment. We do not thank the Government for accepting this Amendment unless they do so in the spirit in which it is proposed. The spirit and intention, surely, are of some importance. I pointed out on a previous occasion that while using exactly the same words right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench and hon. Gentlemen who support them are using these words in absolutely opposite senses. I am very glad to see the hon. Member for Waterford in his place. The hon. Gentleman stated in writing that he himself would come down to this House and would move Amendments to define the principle of supremacy, so as to make it impossible that this Parliament should interfere with affairs committed to the Irish Parliament by this Bill. I have not seen those Amendments up to the present.

MR. J. REDMOND (Waterford): The right hon. Gentleman is mistaken. I never stated that I would move Amendments to make it impossible for this Parliament to interfere, because my view is that, whatever Amendments were moved or carried in that direction, the power of this Parliament to interfere will still remain.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The hon. Member has interrupted me again and again when I referred to this matter; but he always makes a statement absolutely irrelevant to the one I make. The hon. Member has said two things not necessarily connected—two things that ought to be treated separately. The hon. Member has said that the theoretical supremacy of this Parliament cannot be disputed or disposed of. I quite agree with that, but I do not care one brass farthing for that theoretical supremacy. I know what the theoretical supremacy of this Parliament is over Australia and Canada, and I do not want to set up in the case of Ireland a supremacy which is worth no more than the supremacy over Australia and Canada. The hon. Gentleman, so long ago as October, 1892, declared his intention to make it perfectly clear that the supremacy of this Parliament over the Irish Parliament should be limited. The hon. Member was referring to a speech made by the Chancellor of the Duchy in which the right hon. Gentleman appeared to have said—

“It is not a question of asking us to divest ourselves of this power, because we could not do so.”

That is the legal fiction—that is the imposture which has been exposed to-night, and the hon. Member knows perfectly well that it is an imposture. Referring to these words of the Chancellor of the Duchy, the hon. Member for Waterford in his article said—

“The rights of the Imperial Parliament would remain intact; those rights would remain dormant, so far as Irish affairs are concerned. A Parliamentary compact would be entered into binding the Imperial Parliament to leave those rights dormant.”

I will now quote the hon. Member again, because he is perfectly consistent, and why he should endeavour in this Committee to prove himself inconsistent I cannot imagine. This is a passage from his speech in the Debate on the Address in August, 1892—

“It comes to this, therefore: that what we ask is this—that in this Home Rule scheme there shall be a specific undertaking—a clause specifically undertaking that while the Irish Parliament continues in existence the powers of the Imperial Parliament to legislate for Ireland should never be used.”

Now, Sir, after that, what is the use of the hon. Member getting up and interrupting me and trying to minimise the significance of his own words? Let the hon. Member get up and say he has changed his mind.

MR. J. E. REDMOND: No.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Well, then, the hon. Member has not changed his mind. Now, Sir, I have all I want for the purposes of my argument. This is the cruz of the whole Bill. It only shows how hon. Members who call themselves Liberals are entering upon a project for destroying the Empire. If I wished I could go on quoting from hon.

Mr. J. Chamberlain

Members belonging to the larger section of the Nationalist Party language which practically comes to the same thing as the language of the hon. Member for Waterford; but it will be sufficient to take the hon. Member as representing not only the opinion of himself and his Colleagues, but the opinion of all the Nationalists of Ireland. And now the Government are putting themselves at the mercy of the Nationalist Party, because, while you are saying one thing, the Nationalist Party are saying another. They do not say it in this House. They have good reason for not saying it. But are you so weak; are you so foolish as to be deceived by their silence? When this Bill is passed the Nationalist Party will say, and they will have a perfect right to say—"You gave us this Constitution knowing that we said we only accepted it on the understanding that your Imperial supremacy would for ever remain dormant, and you sat silent and allowed the Bill to pass." That is the question raised by this Amendment. The question is whether there is to be an effective supremacy of the Imperial Parliament over all persons and matters in Ireland after a local Legislature has been established there.

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Waterford) said, it seemed to him that the words "supremacy of the Imperial Parliament" had an entirely different meaning in the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and those he represented, than it had in the mouth and mind of himself. The right hon. Gentleman and his friends seemed to mean the exercise of the right of control and revision, as the Leader of the Opposition once put it, day after day in every detail of Irish public affairs, constituting thereby the Imperial Parliament after they had given Home Rule to Ireland, a sort of Court of Appeal upon every single act in every Irish matter of the Irish Parliament. To his mind the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament meant an entirely different thing. In that declaration of his, which he had heard repeated so often in the House that he really was sick of it, he used the word "dormant," and that word seemed to be translated by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham into "dead." Of course, it must be evident to every man that in the case of Ireland, as in the case of every part of the Empire to which they had given representative institutions, they must, by the very concessions of these representative institutions, make a compact with the country that they would allow it to manage its own affairs free from capricious interference upon their part, with local matters. What he meant by the supremacy of Parliament was this—that if Home Rule were granted to Ireland, Ireland was to be allowed in her own Legislature, free from the interference—the stupid, meddlesome, and ignorant interference of that House, to manage her own affairs subject to this condition: that the Imperial Parliament had the power, which, in his belief, it could not divest itself of by any Act or any section of an Act. [Opposition cries of "Oh!"] He was expressing an opinion that was not merely his own opinion, but was the opinion of the greatest Constitutional lawyers of the Kingdom—that the Imperial Parliament would have the power to interfere to prevent any act or oppression or injustice. It might seem egotistical in him to quote his own statements; but, really, there was a good excuse for him. Hon. Members had quoted over and over again from speeches he had made, not from those he delivered on the First and Second Reading of the Bill, but from speeches made many years back. He held in his hand a speech which he made in that House in 1892, in which he said, on this very point of the supremacy of Parliament—

"The Imperial Parliament is supreme. None of us desire to touch its supremacy, and it must remain to the end of things the supreme Imperial Parliament. It cannot divest itself of that supremacy. But I and others gather from the constant repetition of the phrase that what is desired and intended by some people is that after you have given us a right to an Irish Legislature to deal with Irish affairs, you wish to constitute this House a sort of Court of Appeal before which every act of the Irish Parliament would be brought up, reconsidered, interfered with, and destroyed."

That was the position he took up—and he did not at all hesitate to declare frankly what he had always held—that it was the duty of Irish Nationalists so to mould whatever Home Rule Bill was passed as to make it as difficult and as troublesome as possible for the Imperial Parliament to interfere in purely Irish matters. He had never denied that, no matter what they might put into the Bill, the Imperial Parliament would have the power to interfere if it liked. But his desire was—and it was the meaning of the Amendment of which he had spoken more than once—so to frame the Bill that it could not be a matter of everyday occurrence for that Parliament to interfere in every petty detail of Irish life. An hon. Member who spoke that night, and, he believed, a countryman of his, used the phrase that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament was to be exercised over Ireland in the same way as it was exercised over Kent and Sussex. That was an absurdity. Either reject this Bill altogether—that would be a perfectly intelligent course—or, if they granted a Legislature to Ireland, it followed of necessity that they must permit that Legislature, in purely local affairs, to manage these local affairs according to local sentiment. The Irish Nationalists, on their part, desired to insist that it would be a sham and an imposture if they were to give a Legislature to Ireland, with the intention in their minds not to allow that Legislature to manage the purely local affairs of Ireland, free from the meddlesome interference of the Imperial Parliament. But they stated at the same time that the Imperial Parliament had the power—a power which they believed it could not divest itself of, and of which they would have no right to complain if it were exercised to put down any intolerable acts of oppression, which they believed would not arise in Ireland, but such, if they did arise, they would be glad to see any power step in and destroy.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I wish to have this matter set straight. Let me say, in the first instance, that I accept the assurance of the hon. Member. I have never taunted the hon. Member with inconsistency. I believe he has been absolutely consistent, and I should not blame him if he said he had changed his opinions; but what I want to know is whether the hon. Member has changed his opinions? The speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman had nothing whatever to do with the point I raised. The hon. and learned Member said that he protested against interference with every petty detail being a matter of every day occurrence. Of course, there is no sensible person in the House who believes that any interference of that kind would be possible or justifiable. It would reduce the proceedings of this House to a farce, and would be justly resented by the people of Ireland. Therefore, if I could regard exclusively the speech made by the hon. and learned Member just now, I would be practically in agreement with him. But the statement which the hon. and learned Member had just made is not the same as he made in August, 1892. The hon. and learned Member then said that the powers of the Imperial Parliament to legislate for Ireland should never be used. I agree with the hon. and learned Member that the powers of the Imperial Parliament should not be used in every petty detail of every day occurrences; but what the hon. and learned Gentleman has said is that those powers should never be used. He also said—

“We do not object to the retention of the right of revision, of amendment, review, and repeal of specific Acts of the Irish Parliament acting within its proper limits. We, therefore, claim that in purely Irish affairs we shall have full and supreme control.”

Hitherto, in arguing the matter I assumed that on the Ministerial side of the House there was an absolute concurrence of opinion that the supremacy of Parliament should be maintained intact and unimpaired over all persons and all matters; but from the cheers which interrupted me a moment ago it appears that there are some Members on the Ministerial side of the House who support the contention of the hon. and learned Member for Waterford that the powers attaching to supremacy should never be used in Irish affairs. Oh! this spectacle of a united Party. They will not say what they mean by the supremacy of Parliament because they have not yet agreed upon the point themselves. Well, Sir, I have got a quotation from another article written by the hon. and learned Member at a later date. [Cries of “Oh!”] I will not be interrupted; I will not be contradicted; and when my accuracy is challenged I shall certainly prove my case. In October, 1892, the hon. and learned Member wrote—

“The power, which in the case of the Colonies is harmless because it is a dead letter, would in the case of Ireland be a reality, and would be a perpetual source of humiliation, of heart burning, and of danger. We therefore say that a formal compact must be entered into that, while the Irish Parliament lasts, it will be permitted sole and unfettered authority on all purely Irish affairs, free from interference by the Imperial Parliament, and subject only to the constitutional veto of the Crown."

The hon. and learned Member will apparently have the support of certain Members of the Gladstonian Party. But I appeal to the bulk of that Party, to the men who are pledged up to their eyes to their constituents to maintain the effective supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. I appeal from the supporters of the Government to the Government itself. The Prime Minister himself has said, the Chief Secretary for Ireland has said, that whenever the Irish Parliament did anything oppressive or unjust the Imperial Parliament would have an immediate and effective right of interference, and of course that involves that the question of the injustice or oppression must be decided by the opinion of the majority of this House, and not by the opinion of the Members of the Irish Legislature. Then what we want is that these declared intentions of the Government shall be carried out. We desire to retain in the Imperial Parliament an effective supremacy, the effective right and power to interfere whenever the Irish Legislature does anything oppressive or unjust.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : My right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham has pursued his double avocation—first of all, of converting into a matter of hot and envenomed Debate that which is between the right hon. and learned Member for Bury and Her Majesty's Government, and which was a perfectly pacific and friendly discussion. That is the position which the right hon. Gentleman has chosen for himself in this House. And he has also endeavoured to determine and apply with unflinching rigour to the hon. and learned Member for Waterford that law of consistency which he disclaims for himself. In inconsistencies, in contradictions, in waverings, and in violent speeches, made in both extremes, no man in the House can for a moment compete with my right hon. Friend, and it would be an interminable task to bring into juxtaposition his innumerable contrarieties against himself. With respect to the hon. and learned Member for Waterford, what I have to say is this—that neither can I undertake to say how far the hon. Member's declarations at one time or another observes that inconsistency which I in vain look for in the declarations of policy of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham who now, arraigns the hon. Member, and I have listened to the declarations of the hon. Member for Waterford to-night and on former occasions, and I have heard the hon. Member give what appears to me to be a rational, just, and constitutional account of the supremacy of the Crown, and as to the use of that supremacy in the government of Ireland. I am bound to say also that in one portion of the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham an account was given of the application and use of the supremacy in the government of Ireland which appeared to me in some degree to approach the language and spirit of reason and good sense. I accept the declaration of the hon. and learned Member for Waterford as being given in good faith. I hold the hon. and learned Member bound to his words, and what is a great deal more, the hon. and learned Member will hold himself bound to his declaration in its terms and spirit. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham has used in one portion of his speech some extreme language as to the authoritative sense which he intends to impose on the words of this Proviso. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"Do not accept it unless you accept it as the first of a series of Amendments intended to make the supremacy real and effective."

But for one circumstance I should have been disposed to treat these words of my right hon. Friend as making it impossible for the Government to accept the words of the Proviso. In the earlier and pacific stage of the Debate I had entirely accepted the words of the Mover. There was one question pending between the right hon. and learned Member for Bury and myself, and that was the position the words should occupy. I had hoped that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had pledged himself to accept the proposal I made that he should bring up these words as a separate clause, the Government binding themselves to insert the clause at the beginning of the Bill—that is to say, not later than before the 3rd clause. I pointed out that the right hon. and learned Gentleman's acceptance of that arrangement, of course, implied the withdrawal of the present Amendment; but it appears that the right hon. and learned Gentleman declines to ask for leave to withdraw.

*SIR H. JAMES: For the third time I now interpose in this matter. I understood that I gave the right hon. Gentleman a clear and specific answer before the adjournment as to the position I occupy, and I do not understand why the question is repeated. I have ascertained that the Committee will not allow this Amendment to be withdrawn, and yet the right hon. Gentleman now brings me to the front and presses me to withdraw it in order to make it appear that I have separated myself from my friends. I cannot comply with the request made to me by the Prime Minister.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I understood that the right hon. and learned Gentleman agreed to my proposal. I understand now that he will not ask leave to withdraw. He may take that line if he chooses. I am in this position—that I had certainly accepted the terms of the Amendment, and, as the late Solicitor General truly stated when I made the request to the right hon. Gentleman, I did not make it an absolute stipulation of the condition of my acceptance. I also have this difficulty in connection with the Forms of the Committee. I believe that if I were to obtain a majority of the Committee in negating the insertion of these words in the clause, I should thereby preclude myself from bringing up any clause, or concurring in any clause, at the close of the Bill, for discussion. I am not disposed to take that course. As the right hon. and learned Gentleman has retreated, or changed his mind, and has decided not to ask for leave to withdraw the Amendment, which I thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman would ask leave to do, I am not in a position to resist the insertion of the words. But I am entitled to say that the Government will reserve to themselves a discretion later on as to the position the words shall take in the Bill, and of giving to them the entirely unexceptional form which I suggested at an earlier stage. I am desirous, in strict faith with the Committee, to accept the words which I had already accepted before the peaceable progress of the Debate was interrupted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. I hope that one thing will be clearly understood, and that is that this Amendment, considered as the initial stage of a series of Amendments intended to foreshadow the limitation of the powers of the Irish Legislature, is entirely and emphatically disclaimed by the Government, and that to all the Amendments which have that character attaching to them the Government will offer a consistent and unflinching opposition. The intention of the Government is to bring about the failure of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham's object, which is to set the Committee by the ears.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the Committee is to be congratulated that the Government has, at 20 minutes past 11, announced their intention of accepting the Amendment, which, if they had accepted it at 20 minutes to 8 o'clock, would have saved $3\frac{1}{2}$ hours of the time of the House, which the Government are always telling the Opposition they are wasting. The course that the Government are pursuing is not only one which is very little calculated to promote harmony in Committee, but it is eminently calculated to waste time. Apart from that, the right hon. Gentleman has, although late in the day, accepted the Amendment proposed by the right hon. and learned Member for Bury, but he has chosen to qualify that acceptance with the announcement that he means to restrict the Amendments to words which if left alone in the Bill will be worth absolutely nothing. The right hon. Gentleman is prepared to pay his homage to what in an earlier speech he described as a hallowed thing—namely, the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament—but he is not prepared to introduce one particle into the Bill by which that hallowed thing shall also become an effective thing. The Prime Minister has told the Committee, in language as clear as he or any one else could make it, that he is perfectly prepared to introduce words into the Bill to which he can appeal as showing that the Government have preserved the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. But, at the same time, he has given expression to his unalterable determination not to allow one single Amendment to be introduced into the Bill by which this nominal supremacy can be turned into a real supremacy. The statement of the Prime Minister leaves nothing to be desired, for once in a way, in point of clearness. All I wish is that the country should understand that when the Prime Minister and his Colleagues, and the hon. Gentlemen who now support him, talked to their constituents about maintaining the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament in the Home Rule Bill, they had nothing in their minds but the intention of preserving that which was absolutely ineffective in practice;—which the long experience of this country in dealing with the Colonial Legislatures shows to be nothing in practice, and which we may therefore assume that unless we succeed in modifying the Bill in Committee, or at a later stage, will reduce the powers of Parliament over the affairs of Ireland to the level of the powers it possesses over the affairs of Canada and Australia. I congratulate the Government on having at last put an end to a long and perfectly useless discussion, but I cannot congratulate them on having in any way improved their Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

*THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the next Amendment, standing in the name of the hon. Member for South Derry, was out of Order, as it was included in the scope of the Amendment which had just been agreed to.

SIR THOMAS LEA (Derry, S.): On a point of Order, Mr. Mellor. Does not my Amendment go further than the one which has just been accepted?

*THE CHAIRMAN: I think the Amendment which has been accepted is much larger than the Amendment of the hon. Baronet, and includes that Amendment.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) rose to move to add at the end of the clause—

“Provided always that there shall remain and be in each House of Parliament a Minister of the Crown holding office in the Imperial Ministry responsible for Irish affairs.”

MR. SEXTON: On a point of Order, Mr. Mellor. I wish to ask whether this Amendment, which relates to Executive Government, can be properly moved on a clause relating to the Irish Legislature; and whether it should not rather be moved on Clause 5, which relates to Executive Authority?

*THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment relates to the Imperial Parliament.

MR. SEXTON: Clause 2 relates to the Irish Legislature only. The Amendment relates to Executive officers, and therefore it has nothing to do with Clause 2, but it has to do with Clause 5, which relates to Executive authority.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think that is so; and the Amendment ought to be moved on Clause 5, or brought up as a separate clause.

MR. HANBURY: May I submit to you, Sir, that this Amendment has nothing to do with the Executive?

*THE CHAIRMAN: It is out of Order on this clause.

MR. J. G. LAWSON (York, N.R., Thirsk), moved to add the words—

“Provided that no such laws be repugnant to the law of Great Britain and Ireland.”

He said that the Amendment was simply to provide that the Irish Legislature should be placed in the same condition as the Colonial Legislature occupied at the present time. The words were taken out of the Act which constituted the General Assembly of New Zealand, and which was passed in 1852.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Mr. Mellor, I wish to ask whether the provision of this Amendment is not covered by Clause 33?

MR. J. G. LAWSON said, that Clause 33 merely asserted that those Irish Acts which were not repugnant to Imperial legislation should be valid. His point was that those which were repugnant should be invalid.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I cannot say the Amendment is out of Order.

MR. J. G. LAWSON said, the clause he should briefly refer to was Section 53 of the Act 15 and 16 Vict., chap. 72, which constituted the General Assembly of New Zealand. In that section it was provided—

“It shall be competent to the said General Assembly (of New Zealand), subject, as hereinafter mentioned, to make laws for the peace, order, and good Government of New Zealand, provided that no such laws be repugnant to the law of England.”

That was exactly what he proposed by his Amendment for this new subordinate Legislature it was proposed to set up in Ireland. In the case of New Zealand it was provided by an Act that laws repugnant to English laws should be invalid.

The same thing had been read in all laws establishing Colonial Legislatures, and that was the case up to the year 1865. In that year it was considered necessary by this Parliament to pass a general Declaratory Act setting out fully the condition of the Colonial Parliaments with regard to their power to make laws differing from the laws passed by the Parliament of England. That Act had a great and important bearing on the subject they were now discussing. It was entitled "An Act to remove doubts as to the validity of Colonial Laws." It was found necessary to clear up some doubts about Colonial Laws, and accordingly this section was enacted in the Colonial Law—

"Any Colonial Law which is or shall be in any respect repugnant to the provisions of any Act of Parliament extending to the Colony to which such law may relate, or repugnant to any order or regulation made under authority of such Act of Parliament, or having in the Colony the force and effect of such Act, shall be read subject to such Act, Order, or Regulation, and shall, to the extent of such repugnancy, but not otherwise, be and remain absolutely void and inoperative."

That applied to every Colonial Legislature in this Empire, and the object of the Amendment was to provide that a new Legislature to be established in Ireland should be placed in the same position as all Colonial Parliaments were in. How had this matter been dealt with in practice, and how had they proceeded since 1865 to work the Colonial Legislatures with reference to that Parliament without any great amount of friction? That had always been a delicate task. He was glad to see the Chancellor of the Exchequer present, and he wished to read to the Committee an authority the right hon. Gentleman would recognise and approve. A letter signed "Historicus" appeared in The Times in 1879. It said—

"The whole question of the relations of the Imperial authority to the representative Colonies is one of great difficulty and delicacy. . . . Colonial independency is a mere matter of abstract right. The Mother Country has not parted with her claims of ultimate supreme authority."

He read that for the purpose of showing what difficulty there had been in working the relations of these subordinate Parliaments and the Imperial Parliament. Three-fourths of that difficulty arose because, with the exception of New Zealand, in creating these Legislatures it was left open how far they were enabled to pass laws repugnant to the laws of England. A uniform system had now been established for deciding how far laws passed by Colonial Legislatures were repugnant to the laws of England. In Todd's Essay on Parliamentary Government in the British Colonies, it was stated—

"All Colonial enactments are submitted to the Secretary of the Council by the Colonial Department, and, when necessary, to the Law Officers of the Crown, to ascertain their legality, and to determine whether they contain any provision which is repugnant to the law of England. And any law to which objection could be taken on the ground of repugnancy is, to the extent where it is so repugnant to Imperial legislation, absolutely void and inoperative, and should be formally disallowed by the Crown."

If the Prime Minister had expressly declared he was about to place Ireland in the position of a Colony—that was to say, had enacted it in the Bill, and had put in plain words the substance of the speech he made in answer to the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Islington, they would not have had to trouble with this Amendment; because if the Irish Legislature was known and declared to be analogous to a Colonial Legislature, then the Act of 1865 would cover this matter, and the law would be as he desired it to be without any further Amendment. In such a case they would have the same method as they had in the Colonies of discovering whether the laws passed in Ireland were or were not repugnant to the English laws. It was, he understood, suggested that Ireland would never make any alteration whatever in her laws if these words were added to the Bill. But the Colonies had succeeded in passing a large number of measures in spite of being in the position he desired to place the Irish Parliament in. Canada, for instance, passed the Copyright Act, 1875, which made a great difference between the laws of Canada and those of this country. And what did they do? They came to that House and got an Act passed consenting to the Act which had been passed in Canada. So, also, the Irish Parliament, if it altered the law in such a way as to be repugnant to the law of the rest of the Kingdom, would, before they received the Royal Assent to such a Bill, have to obtain an Act from the Imperial Parliament declaring it right such a Bill should be passed. Of course, it would be competent to argue that the Bill dealt with matters exclusively Irish; and, if so, there would be no difficulty in passing the necessary measure of assent through the Imperial Parliament, so that there would not be a complete check or stop on Irish legislation, but there would be a check on legislation which they in that Parliament did not consider just. He should like to remind hon. Members that they had their constituents to consider in this matter. They had made certain promises to those constituents which they desired to fulfil. It was in them, as their Representatives, that the constituents reposed confidence, and to whom they looked to see that justice was done throughout the whole of the United Kingdom, and no British citizen was deprived of the protection of the law of the land. It might be argued that, even without the words he proposed, the Imperial law would override the law of the Local Legislature. At the time that the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Bill, 1875, was before the House, Mr. Childers brought forward a clause with regard to British deserters. The then Solicitor General, speaking on behalf of the Conservative Party, said—

“There could be no doubt that the Act of the Imperial Legislature would override any Act passed by any Local Legislature.”

Mr. Serjeant Simon thereupon remarked that he heard that statement with amazement. Then came the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, who said—

“He hoped the Government would not endorse the high prerogative doctrine of the Solicitor General. It was exactly by such a dangerous assertion of power on the part of the Imperial Legislature that they had lost their great Colonies in America, and he thought that Crown lawyers of the present day would have profited by the experience of the past. It was both unnecessary and impolitic to raise these questions in regard to Colonies having representative institutions.”

At that time it was clear that the right hon. Gentleman did not think it was undoubted that a law passed by this Parliament would override a Colonial Act. Lest such doubts and difficulties should arise in the future, he desired to have it plainly put in the Bill that if the Irish Legislature passed a law repugnant to the law of England, then the law of this Parliament should overrule that of the Local Legislature. He begged to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the foregoing Amendment, to add the words, “Provided that no such laws be repugnant to the law of Great Britain and Ireland.”—(Mr. Grant Lawson.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE said, this matter was provided for already. It was provided definitely in the Bill that any law repugnant to the law of Great Britain and Ireland shall be totally void of force. Therefore, he could not consent to insert in the Bill a provision to attain a purpose which was attained already. He remarked that when Amendments of this kind was put on the Books, they ought to be moved in the form in which they were put on the Books.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) asked did he understand the Government did not accept the Amendment?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The matter is provided for already in Clause 33.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE submitted that that was not so. What his hon. Friend proposed to enact was that when Irish Acts differed from English Acts they should be void. As far as the 33rd clause was concerned, no enactment was proposed in regard to those Irish Acts which were repugnant to the British Acts. All that was stated was that Acts which were not repugnant to British Acts should be valid. What they desired to provide was that when these Acts were repugnant they should be invalid. He hoped his hon. Friend would adhere to the Amendment. It was an important Amendment in the light of the authority of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had given the weight of his great Constitutional authority to the proposition, that it was not undoubted that an Imperial Act would over-ride a local Act.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT desired to be allowed to state that his hon. Friend had misapprehended what he (Sir W. Harcourt) stated in the passage he had read. What he stated was that it would be unwise to use the power of England in the way it was used when she tried to force the tea on Boston and when she passed the Stamp Act, which led to the Rebellion of the American Republic. That was a totally different proposition from saying that the Imperial Parliament had not power. He believed that most Constitutional lawyers held that, independent of the veto, they had that power, and what he stated in the passage to which the hon. Member had referred was that it was a very unwise use of that power which was exercised by the Imperial Parliament at the time to which he referred, and that was very much the doctrine which had been very ably stated that night by the hon. and learned Member for Waterford. The hon. and learned Gentleman had admitted the power existed, but that it would be a very unusual thing to exercise that power upon all occasions to over-ride communities either like Ireland or like our Colonies, or like what the United States of America were. That was all he (Sir W. Harcourt) stated on the occasion referred to, and to his then statement he begged to adhere.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, there seemed to be a sort of impression on the other side of the House that they could separate English and Irish affairs, and that everything which the domestic Legislature which was to be established in Ireland would legislate upon would be exclusively Irish. But they lived too near Ireland for that possibility to exist. The County of Lancashire, for instance, was very much connected with Ireland, and its traders had a perfect right to ask that the laws under which they took contracts should not be disturbed by what the Irish Parliament might hereafter do. On this ground he supported the Amendment.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND), MINUTE OF COUNCIL, 1893.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

SIR CHARLES PEARSON (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's University) rose to move—

He said the Motion really resumed the discussion which the House entered upon in the end of February last, and it would be in the recollection of hon. Members that on that occasion the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of Scotland, after the remarks he made, urged that the Debate should then terminate in order that he might consult, by way of circular, certain of the Local Bodies in Scotland. The situation had changed since then only in this respect : These Local Bodies had given in their Reports, and had thus given the right hon. Gentleman the advice he sought, though hardly the advice he expected. It was absolutely necessary in supporting this Motion he should very briefly remind the house of the earlier history of this question in order that they might see why it was that he felt justified in asking the Government to give some explanation of their proceedings and the position in which they had brought this highly important question of Secondary Education in Scotland. Last year an Act was passed assigning a sum of £60,000 for the purpose of promoting Secondary Education in that part of the kingdom, and, after allowing for £3,000, which was taken up for administrative purposes, a balance of £57,000 was left. In the course of the passage of that Act the Scotch Education Department laid on the Table of the House a Minute or Memorandum which indicated in more or less detail, but only by way of a tentative proposal, the mode in which they thought the money should be distributed and administered. That Minute was severely criticised, among others, he thought, by the Secretary for Scotland, but at all events by some hon. Members of the then Opposition; and the result of their criticism was that the Memorandum was withdrawn on the footing that a Departmental Committee should be appointed to examine and inquire into the whole question. That Committee was appointed. It consisted of five gentlemen of special skill in educational matters, including the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council on Education, and in the beginning of August that Committee unanimously reported to the House certain recommendations with reference to the distribution of this money. They sketched out a scheme which, almost directly after their Report was tabled, was embodied by the Education Department in a Minute dated the 11th or 12th August. In consequence of the change of Government, there had been no opportunity for Parliamentary discussion on this question. The Minute of August last practically embodied the recommendations of the Departmental Commission. After the Secretary for Scotland had been in Office from the month of August until December he followed out one of the recommendations of the Commission by setting on foot the election of certain Local Committees throughout Scotland—one for each county and one for each of the larger boroughs. These Committees were elected under a Minute of December, which was issued by the Department, and this was followed up by a Minute on the 31st January, 1893, which was the subject-matter of the discussion in that House at the end of February. That discussion was of a very brief nature, and was brought to a rather premature close by the offer which was made by the Secretary for Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman said that he intended to take the advice of the Local Committees which had been at that time set on foot. He said he would issue a Circular from the Department to these Committees asking their advice as to the mode of distribution of this money, and he said—

“When we have the replies I will communicate the general result to Parliament, and if necessary I will lay a Supplementary Minute on the Table. Whatever is done shall be done with the full knowledge of Parliament; Parliament shall be consulted; Parliament shall have an opportunity of pronouncing; and I trust that what will finally be arranged will be done with the concurrence of Parliament. . . . The final system of Secondary Education in Scotland shall not be arranged without the House having an opportunity of passing a judgment on it by Debate or by vote; and I earnestly trust that, having made this explanation and given these pledges, the Debate may not be further prolonged.”

After that the discussion terminated, the Debate having been a very short one indeed. The Department, on the 1st March, issued a Circular in the terms of that undertaking, asking the advice of the local Consultative Committees which had been created, and they all hoped that the right hon. Gentleman, if he was not prepared to abide by the result, would, at all events, take that result into very serious consideration. But he had not sufficient confidence in the Local Bodies to abstain from putting before them in this Circular what he could not help regarding as a tolerably strong temptation to accept the proposal there made, because in that Circular the Secretary for Scotland said he wished it to be understood that the system on which the opinion of the Committee was asked was one under which the Local Committee would construct a scheme guided by its own independent judgment as to the requirements of the locality, and the approval of the Department would not be withheld relative to the distribution of the sum available, based upon giving the best facilities for secondary education in each district. It was a very taking proposal to any Local Body that they should be offered money to be spent according to a scheme constructed in conformity with its own independent judgment and subject only to the approval of the Department. The right hon. Gentleman had received replies from these Local Bodies, and these replies entered very deeply into the consideration of the present position of this question, and in particular into the position of the Secretary for Scotland and those who had advised him in this matter with reference to the scheme which he had now laid on the Table of the House. These replies came from the 39 Local Bodies which had been created in the month of December, and he proposed to call attention to three or four. The issue that was put to these Bodies was practically this—

“Will you, in the distribution of this money, adhere to the proposals of the late Government in their Minute of August, which was substantially repeated by the present Government in its Minute of January, 1893, or would you prefer to have the distribution of the money yourselves, not according to the theory of the Capitation Grants upon which previous Minutes were based, but according to some proportionate distribution of money over the length and breadth of Scotland, according to districts—either according to the valuation or the population, or according to both combined.”

Of the 39 replies that were obtained, 24 preferred to adhere to the Minute of January which the right hon. Gentleman himself, after considering the question from the month of August to the month of January, laid on the Table of the House, while 15 were in favour of a proportional allocation among the localities; so that the bodies which the right hon. Gentleman selected were divided as three to two in favour of the right hon. Gentleman's previous Minute and against the proposal which he (Sir C. Pearson) thought was, to a certain extent, forced upon his notice by the hon. Member for North-East Lanarkshire. That was a startling enough result, but it became still more startling when one examined in detail the replies themselves. In the first place, as might have been expected, they had certain of the larger, and also certain of the smaller, counties in favour of the Minute of January. Of the counties which pronounced in favour of that Minute he would mention those of Banff, Elgin, and Nairn, and the great North-West Counties of Sutherland, Ross, Caithness, Inverness, and Argyll. All these District Committees, representing these very extensive and important counties, pronounced in favour of the Minute of 31st January, which the Government had already tabled. There were also the burghs of Dundee and Govan, and all these were component parts of the 24 who voted against the new proposal of the Government and in favour of the Minute of January as it stood. He should like to refer the House to two of the replies, because he thought they were exceedingly significant. One was that of a county and the other that of a burgh. There were stronger ones than those he selected, but he selected them because of their importance. The County of Lanark, which was in part represented by the hon. Member for North-East Lanark, who originally raised this question, received a Circular along with the other Local Committees, and the Local Committee of the County of Lanark, having considered the Circular, recommended that the grant should be distributed by the Education Department in accordance with the Minute of January, 1893. What took place upon that they did not exactly know, but one thing was certain, and that was, that the Secretary for Scotland was astonished at that reply, and caused a letter to be written to Lanarkshire asking if it was really true that was their opinion. The letter was no doubt couched in official language, but in effect he believed it stated—

“Do you mean to tell me that the county in part represented by the hon. Member who raised this question originally is in favour of the Minute which he pronounced against and opposed to the very suggestion he himself made?”

The reply received from the Lanarkshire County Committee stated that the Committee were unanimous in preferring that the grant should be distributed by the Department under the Minute of 31st January rather than in the manner suggested by the Circular of the 1st March. The other reply was from the Burgh of Dundee. He did not think for one moment that Party politics entered into this question in the least, but at the same time it was interesting to know that Dundee was represented in that House by two supporters of the Government, one of them a distinguished Member of the Government—the Civil Lord of the Admiralty. Yet the Burgh of Dundee pronounced in unmistakable and strong language, not merely condemnatory of the proposed Minute of May, but they also remonstrated in strong terms against the supersession of the Minute of January 1893. Dundee took the view that they could not expect to get the amount they were entitled to if population were the basis of the distribution, and they took the wider ground and stated that if the new scheme were adopted instead of stimulating secondary education it would have the precisely opposite effect, and they earnestly urged that the Minute of the 31st January should be adhered to in preference to the Minute suggested in the Circular. Would the House just for one moment observe the position in which this left the question. After a single speech had been made on the last occasion against the Minute of January, the Secretary for Scotland requested that the Debate should terminate on this ground: He said they had embodied in the Minute of January the recommendations of the Departmental Committee. He admitted it was a strong Committee and admirably composed, and stated that that was the only advice they could get at the time. But since that time, he told them, another set of advisers had been called into existence—to wit, the Local Committees, and before they finally settled the Secondary Education of Scotland it would be well to consult these Local Bodies and be advised by them. He thought the House was entitled to some explanation from the right hon. Gentleman of this astounding change of front which he had so quickly made, in spite of the strong remonstrances that had reached him against any abandonment of the principles of the Minute of January; in spite of the expression of opinion of those whom he chose to advise him; and in spite of the Departmental Committee's unanimous recommendation. The right hon. Gentleman after consulting the Local Bodies, who, he said, were "able and well qualified to speak," threw these Bodies over and tabled this Minute. What were the grounds on which he asked them to assent to this Minute as compared with the Minute of January? It differed toto cælo from every detail of that Minute. The principle of earning a certain amount for work done was entirely departed from in the present scheme. The mode of distribution proposed to be substituted was according to the population of the various districts; but the replies of the local committees were all against that—against distribution by population—with the exception of two, the Isles of Shetland and the small, but most important, County of Clackmannan. He did not know whether the Secretary for Scotland had yielded to the influence of the Lord Advocate (Mr. J. B. Balfour) in this matter, but if he had done so it had been in opposition to the opinion of such counties as Aberdeen, Linlithgow, and Dumfries. These local committees were originally appointed for the specific purpose of advising the Department as to the requirements of Secondary Education in their respective districts; but it was now proposed, without their going back to the electors, that they should be made permanent committees with very uncertain functions. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman had received a Circular that morning from the School Board of Glasgow on the subject. They were absolutely anxious to know whether they were to receive the money or whether they would have administrative functions, because while these Bodies, which were called into existence as temporary Bodies, were to have the administration of the schemes subject to the approval of the Department, he found nothing in the scheme to give them administrative functions, and they could not appoint a clerk—or even a treasurer—to receive the money. He would also like to ask for special attention to this—how the right hon. Gentleman reconciled the composition of these committees with the existence of the School Boards, especially in the large burghs like Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Dundee? It had been suggested that the Minute should be further delayed. He was not in favour of further delay unless the right hon. Gentleman was unable to give to the House, and especially to hon. Members from Scotland, some satisfactory assurance on the various points he had raised. If such assurance could not be given, he thought delay would be absolutely necessary.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying Her to withhold Her assent from a Minute of the Scotch Education Department, dated the 1st day of May, 1893, providing for the distribution of the sum available for Secondary Education, under Section 2 (1) (b) of 'The Education and Local Taxation Account (Scotland) Act, 1892.'—(Sir Charles Pearson.)

*THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): Sir, I will not enter into the history of this question except as far as it is covered by the interval between the Debate that took place 10 weeks ago and the present moment. As the right hon. Gentleman has said, the Minute I laid before the House was founded on the recommendations of a very powerful Departmental Committee; but when it came before Parliament, except myself, not a single Member in the House said a good word for it. Seven hon. Members on that occasion made speeches, every one of which was strongly condemnatory of the scheme as laid down in the Minute, and I stood absolutely alone amongst the defenders of the scheme, and it was swept out of the House by the unanimous condemnation of the Scottish Members who spoke, and, as far as I could judge, of all the Scottish Members who cheered. But this condemned scheme is law at this moment, unless the present Minute is accepted by the House. I promised to lay the Minute before the County Committees to get the opinion of Scotland on the question. Now, I will tell the right hon. Gentleman where I differ from him. He says the idea that each separate county and large burgh should have its own allotment of money, and that it should distribute the money in a way pleasing to itself, has been condemned by the people of Scotland, because 24 Bodies have voted against it, and only 15 in favour of it. But each of these groups of Bodies represent exactly the same population, so that the population of Scotland is exactly divided on the question. I must say that I could not venture again to present to the House a Minute which has been received with universal disapprobation by the independent opinion of the Scotch Members. I suppose, as the opinion of Scotland is equally divided, a sensible administrator must take the course he knows will be pleasing to the House. But there is another reason why this course should be taken. The money has been allotted under the Equivalent Grant, and it represents the money which falls to the lot of Scotland from the Probate and the Excise. It is contributed by the localities in proportion to their valuation. The money belongs to each locality, and to distribute the scheme all over Scotland, without any reference to the amount due to each locality, is in some respects a very good scheme; but it cannot possibly be adopted unless there is something like unanimity among the localities; and when one-half of the population object this solution is impossible. Another consideration is that this scheme for distributing this sum of money over Scotland by Capitation Grant is a very delicate financial operation, and it is very difficult to make both ends meet. The only method by which it can be done is by carrying out a carefully prepared scheme based upon full knowledge of the circumstances of the case by the Central Department. If a general scheme for Scotland is altered in the sense of greater liberality under Parliamentary pressure, a financial breakdown would certainly occur. The right hon. Gentleman asks why take population and not population and valuation. I can reply to him on this point in a single sentence. The real disadvantage of this scheme is that certain rather thinly inhabited, and not very rich, counties which expected under the January Minute to obtain very considerable grants in proportion to their richer neighbours were extremely disappointed, and it is in order to do something for those districts that the Department has taken population rather than population and valuation, and, therefore, that Glasgow and Edinburgh will get something less, and Inverness-shire and Ross-shire something more. Another advantage of this Minute is its finality. If the House rejects this, after its action on the Minute of January, it will be said that the House does not know its own mind. I promised Parliament to consult the Committee, and I have done so. I said that whatever was done would be done in the full light of Parliament, and I now submit the question to the judgment of the House. With regard to a general Capitation Grant, I may say that in my opinion you cannot carry a general capitation system unless you have unanimity, and unless you have that and the approbation of Parliament you cannot get it. With regard to that approbation, I would say that I believe this second Minute has fairly the approbation of Parliament and of Scotland, and I ask hon. Members to reflect that this affects very seriously the financial beginnings of the scheme. If the Minute be adopted by the end of 1893 Scotland will have received this and last year's grants in the course of the first twelvemonths, amounting in all to £114,000. You will see the importance of that. I have taken every pains in this matter. I have fulfilled all my pledges to the House, and I have tried to consult the real feeling of the House. That being so, I hope the Minute will be allowed to pass.

MR. THORBURN (Peebles and Selkirk) said, he had received strong remonstrances from his constituency against the Minute. His own county, and some other counties in the South of Scotland, had protested against the proposal to allocate this money on the basis of population. What, he would ask, was the good of consulting the various Committees in Scotland if their opinion was to be disregarded? He could say, and they need not be surprised at it, that there was a feeling of great indignation at the treatment of opinions of the majorities. He would like to know why these majorities were consulted if it was not intended to carry out their views? The reason why the County Committees objected to the basis of population was that the large centres, like Glasgow, and Edinburgh, and Dundee, would get most of the money. In previous debates there was a general consensus of opinion among Scottish Members in favour of the primary claim of the burgh high schools in any scheme for the development of Secondary Education; but the Minute of the 1st May practically ignored them altogether. Was it fair that a place like Glasgow should get £8,000, or one-seventh of the whole? If they included Govan, Lanarkshire would get one-fourth of the whole. That money went to places which did not require it. The same might be said of Midlothian, including Edinburgh, which would get one-sixteenth, while Perth

City would receive a sum of £1,830—a city which had an educational endowment in regard to which a few years ago the administrators had more money than they could use for educational purposes. What he would suggest was, that if the Minute was passed at all, £2,000 at least should be retained to be distributed by the Department to existing higher class schools needing outside aid, the selection of these schools being left to the Department. If that were done, such a school as that at Peebles would have a chance of getting on; if it were not done, nothing would prevent it from being extinguished.

*MR. RENSHAW (Renfrew, W.) said, he rose to support the Minute of the 1st May, as he believed it would give the people of Scotland the opportunity of deciding in their own localities whether they should adopt any part, or the whole, of the special conditions of the Minute of 31st January. At the same time he had some fear that the present formation of the Committees, representing as they did, in the main, county interests, might in the long run lead to points of difficulty in the administration of the money on questions raised between the burghs and counties, especially where those burghs had secondary schools. With reference to this matter, he found that if the Amendment of his right hon. Friend was carried to a Division he would be precluded from moving the Amendment which he had placed on the Paper. Speaking as Chairman of the County Committee for the County of Renfrew, it was necessary to explain why he was anxious that burgh authorities should be represented on these Committees. He took it that the experience they had had in Scotch counties, in connection with Technical Education, and the difficulties of administering the money from the Residue Grant on account of the interest of the counties and burghs being separated, must have brought to the mind of any one who had followed the administration of the fund the great difficulty there was in carrying the counties and burghs harmoniously together in the administration of the money. As an example he took Renfrewshire. According to the constitution of the Committee, none of the burghs would be represented on the Secondary Education Committee unless by the favour of the Chairmen of the fact. It had been said that Perth was to get a sum of £1,830. Had that been the case he should not have objected to the Minute. As a matter of fact, it was the County and not the City of Perth that was to receive the amount referred to, and that was, of course, quite a different thing. The objects of the Government were very clearly laid down by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Scotland (Sir G. Trevelyan) in February, when he said they desired to improve Secondary schools, to draw large numbers of children to them, and to establish schools in districts where at present there was no Secondary Education. This Minute did not tend to promote the first and main object thus stated, as it would not conduce to the welfare of burgh Secondary schools, which were practically the only existing schools of the kind. The Minute might prove a good one in its operation, but that would depend entirely upon how certain powers reserved to the Department were to be exercised; and he could not say, after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Scotland, that the Department appeared desirous of exercising them in the way he (Mr. Whitelaw) would have liked to see. Consequently, he was unable to support the Minute; but he certainly would approve of the Minute of the 31st January if the limit of the fee were increased, and some alterations were made in the composition of the County Committees. He had been requested to bring before the Committee a small point of law, and he did so with some hesitation, as he was not a lawyer. The present Minute established the County Committees as permanent Committees, and forced them to manage or, at any rate, to interfere with the management of the higher class public schools in Scotland. He referred especially to those scheduled in the Act of 1872. That Act provided that the scheduled schools should be managed by the School Boards, and the point he wished to bring forward was that the Scotch Education Department was by a Minute going to repeal a clause in an Act of Parliament. The Court of Session in the Port Glasgow School Board election case declared that the Scotch Education Department had no power by a Minute to repeal the clause of an Act of Parliament. This was a point which he hoped would have the consideration of the Government.

VISCOUNT WOLMER (Edinburgh, W.) said, he had been requested by the School Board of Edinburgh to impress on the Secretary for Scotland the inadequacy of the representation of that Board on the Edinburgh Committee. The Board was the only popularly elected Educational Body in the City, and yet it was given only three representatives out of a total of nine on the Committee. In the case of Govan he believed the Department had given way and increased the representation of the School Board, and all he asked was that the Government should adopt the same course with regard to Edinburgh.

SIR MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright) entirely disagreed with the hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter), who considered that Secondary Education could be best dealt with locally. He (Sir M. Stewart) believed it could be far better dealt with from a central position, there being so many jealousies in a locality that it was absolutely impossible to arrive at any fair conclusion unless it were so dealt with. He should like to see the Minute of the 31st of January amended, and if the right hon. Gentleman would consent to amend it in a specified way which he (Sir M. Stewart) would be glad to point out to him, it would give satisfaction to many places in Scotland.

*MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) said, the hon. and learned Member for Bute-shire (Mr. Murray) had hit the right nail on the head in saying that there was not sufficient money for the purpose of Secondary Education in Scotland, but it would be interesting to know why the hon. and learned Member and his friends when they were in power did not provide enough money.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick) hoped that the House generally would assent to the new Minute. It was unfortunate that on the occasion of the last discussion on this subject their voices were raised against the Minute of the 31st January. While he did not approve of the principle involved, he looked upon it as inevitable in this case. As to the point raised by the hon. Member for Selkirk, he would remind him that a sum of £2,000 had been reserved from the general distribution in order to meet such cases. He was prepared to accept the scheme, though he did not approve of all its details.

DR. MACGREGOR said, that as representing one of the largest Scottish counties and one of the poorest populations, he had to announce that his county was opposed to the present Minute, and much preferred the one of the 31st January. It was obvious that to be of any use at all the money ought to be concentrated and applied to three or four schools conveniently situated for the boys. A few bursaries might advantageously be created.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 33 ; Noes 136.—(Division List, No. 90.)

*MR. RENSHAW asked the Secretary for Scotland whether he would give some assurance that the question raised as to borough representation on County Committees would be attended to by the Government ?

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN : I must ask the House to allow this Minute to become law without Amendment. With regard to the question put to me by the hon. Member for Renfrewshire, I will cause an inquiry to be made to see what boroughs there are which have inadequate representation on County Committees, and I promise the hon. Member that I will, if necessary, bring in a Supplementary Minute for remedying that matter.

RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES.

APPOINTMENT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the manner in which the Railway Companies have exercised the powers conferred upon them by the Railway Rates and Charges Order Confirmation Acts, 1891 and 1892, and to consider whether it is desirable to adopt any other than the existing means of settling differences arising between the Companies and the public with respect to the rates and conditions of charge for the conveyance of goods, and to report what means they recommend. That the Committee do consist of Nineteen Members."—(Mr. Mundella.)

Mr. Parker Smith

SIR M. HICKS BEACH (Bristol, W.) : I understand that not only will the Reference be agreed to, but also the names of the Committee on the Paper.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Sir Michael Hicks Beach, Mr. Burnie, Mr. John Ellis, Mr. Field, Sir Julian Goldsmid, Mr. Hanbury, Mr. Hickman, Mr. Hunter, Mr. Jacks, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Patrick M'Hugh, Mr. Mitford, Mr. Mount, Sir Joseph Pease, Mr. David Plunket, Sir Albert Rollit, Sir Bernhard Samuelson, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, and Sir James Whitehead be Members of the Committee :

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records :

That Five be the quorum."—(Mr. Mundella.)

MR. HUNTER objected. He said objection had previously been taken to the proposed Committee of 17, on the ground that out of the 17 four were Railway Directors, while the Railway Directors, in proportion to their number in the House, were entitled only to one out of 15. A meeting was held, at which, in order to get over this difficulty, it was decided that one Scotch Agricultural Member and one English Agricultural Member should be added to the Committee. But instead of an English Agricultural Member another Railway Director was put on the Committee, so that there were five Railway Directors on the Committee, a proceeding which he thought was most unfair.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH : I must protest against the action of the hon. Member. I rose when the Reference was put to the House, and said that I understood that not only was the Reference to be agreed to, but also the names, as if the names were not agreed to I intended to object to the Reference being adopted, and the hon. Member made no sign. The hon. Member representing the English agricultural interest, to whom the hon. Gentleman has described as a Railway Director, is a Director of a small line which is worked by a large Railway Company, which starves it for the benefit of its own undertaking. He surely cannot be said to be a Railway Director in the sense intended by the hon. Gentleman ?

MR. MUNDELLA : I ask my hon. Friend to allow the Committee to go.

There is agreement between us on the subject.

MR. HUNTER said, that after the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol he would withdraw his opposition.

MR. DUNBAR BARTON (Armagh, Mid) said, the Ulster Unionists, who it could not be denied represented the commerce of Ireland, had reason to complain that they had no representative on the Committee.

MR. DANE (Fermanagh, N.) also considered that the Ulster Members, who were largely interested in railway rates, should be represented on the Committee.

MR. MUNDELLA: The Ulster Members, if they have any cause of complaint, must complain of their own friends, for no Ulster Member was nominated.

SIR JAMES WHITEHEAD (Leicester) said, a strong feeling prevailed that the railway interest was unduly represented on the Committee, and that there was not an adequate representation of the agricultural interest. But he would accept the Committee, in the hope that some good would come of it for the benefit of trade and agriculture.

Question put, and agreed to.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 11) BILL.

On Motion of Sir Walter Foster, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the urban sanitary districts of Bury, Chard (two), Chorley (two), Darwen, and Leicester, and to the Port of Liverpool, ordered to be brought in by Sir Walter Foster and Mr. Henry H. WATER PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 2)

BILL—(No. 338.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

MR. F. EDWARDS (Radnorshire) moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. He should like to bring before the notice of the House two or three facts concerning this matter. The Provisional Order Bill contained two or three Water Bills—one promoted from Llandrindod Wells. The Llandrindod Local Board objected to the Order on the ground that it contained a monopoly injurious to the town, and the Board petitioned against the Order; and the only result of the Petition was a reduction of the proposed addition to the capital of one-half the amount asked for. That was a very unsatisfactory result, because they contended that the new capital was not necessary, and that if it was sanctioned it would only increase the difficulty of dealing with the Company in the future. The usual method of opposing Bills of this kind, he knew, was to oppose them in Committee. But he thought he was justified in following this course, for the reason that the Bill would be sent to a Committee in order that it should be modified; but the ground taken by the Local Board of Llandrindod Wells was that no modification of the Provisional Order could make it acceptable to the inhabitants at all. They objected to the Bill in toto; and they, therefore, thought it a waste of the ratepayers' money to oppose the Bill in Committee. The Board did not merely oppose the Order in order that nothing might be done, because they were prepared, if the Order were thrown out, to supply the town with a sufficient supply of pure water. They had within their power a supply better than that in the control of the present Water Company. Therefore, by throwing out the Order, the House would not be doing any injury to the town. In 1884 the Company obtained power to supply Llandrindod Wells with water; but in 1889 they obtained a Provisional Order to increase the amount of capital. He was informed by the authorities that the Company had not yet completed their main undertaking. The reasons why the Board opposed the Order were two. In the first place, the water at present supplied was deficient in quantity. It was a serious charge to make against a Company, which had been in possession of the ground for more than nine years, but it was fully warranted. In 1889 Dr. Spear, a Medical Inspector of the Local Government Board, reported that—

“The water supply was in the hands of a private Company, which Company was evidently not satisfying the legitimate requirements of the district. In times of drought the amount of water consumed was not sufficient to afford a constant service.”

This was a very serious charge for a representative of the Local Government Board to make, and it was the more serious when they considered that another Department of the Government—the Board of Trade—were issuing a Provisional Order to the Water Company of Llandrindod when the Local Government Board had practically said that that body was not doing its duty as required by the Act. The Secretary to the Local Government Board was almost daily receiving complaints of the inefficiency of the supply; and he (Mr. Edwards) frequently received letters showing that the people were very much dissatisfied with the present system. In the second place, the Board complained that the water supply was defective in quality. The Company got part of their water from springs; but in the summer time, when the population of the town was considerably enlarged, they had recourse to the river which ran through the town. This river was not a fit source of supply, for there were on its banks many villages and farmhouses emptying their sewage into it. This statement was borne out by the Report of Dr. Spear, in which the following passage occurred:—

from a stream that flows near Llandrindod Wells, and that receives a considerable amount of sewage from hamlets and individual houses above the proposed pumping station. Such an arrangement must be regarded as most unsatisfactory, the amount of filtration which such a water is likely to undergo is not to be relied upon to remove dangerous impurity."

The water supply was not only insufficient, but grossly defective in quality, and the filtration system was deficient. The Company, however, which had a monopoly in the town, charged twice as much for the supply as was the case in the neighbouring town. The Local Board was of opinion that this was simply a speculative undertaking, and to sanction it must entail further burdens on the ratepayers. Although the scheme had been completed six years ago, no arrangement had been made for the flushing of sewers, which was a matter of great importance to health. The Local Board consisted of nine persons elected by the ratepayers, representing themselves one-sixth of the rateable valuation of the place. If this Board was given a voice in the work of supplying water to the people they would push it forward adequately. They are the proper authority to be considered in the matter. He begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Edwards.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BURT, Morpeth) said, the Bill scheduled, and was to confirm, three Provisional Orders relating to water undertakings—the first in Llandrindod Wells, the second at Maidenhead, and the third at Newington, near Hull. The hon. Member who had just spoken forwarded to the Board of Trade a letter which he had received from the Local Board of Llandrindod Wells, asking him to oppose the confirmation of the Order, and the Department furnished the hon. Member with a complete reply, stating the reasons which induced them to grant the Order, for which the hon. Gentleman expressed his thanks. The opposition to the Bill was, no doubt, entirely due to the Llandrindod Order, as the other two Orders were consented to by the Local Authorities. The Llandrindod Order was simply for power to raise additional capital; and, that being so, the consent of the Local Authority was not required, either by the Gas and Water Works Facilities Act (1870) or the Rules of the Board of Trade. The facts of the case, as communicated to the hon. Member in the letter to which he (Mr. Burt) had referred, were these—the original draft Order deposited by the promoters of the Llandrindod Wells Water Company—which is a company incorporated by special Act of Parliament—was to authorise the Company to raise additional capital amounting to £2,000 by shares and £500 by loan, for the purpose of paying off certain debts incurred on capital account and meeting the cost of extending mains within the authorised limits of supply. The Board of Trade received in due course a statement of objections from the Local Board of Llandrindod Wells, containing allegations with respect to the quality of the water supplied by the Company; but the Department did not at any time receive from the Local Board any definite proposal for the amendment of the Order. The reply of the Water Company to the objections of the Local Board stated that their supply was drawn partly from springs and partly by pumping from the River Ithon; and it was against the latter source that the complaint of the Local Authority was directed. The Water Company put in a Report by Mr. Blunt, County Analyst for Shropshire and Staffordshire, on the river water, after filtration, but before its admixture with the spring water. The analyst gave his opinion as follows:—

"This sample has the character of a good upland water, slightly peaty, but quite free from deleterious organic matters. It is soft and well adapted for general domestic use; and it might be pronounced an excellent water."

The Water Company's reply also included this statement, which was not controverted in the rejoinder of the Local Board—

"Not a single definite complaint has been made to the Company since the construction of the new works, saving a letter from the Clerk to the Local Board, forwarding two anonymous communications complaining of the water. He was asked, in reply, to state the names of the complainants, in order that the matter might be investigated; but he declined to furnish information."

Mr. F. Edwards

In view of the result of the only analysis of the water which was submitted to the Board of Trade, and for other reasons, the Board did not consider they would be justified in refusing the Order and leaving the Company without capital to meet the requirements of the undertaking, which might include the cost of measures to improve their water supply. Bearing in mind, however, that the question of purchasing the Company's undertaking had been mentioned by the Local Authority, the Board of Trade reduced the proposed capital to a sum of £1,000 by shares and £250 by loan, and, at the same time, reduced the maximum dividend payable on such dividend by 1 per cent. on what had previously been authorised. As well as impugning the quality of the water, the Local Board alleged that the pumping from the river was illegal. These questions were not affected by the granting of the Order, and the remedy provided by law was just as available to the Local Board as if the Order had been refused. But what would probably be deemed a conclusive reason against the Motion to reject the Bill was this—that it would be contrary to precedent, and would involve the sacrifice of the two other Orders which were scheduled to the same Bill. If the Second Reading were passed, the Local Board could petition against the Order; and as their locus standi would probably be allowed, it would then be referred to a Select Committee, which would receive evidence, and decide the matter accordingly. The Local Board had told the hon. Member that they were not disposed to petition for fear of causing expense to the ratepayers. He would like to add that since the Order was granted the Board of Trade had received from the Local Board copies of some letters, purporting to come from residents, complaining, not of impurity, but of shortness of supply. This seemed to be a matter eminently requiring further capital to rectify. He hoped the hon. Member would not press his Motion, but would accept the suggestion which he (Mr. Burt) had made, and allow the Bill to pass.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.) said, the official analyst of the Local Government Board had reported against the quality of the water; there was another source of supply in the district which was much better which would yield 200,000 gallons daily. The quality of the water was much purer in the latter source, while the supply would be under the control of the Local Board. As to the question of petitioning, to do that would be to entail a large expense on a population which was very thin and could not bear such heavy burdens. He had experience of a small place petitioning before a Committee of that House and of the heavy additional burden that resulted, and he was of opinion that the hon. Member who moved the rejection of the Bill had exercised a wise discretion in coming before the House to ventilate the grievance of which he had to complain. He hoped the House would reject the scheme.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside) said, he hoped the opposition to the Bill would not be persisted in. It was impossible for the House to deal with the question of this local water supply. A Petition to the Committee would be properly considered, and it was not right that the time of the House should be taken up in considering whether this or that source of supply was the better one. It was purely a local question, and he trusted the discussion would not go further, and that the Amendment would be withdrawn.

MAJOR E. R. JONES (Carmarthen, &c.) said, they had had great experience of the right hon. Gentleman's advice in local matters; but he trusted the House of Commons would, at all events, go so far in the direction of Home Rule as to allow this locality to have its own representative Board to manage its affairs in the matter of water supply. He would appeal to hon. Members opposite (the Irish Members) to go into the Division Lobby with his hon. Friend and himself on this occasion. The water supplied in this place was shown by the Reports to be very bad water; and it should depend on the people themselves to say whether they were willing to pay for water that would injure the community, or whether they would prefer to have a fresh supply. It was a very important fact that the Local Board could get a pure and adequate supply from one of the mountains in the neighbourhood. He hoped the Bill would be rejected.

THE VOTE ON ACCOUNT.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): I desire to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the Vote on Account can be laid on the Table tomorrow, in order that sufficient time may be given to hon. Members for placing Amendments on the Paper, and also whether it is finally settled that the Vote will be taken on the first day after Whitsuntide?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): It will be desirable, if not necessary, that the Vote should be taken on Monday week; and, therefore, that arrangement may be considered as final. The suggestion that the Vote should be placed on the Table is very reasonable, and I will communicate with the Secretary to the Treasury with a view to giving effect to it.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam): Will the Vote on Account be the first Order?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Supply will be the first Order, and the Vote on Account will be the first item in Supply.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

(No. 209.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 16th May.]

[EIGHTH NIGHT.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Legislative Authority.

Clause 2 (Powers of Irish Legislature.)

Question proposed, "That Clause 2 as amended, stand part of the Bill."

*MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, he opposed the adding of this clause to the Bill. It was a clause of the most important nature. It stated that—

"With the exceptions and subject to the restrictions in this Act mentioned, there shall be granted to the Irish Legislature power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Ireland in respect of matters exclusively relating to Ireland or some part thereof."

On the previous day the Opposition succeeded in adding the following important words to the clause :—

"Provided that, notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, the supreme power and authority of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland shall remain unaffected and undiminished over all persons, matters, and things within the Queen's dominions."

He admitted that the views of the Opposition had to some extent been met by the tardy acceptance by the Government of the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury. They had all along held that this proposed Irish Parliament must be an absolutely subservient and subordinate Parliament; and, though he regretted that the words which they had added to the clause were not inserted in the first instance, still he should acknowledge that the Amendment had done something, though little, to meet the requirements of their position. But the clause, without doubt, effected a new departure in the history of Parliament, and the Opposition must divide against it. The clause handed over to the Irish Legislature which they had created by Clause 1 the power to make laws. Since the commencement of the century it had never been contemplated as possible that there should be a rival authority to Parliament within the United Kingdom making laws for the United Kingdom. But the clause did more than that. It enabled this new Legislature to make laws without the consent of this Parliament, subject to certain restrictions contained in Clauses 3 and 4, and with the only condition that the laws so made should relate to Ireland or any part of Ireland. There could be no question that this clause was really and truly the first step towards the independence of Ireland. The 1st clause merely created an Assembly or Council in Ireland, and it entirely depended on what the 2nd clause contained whether the Legislature was dangerous or not. The Opposition had tried to make this Council and Assembly a sort of dignified County Council. They had tried to limit the powers of the Irish Legislature to those gas and water measures of which they heard so much at the General Election. London, which was as populous, as important, and as well-educated as Ireland, and possessed as many commercial, political, and social interests, was content with a County Council. Indeed, some of them were more than content with the London County Council. If the clause had been so modified as to give to the Irish Legislature the powers of a large County Council many of them would not have objected to it. But it empowered a rival authority to the Imperial Parliament to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Ireland, which was, without doubt, a grave and serious step towards the separation of the two islands, and to that they could never agree. Let them consider before they parted with the clause what were the tremendous powers which it gave to the proposed Irish Legislature. It was a very remarkable thing that, though it only took one line of the Bill to confer these great powers, it took many pages—and this showed what little confidence the Government had in the Body they were creating—to set out the limitations, restrictions, and safeguards. But the great fact remained that the clause gave powers to the Irish Legislature to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Ireland. When they looked back on the history of the last 10 years, it seemed almost a comedy that they should hand over to Nationalist gentlemen the power of making laws for the peace of Ireland. He could refer to any number of incidents that had occurred during that period. In 1886 the hon. Member for East Mayo, who would, of course, be a most influential Member of this proposed Irish Legislature, said, speaking at Castlerea—

“I want to say a word of warning to the bailiffs and all that class of people. . . . I tell these people that the hour is at hand, and very close at hand too, when the police will be our servants, when the police will be taking their pay from Mr. Parnell, when he will be Prime Minister of Ireland; and I warn the men to-day who take their stand by the side of landlordism, and signalise them as the enemies of the people, that in the time of our power we will remember them.”

That quotation gave an idea of how peace and order would be maintained in Ireland under the proposed Legislature. Mr. Davitt, speaking in June, 1887, said—

“If you could see that as I see it, oh! you would not measure your words, but you would wish from the bottom of your heart we had then in our hands the weapons which England placed in the hands of her armed mercenaries, and we would have taught these ruffians that the people in Ireland in the year 1887 had not lost the courage or the spirit of their ancestors.”

The hon. and learned Member for North Louth, speaking on Sunday—a day above all others for peace—3rd February, 1889, in the Phoenix Park, said—

“That, instead of speaking to-day, he wished that he could leave them as armed men to clear out the entire gang of lily-souled assassins.”

That was an allusion to the public officials. And it was to those gentlemen that the clause proposed to give power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Ireland. He ventured, therefore, to think that, even at that late moment, those who were really in earnest in promoting the welfare of Ireland would hesitate to carry out that clause. The word “peace” ought to be withdrawn altogether from the clause, and the control of the Constabulary and the maintenance of peace reserved to the Imperial Parliament. He had wished to move an Amendment to that effect, but unfortunately, under the ruling of the Chair, the words “peace, order, and good government” were taken together, and he was thereby prevented from doing it. Surely it was of the greatest importance to prevent anything being done by the Irish Legislature which would probably lead to a breach of the peace amongst the Irish people. War was a very serious and sad thing, but the worst form of war was civil war, and it might be that civil war in Ireland would unhappily be the consequence of this Bill should it become law. Therefore he urged that even now some means should be taken to protect the loyal minority in Ireland, by placing the preservation of peace in Ireland in the hands of the Imperial Parliament. It might be said that this clause could only affect the peace of Ireland or parts of Ireland, but the peace of Ireland was of the first importance to England, for it closely affected the prosperity of England. Disturbances in Ireland would affect enormously England’s prosperity, finance, and her power as a nation. If they were going to allow a system which in his judgment would tend to promote disturbance and civil war in the sister island which lay so close to them, was it not certain that the power of England, Scotland, and Wales would be frittered away? Therefore he contended that this matter concerned them infinitely more than people seemed to think. They were parting with their power, but they could not part with their moral responsibility for maintaining peace in Ireland. But the words in the clause "for the peace, order and good government of Ireland" were wider than this even. An attempt had been made to define in clear and distinct terms what this proposed Legislature might undertake. But that Amendment was rejected, and, with certain vague and undefined exceptions, everything else might be carried on by this Irish Legislature. In fact, the Imperial Parliament was in the position of a residuary legatee—it reserved only what could not be dispensed with, and handed over everything else to the proposed Irish Government. That was a very serious matter. The clause handed over to the Irish Legislature every conceivable power and every conceivable authority that might arise, except what was specially taken out of its purview by Clauses 3 and 4. The so-called safeguards were practically no safeguards at all, and some of them were so derogatory to an Irish Legislature or even to a County Council in England that they must all know that there would be an agitation set up to do away with them. They were passing this revolutionary clause, which would change the whole system of their Government, by the small majority of 40 or 42, and it was a startling thing when they looked at it that if 23 seats were changed this Bill could not pass into law. The Conservatives were resolutely opposed to it; the old Liberals—it was absurd to call them Dissident Liberals—did not want it; and some of those who sat behind the Prime Minister had no love for it; but he supposed they would follow the Prime Minister in his dismemberment of the Empire. The fact was that the 80 Irish Members had said to the right hon. Gentleman—"You must do this; you must not do that. You must accept this clause and you must accept the other clause, or we will turn you out." One would have thought that the Prime Minister at his time of life, rather than be dictated to in this way to pass a measure which would revolutionise the country, would prefer to be turned out 20 times than to surrender so abjectly to those whom a few short years ago he put into prison. But the right hon. Gentleman had come to-day in this clause to propose to hand over the power of making laws for the peace, order, and good government of Ireland, and to hand over their loyal Irish friends and brothers, who had done so much to build up the Empire, and who had stood by them in all their troubles, to men whom he had described a few years ago as steeped to the lips in treason.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I never used such words.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University): The Irish Attorney General used them.

*MR. BARTLEY: It certainly was some Member of the right hon. Gentleman's Government.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): The words were used by Mr. Johnson, now Mr. Justice Johnson, and formerly Irish Attorney General.

*MR. BARTLEY regretted that he had made a mistake and attributed the words to the right hon. Gentleman. He regarded this as a vital clause, which would inflict great injustice on the Loyalists of Ireland, those men who had always stood by them and assisted them in their wars and upheld the might of England in every part of the world. He begged to move the omission of the clause.

THE CHAIRMAN: No such Motion can be made.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanarkshire, Partick) said, that under this clause arose the question of the powers that were to be given to the Irish Legislature. That was a matter that had formed a great part of the arguments of the Prime Minister in all his speeches. The right hon. Gentleman had always laid stress on the supreme importance of giving wide powers to the Irish Legislature. The historical arguments of the right hon. Gentleman were based on the fact that a Parliament had existed in Ireland, and that Grattan's Parliament, during the limited number of years of its existence, possessed very full and wide powers. Legislatures had, not only in this country but in all other countries, been considered the panacea, he might almost say, for all the evils to which States were subject. The right hon. Gentleman brought forward various instances from abroad, laid down various propositions on this matter, and challenged denial as to foreign experience, and in all his speeches he had drawn out the historical argument to an extent that no one else either in or out of the House had pressed it or attached importance to it. In the speeches the right hon. Gentleman delivered in this year it was satisfactory to see he had abandoned the language which marked his utterances a few years ago. Then the right hon. Gentleman said—

“You had a horrible and shameful history.” “Foulest and most monstrous corruption joined with the grossest intimidation.” “Wanton, wicked, black, foul, base, vile, shameful black-guardism.”

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Black-guardism?

MR. PARKER SMITH said, that was contained in a private letter, not intended for publication, but the other epithets came out of the right hon. Gentleman's speeches on the subject. Those were the words of the right hon. Gentleman six years ago, but he had not used that tone in his recent speeches. He (Mr. Parker Smith) did not know whether it was in deference to one of his Colleagues, Lord Rosebery, who, in that admirable life of Mr. Pitt that he brought out, openly repudiated the words the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister then used. Both in the speech in which he introduced the Bill and his speech on the Second Reading, he enlarged upon this historical aspect of the question, and in his many speeches in supporting that he had made it a matter of serious reproach to his opponents in debate that they had not substantially met the points on this subject which he had put forth. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Armagh (Mr. Dunbar Barton) was the only one who met the right hon. Gentleman on the spot. Most hon. Members considered, whatever the truth or falsity of the statements might be, they were not really relevant to the merits of the question; but when the right hon. Gentleman stated propositions, attaching importance to them, he (Mr. Parker Smith) thought it was worth while to look into the correctness of what the right hon. Gentleman had so stated.

In his Second Reading speech the right hon. Gentleman put forward a set of “propositions for confutation, if they can be confuted; if not, for mature and deep consideration.” There were four propositions, and of these he (Mr. Parker Smith) took the first—

“There is in the civilised world—I do not go beyond the limits of Europe and America—no incorporating Union effected and maintained by force against either Party that has ever prospered.”

The right hon. Gentleman the late President of the Board of Trade (Sir M. Hicks-Beach) interrupted, “The United States.” The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, continuing, said—

“I said no incorporating Union.. An incorporating Union means that which suppresses the Legislatures of the independent parts.”

Now, there was one example of such an incorporating Union, according to the right hon. Gentleman's own definition, which had been so complete a success that it would stand notice in these Debates, an example of tyranny with which the Union in Ireland was compared—a Union that produced greater crime than anything done in Ireland, and that was the case of France. They had the Irish Rebellion, and against that they could set—

*THE CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. Member that the only question before the Committee is that Clause 2 stand part of the Bill. The hon. Member must speak to the clause; it is not in Order to make Second Reading Speeches.

MR. PARKER SMITH, on the point of Order, submitted that the right hon. Gentleman in his speeches had laid great stress upon the extent of the powers of Legislatures, and he would like to ask whether on this clause, which was the clause that gave powers of legislation, they were precluded from referring to it.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is perfectly in order to discuss the powers given by Clause 2; but I must remind the hon. Member the only question before the Committee is that the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

MR. PARKER SMITH would merely state what he was prepared to prove in more detail, that a precedent in which there had been an incorporated Union—[Cries of “Question!”] He merely stated what, but for the Chairman's ruling he should have been——

THE CHAIRMAN : The hon. Member is out of Order, and he must confine himself to what I have already pointed out it is legitimate to discuss—namely, the powers proposed to be conferred by Clause 2.

MR. PARKER SMITH said, that, in conformity with the Chairman's ruling, he would go on to another part of what he desired to discuss, and that he would state in this way. The right hon. Gentleman had again and again put forward the case of Grattan's Parliament, and the history of Ireland under Grattan's Parliament, as being a very strong proof in favour of the present Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had not put forward the mere fact of the Legislature in Ireland, but put forward the extended powers of the Legislature during the period from 1782 onwards. He (Mr. Parker Smith) submitted the argument the right hon. Gentleman based on that, the argument that powers given to the Legislature in Ireland reduced the great burdens of Ireland during those years, was a fallacious argument, and one on which no stress could be laid with respect to the present clause, which gave very large and extended powers to the Irish Legislature. He should be in Order in following out that line of argument. The right hon. Gentleman had again and again quoted as the golden age of Ireland the period from 1782 to 1795, and had stated that the prosperity of Ireland during that period was caused by Grattan's Parliament, and broken in upon by the malice of the English Government in destroying Grattan's Parliament, and causing the Union. To show the advantage of the Legislature created in Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman said—

“During these years there was a perfect union of hearts between the Irish Protestants and the Irish Roman Catholics, and there was a perfect harmony of sentiment between England and Ireland from 1782 to the year 1795. This is no dream. It has happened before, why should it not happen again? Gifted with the power of self-government, why should they not exhibit on the one hand that strong paternal concord among themselves, and on the other hand the harmonious sentiment towards England which characterised the period I have named.”

The argument was that self-government, that the power of self-government, produced by these causes the great result of

“a perfect union of hearts” and increased prosperity. It was perfectly true that in Ireland there was very great prosperity during the period from 1780 on to about 1792; but it was neither coincident with the time of Grattan's Parliament, nor was it caused by it; it began before Grattan's Parliament came into existence, and ended before Grattan's Parliament ceased. It was not caused by the action of Grattan's Parliament, except so far it was probably stimulated by the scrambling Committee that gave bounties to the industries of Ireland. The real fact was that the commercial restrictions—which were the greatest stain on the policy of this country towards Ireland—were removed in 1780, and it was their removal that did more for the prosperity of the country than anything else. During those years, from 1783 to 1793, they had peace and prosperity in the country; those were the golden years to which men had always looked back. Ireland and England both flourished; but by the end of that time, and long before any of the present disturbance——

MR. LOGAN (Leicester, Harborough): I rise to a point of Order, Sir. It has been decided that a Legislature is to be granted, and I ask is the hon. Gentleman in Order now in discussing simply whether there shall be a Legislature, and giving as a reason the many defects of a former Legislature?

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I would ask whether my hon. Friend is not in Order in referring to the power of making laws that is given under this clause?

THE CHAIRMAN : It was not easy to make out, but I understood he was using that as a sort of illustration. I must again remind the hon. Member of what the question is before the Committee. A Legislature is established by the 1st clause, and the question is as to what powers are to be granted by this clause.

Mr. Burnie (Swansea Town) rose in his place, and claimed to move, “That the Question be now put;” but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): On a point of Order,

Sir, the hon. Member is making a moderate speech, which you yourself ruled——

THE CHAIRMAN: I have already explained to the hon. Member what my view of the clause is, and ruled accordingly, and I have no doubt the hon. Member will now confine himself to the question before the Committee.

MR. PARKER SMITH claimed that on those terms he was clearly in Order in dealing with the point he was desiring to argue, and he thought the Chairman did not need the assistance of the very large number of amateur Chairmen there were in the House. It appeared to him that in considering the question of extending great powers to this Parliament in Ireland, it was necessary to see how it had succeeded in previous years. The question of the clause was not the establishment of a Legislature—that had been passed already, but the question was how the great powers proposed to be conferred were to be given to the Legislature after the Legislature had been established. The right hon. Gentleman, and a good many other hon. Members, had laid great stress upon the policy and action of the Parliament that was established in Ireland with very considerable powers, and it seemed to him he was entitled to look into those statements, and do his best to show that that argument was of no value in reference to the present Bill. In his speech the right hon. Gentleman said that, accompanied with the power of self-government, there was no reason why Ireland should not exhibit, on the one hand, that harmony of sentiment with England, and on the other that there should be union of hearts. That immense sentiment in England which the right hon. Gentleman chose as subject of eulogy was one that would not be found to have existed during that period of union of hearts of Catholics and Protestants which he stated as the result of the policy he wished to adopt. It had already been pointed out there were two serious differences between the two over the question of commercial prosperity and the question of the Regency. The right hon. Gentleman replied—

“There were quarrels between Parliaments. I was speaking of peoples—besides, the English Parliament was wrong.”

That was not the judgment of historians, and it was not the judgment of Lord Rosebery, that it was the British Parliament that was wrong on these questions. And, in particular as to the commercial question, it was not a question between Parliament and Parliament, it was, if ever anything was, a question between peoples and peoples. The original propositions of Mr. Pitt were generally accepted by the Irish Parliament. With his command of a large and unquestioned majority—a majority in all Imperial affairs beyond and far larger numerically than the right hon. Gentleman had—Mr. Pitt thought there was no doubt he would be able to carry those provisions through the British Parliament. But what happened? It was outside agitation that made itself felt and prevented that commercial policy, that everyone was agreed would have been an unmixed and enormous advantage both to this country and to Ireland, coming to maturity. Then there was the other example which the right hon. Gentleman took, the effect of Catholic Emancipation. That surely was not a case in which the peoples were united, that was not the case where the peoples desired Emancipation. They knew of the Gordon Riots—

MR. LOGAN: On a point of Order, Sir—[Cries of “Order!”] I cannot remain silent—[Cries of “Order!”] When hon. Gentlemen have quite done I will venture to address you, Sir. I wish to ask whether the hon. Gentleman is now in Order in referring to Catholic Emancipation and Mr. Pitt's opinion?

THE CHAIRMAN: I cannot say at the present moment I see the object of this reference to Catholic Emancipation.

MR. PARKER SMITH was very sorry that his argument had not made itself clear, but he was endeavouring to make it clear to the Committee, and it was this. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that it was one of the great advantages of his policy that it would bring about harmony and unity between this country and Ireland, and stated that it had produced that effect before. The right hon. Gentleman stated that during the time there was a Parliament with the kind of wide legislation this clause was seeking to confer on the Parliament he was seeking to establish in Dublin, that during that time there was harmony between the people, and in particular there was harmony between Catholics and Protestants. If that statement were true he thought it would be a valuable basis for the argument. If it was true that owing to Grattan's Parliament they had harmony between England and Ireland, and Catholics and Protestants, then it would undoubtedly be in many minds a strong argument in favour of this Clause 2 and forming a Parliament and Government of the kind of Grattan's Parliament. He was sorry he had been obliged to go over ground which he had hoped he had made clear before. The right hon. Gentleman had said that union between Catholic and Protestant marked this harmonious period in Ireland. But that was not true, the Volunteers, for example, were entirely against Catholic Emancipation, Charlemont and Foster were against it; it was not until much later and in entirely different circumstances—in fact it was forced through by the English Parliament, as the right hon. Gentleman called it, by the action of the English Government in entire opposition to the national feeling both in England and in Ireland. That statement had been made not only by the right hon. Gentleman, but by the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond), who said in his speech on the Second Reading—

“It had been said that Grattan's Parliament was a failure. He denied it. Grattan's Parliament in 1793 admitted the Catholics to the franchise, to the juries, to the professions, and to the Universities, and it was not till 30 years afterwards that the Imperial Parliament conceded the principle of emancipation.”

The fact was, and he could quote plenty of Nationalist authority to prove it, that Catholic Emancipation came, not through Grattan's Parliament but was forced upon Grattan's Parliament and the Irish Government by the action of the English Parliament and Government. Mitchell, the National historian, said—

“That, though the measure came recommended by the example of England and the express wishes of the Administration, it was warmly contested by Parliament at every point.”

And Wolfe Tone—

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I wish to know, Sir, whether it is in Order in discussing the 2nd clause to discuss the proceedings of Grattan's Parliament?

Mr. Parker Smith

MR. HENEAGE: May I ask, Sir, whether it is not perfectly in Order to compare another case with the powers proposed to be given to the Irish Parliament?

THE CHAIRMAN: I have already pointed out it is in Order for an hon. Member to refer to the period to which the hon. Member has referred, but I have already pointed out it is distinctly out of Order to make a Second Reading speech, and I must ask him to keep closer to the subject-matter of this clause.

MR. PARKER SMITH said, he would, of course, endeavour to follow the Chairman's ruling, and only say the illustration seemed to him rather a strong argument against the position of the right hon. Gentleman. Wolfe Tone himself, the ablest as he was the bravest of the Irish race, pointed out in the strongest way that the emancipation of the Roman Catholics had been refused by the Irish Parliament; that a deputation of Roman Catholics came over to London; that their petition was accepted by the King and forced by Mr. Pitt upon a reluctant Irish Parliament; and, if necessary, he could quote from the same high authority that it was by the action of Mr. Pitt and Mr. Pitt's Government alone that a conversion, almost unique, was brought on the Irish mind; therefore, it was inaccurate to say that Grattan's Parliament had produced harmony between Roman Catholics and Protestants, and that the measure passed in 1792 was a triumph for Grattan's Parliament instead of being, as it was, a triumph of the enlightenment of the English Government. It was very strange to see now-a-days the enthusiasm for Grattan's Parliament in the minds of a great many hon. Gentlemen who were supporting this Bill. He would like to point out that that had been very far from the opinion of the Nationalist Party in the past, and they could find no stronger abuse of Grattan's Parliament than in the pages of the Nationalist historian, Mr. John Mitchell, who talked of—

“Deluge of scoundrelism,” “a shameful Parliament,” “solid phalanx of Castle Members, equally insensible to invective, to sarcasm, and to shame.”

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I have more than once explained to the hon. Gentleman that he must not refer to this matter any further.

MR. PARKER SMITH would leave that point, merely stating that Grattan's Parliament—[Cries of "Order!"] He submitted he was entirely in Order, and he should wait, at any rate, until the Chairman told him he was not. [An hon. MEMBER: He has done so.] He would merely state that Grattan's Parliament, which was a new favourite of the Irish Nationalist Party, was a Parliament—

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.): I rise to a point of Order. I wish to ask you whether the hon. Member is not now breaking through your ruling, which you have laid down three times, by repeating exactly the sentences for which he was called to Order?

THE CHAIRMAN: I have told the hon. Member what I think about the matter, and I must ask him to attend to my ruling.

MR. PARKER SMITH, resuming, said, that the extent to which entirely inaccurate views of the past had been put forward; the extent to which particular features of the history of the past had been chosen and had been emphasised in support of this policy, would be ludicrous if it were not almost incredible. The Prime Minister at every point, in almost every speech he made, avoiding the more vital points of the subject, went back upon these historical matters, attached large importance to them, and treated the question of history in a manner which was absolutely unscientific; in a manner which reminded him of a keen religious controversialist laying hold of any text which might help his purpose, wrenching it from the context and taking no heed of the general circumstances and the general meaning which surrounded it. There was no fact too large, no social condition of things too important to be overlooked by the right hon. Gentleman in his historical argument. On the other hand, there was no point so small and so insignificant that he was not ready to lay hold of if he could serve his purpose by so doing. That was not the way to use history, if history was to be of any advantage at all in the discussion of these political questions. There were matters in which they must take guidance from what had happened in the past, and in particular in giving these wide and almost quasi-independent powers to the Irish Legislature they were bound to consider the effects that followed when similar powers were possessed and exercised before in Ireland. They ought to remember the condition of things when that previous Parliament came to an end. They were then in a time of great national strain, and as soon as danger came upon them, and they became engaged in a great struggle, the statesmen of this country who had had no prejudice against that Parliament saw how for the national safety it was inevitable that that Parliament should be suppressed and the Union brought about. He believed that if this new Parliament was established, not as a gas-and-water arrangement, but was invested with all the powers proposed, though matters might go on smoothly in time of quiet and prosperity, as soon as a time of real strain and peril came upon them, upon them would also come, if they could not undo what they were doing now, the same risk and danger and the same terrible ruin which threatened England in the last year of the last century.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall) rose to oppose the clause. He opposed it first on a ground which might be described as a sentimental ground. He thought the introduction of the words, "peace, order, and good Government of Ireland" were a novel and most undesirable attempt in the body of a Bill to express a wholly undeserved eulogy upon the character of the Bill itself. He did not remember any instance in the history of legislation in which words similar or analogous to these had been introduced into the body of a Bill. The result of the Bill was far more likely to be the establishment in Ireland of disturbance, disorder, and misgovernment than what these eulogistic words in the Bill foreshadowed. The Committee could not have forgotten the extraordinary scene which took place upon this clause last night. Though there had been moments within the last 10 years when there were more excitement, violence, and recrimination in the House than took place last night, he imagined there had been no more dramatic episode than that which occurred between 6 o'clock and midnight. The Unionist Party had been accused of wasting time in the discussion of this measure; but after shuffling and doubling, and dodging, and resorting to every possible expedient to avoid any clear expression of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, at half-past 11 last night the Prime Minister gave way and accepted words in the operative part of the Bill which affirmed the principle, at all events, of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. If the Prime Minister had made that concession on Monday week, he would have saved at least four working days of Parliamentary time. Four days, amounting to at least 30 hours, had been deliberately wasted by the Government because they could not make up their minds to assent to a declaration of Imperial supremacy in the operative part of the Bill. He hoped every Member of the Unionist Party, when that Party was accused of delaying the progress of the Bill, would remember this fact—that four days' debate on the 1st clause would have been entirely avoided if the concession which was made on Tuesday, May 16, at the conclusion of the 2nd clause had been made on Monday week, May 8.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It was made on the Second Reading.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, now they had the confession from the Prime Minister that he had sat by during those eight days, and had refused to express the intention that he had in his mind, which, if expressed openly and distinctly on May 8th, would have closed the mouths of the Unionists. Why had the Prime Minister been the unwilling slave of the Nationalist Members up to this point? Why had he taken the details of his policy from them? It was because the right hon. Gentleman thought he could rely upon the British majority behind him, but could not rely on the 71 Nationalists in front of him unless he carried out all their dictates. To please them the right hon. Gentleman gave up the financial clauses, he refused to state his views on the retention of the Irish Members, and for eight days he kept silence as to the Imperial supremacy. It was only when two Members (Sir E. J. Reed and Mr. Bolton) on his own side, representing important English constituencies, rose in their places and demanded the insertion of words clearly defining the Imperial supremacy, that he decided to make the concession, which he made tardily, reluctantly, and grudgingly last night. Though those words declared the principle for which the Unionists had been struggling, yet—as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour) had pointed out—they could not be considered as sufficient to settle in a practical and effective way the question of Imperial supremacy. Those words would undoubtedly be followed by additions to other clauses——

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, such additions would have the effect of making the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament not merely a vague and nominal supremacy, but an actual, practical, and effective supremacy. When the Prime Minister made the concession last night, he made it because he could not help making it—because he knew if he had gone to a Division he would have been defeated. That was a reason which no one could appreciate more than the right hon. Gentleman, seeing he had made the capture of votes the study of his lifetime. He would just read to the House the Prime Minister's words. [Cries of "Order!" and "Chair!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is entitled to discuss the clause itself and the words as they are added, but he is not at liberty to discuss the question of how they came to be inserted in it.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, as he understood the ruling it would preclude him from reading to the House the words used by the right hon. Gentleman in assenting to the Amendment last night.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think that is so. The hon. Member may discuss the clause as a whole.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, that being so, he could only refer the House generally to those words which were at the conclusion of the Prime Minister's speech last night. With regard to the powers which would be conferred under the clause, frequent attempts had been made by the Prime Minister and his supporters to induce the House and the country to believe that those powers were closely analogous to the powers conferred upon Colonial Legislatures. The Prime Minister had, however, never given a clear statement on this point. He had never admitted to the public that the powers which the Legislatures of the great Colonies possessed were infinitely greater and wider than the powers which, according to the Prime Minister, would be conferred on Ireland under this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman tried to induce the Irish Members to believe that their powers would be the same as those of the Colonies.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, if that were so, why did the right hon. Gentleman constantly quote in his speeches the condition and Legislatures of the Colonies as an example for the future of Ireland under this Bill?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Subject to restrictions.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said if, when the right hon. Gentleman used his Colonial analogy, he would also set forth the restrictions and the differences between Ireland and the Colonies there would be no complaint. But the right hon. Gentleman in his arguments always assumed that the analogy was a close one, and it was only when he was brought to bay for a definition that he said there were restrictions.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, pausing, said, he must beg the pardon of the right hon. Gentleman. He had been speaking for only 14 minutes, and not half-an-hour as he had stated. That was just as close an approach to accuracy as the right hon. Gentleman usually made. The Prime Minister, in his argument, constantly said—"Look at Canada and Australia; they have had for years this self-government which we propose to give to Ireland; under these powers they have enjoyed remarkable prosperity; they are peaceful and loyal;" and then, he argued, why not set up a separate Parliament in Ireland? The right hon. Gentleman on those occasions said nothing about restrictions and differences of geographical and political condition. The ordinary elector, who was misguided by the powerful rhetoric and eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman, and by his great name and position, was often misled by this false analogy. He said that the analogy was, at all events, exceedingly exaggerated and strained, and that the essential conditions of Ireland and the Colonies were totally different. He would remind the House that when, 100 years ago, Mr. Pitt attempted to settle matters in Canada by giving Canada such a Legislature as they now proposed to give Ireland, it resulted in nothing but disturbance; and a struggle was carried on in Canada against the Imperial Parliament for 50 years, until at last Canada succeeded in wiping out almost every one of the restrictions imposed upon her. If the right hon. Gentleman would tell the country these important facts, the Unionist Party would not complain of his using the argument; but he hoodwinked and blinded the country by setting up to persons who had not the opportunity of historical study these false analogies. The powers given in this clause constituted a totally separate condition of affairs to that which existed in the Colonies. These powers, and the restrictions set up, would be the means of causing dissatisfaction and agitation in Ireland. They would not lead to peace, order, and good government; but they would lead to discontent, disorder, and constantly-increasing demands on the part of Ireland. On the other hand, there was a tremendous and a vital difference between the relations of Ireland to this country and the relations of the Colonies to this country. He was aware that he should not be in Order in pursuing this question in detail. He would only ask the Committee to remember that the Colonies were thousands of miles removed from their shores, and not one of them occupied a position of political or strategical dominance over their interests at home. The loss of a Colony, deeply as it would be deplored by everyone who valued the greatness of the Empire, would not be a fatal blow; whereas the establishment, as might well happen under this Bill, of a separate, a hostile, and an armed power in Ireland, might be the means of dealing a deadly blow at the liberty, commerce, and independence of this country. These facts had been ignored by the Prime Minister. He had already referred to the very remarkable occurrence of last Friday—the protest of two Liberal Members against the failure of the Government to allow Imperial supremacy to be clearly declared in the operative part of the Bill. That protest had been acted upon, and the result was the insertion of the words which were added last night to the clause. Another remarkable occurrence took place last night. The Irish Members, who had suffered the pains of retention for many days, for the first time broke silence, and expressed in no uncertain way their disapprobation of the proposed introduction of words declaring the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament in the Bill. The House would look forward with interest to what happened in the future with regard to the question of Imperial supremacy. The House would watch the relations of the Government to the Irish Members to see how far Ministers were still under the control of their allies below the Gangway, and how far they might be willing to allow further additions to be made to the Bill which would carry out the desire of many Gladstonians, as well as of all Unionists—a really effective and practical supremacy in the general working of the measure itself should it ever, unfortunately, become law. The object of such additional safeguards in the Bill would be to make the supremacy which the House had in principle affirmed last night.

Mr. Philipps rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

Several MEMBERS rose——

MR. GEORGE WYNDHAM (Dover) said, that the opposition to the clause was not disarmed by the concession which the Government had made on the previous evening. The Government had refused a number of Amendments, the object of which was to make the supremacy effectual, and to make its nature clear alike to the people of England and Ireland. What was the use of the Government allowing this barren triumph, when previously they had refused to accept the word "delegate" in place of the word "grant"? In their speeches throughout the country, however, their talk had been of nothing but delegation. The Government had declined to proceed by way of enumeration instead of by way of restriction in dealing with the powers of the Irish Legislature; and yet the burden of their speeches in the country was that the Irish Legislature was to have nothing but certain well-defined and limited powers. Why should any undue value be attached to the Amendment which the Government had accepted? If they had been faithless to their pledges in the country, why should they be faithful to the pledge which they had given on the previous evening? What was the concession worth when the Government, in the very act of accepting the Amendment, tried to minimise the importance of the Amendment? The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. J. Morley) declared last night that the rights of the Imperial Parliament were in effect dormant——

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I never used the word "dormant."

MR. WYNDHAM begged the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. He thought it was him who had used the word. At any rate, the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond) was constantly trying to distinguish between a dormant and a dead supremacy. Was there any grave distinction between them? When they said that a thing was dormant they meant that it was in a state of suspended vitality; and was there really a grave distinction between a dormant and a dead supremacy? The hon. Member for Waterford on the last night, with his customary dexterity, had once more effected the adroit evasion with which hon. Members were now familiar. When the question was put, "Is this Parliament to remain supreme in the sense in which nine men out of 10 understand supremacy?" the hon. Member said, "Of course it is to remain supreme, as it is in the case of Canada;" and when the Unionists demurred he said, "Do you wish it to be supreme as it is in Kent?" Surely it was possible to find some middle term between the supremacy of Parliament over Canada and the supremacy of Parliament over Kent; and it was because the Unionist Party had failed to find during the eight days of the Debate that middle term, and because the Government drew an illustration from Canada, and then refused to be bound by it, and then pointed to Kent and said such and such a thing would be undesirable—it was because of that attitude of hesitation and dubitancy on the part of the Government in the matter that the Debate had been prolonged, and would be prolonged, until the Committee and the country understood what this supremacy was to be. There should be no mistake as to the nature of the Treaty into which they were about to enter. Irishmen, who had many intellectual qualities, were distinguished before all else in memory and imagination. It was idle to suppose that if we gave them a Parliament with doubtful attributes and powers they would not recall to memory their earlier Parliament. They would desire to see its direct successor in the Parliament it was now proposed to set up. Fortis imaginatio generat casum, and if a powerful imagination brought the thing to pass he ventured to prophesy that imagination in Ireland would attempt to clothe the Parliament about to be conferred with all the dignity and power that Grattan's Parliament once had. The object of his (Mr. Wyndham's) remarks might be summed up thus: in the attempt at the solution of the question which had been made in the beginning of this century much had been left in doubt, and a great deal of the misconceptions and heartburnings which had followed upon the Union was to be attributed, and justly attributed, to the fact that, whether intentionally as some said, or unintentionally, as he believed, the Irish people had some cause to suppose that they had been cheated in the bargain made. Therefore, in the present Bill, let there be no room for misapprehension either on this or the other side of St. George's Channel.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): I may say, with regard to the speech of the hon. Member who has just sat down, that it is the first that has grappled with the principle of the clause the Committee is now considering. I am not going to follow hon. Gentlemen who preceded him in any Second Reading Debate or historical disquisition on Grattan's Parliament, or on the terms of the Union, for what the Committee has now to decide is practically whether Clause 2, as amended, is to stand part of the Bill; and I venture to submit that a Second Reading Debate upon that question is out of Order, and that it will also be out of Order to discuss Clause 1. The House, by reading the Bill a second time, has affirmed the principle of this great change in the Government of Ireland; by inserting Clause 1 it has affirmed the principle that Ireland is to have a domestic Legislature, and by Clause 2 the powers of that Legislature are, as I think, limited as well as defined. I would, however, say a word with regard to one remark of the hon. Member who spoke last. Following his Predecessor, the Member for Ecclesall, he complained that the Government had wasted some days by not announcing before last night their views with reference to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. I would remind the hon. Member that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary clearly stated upon the Second Reading of the Bill that the Government would consider and accept any clause which adequately described and set forth the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. There has been no hesitation whatever about this question. The discussion last night was as to the place in which the declaration should be inserted; and I do not think that it lies in the mouths of hon. Members opposite to blame the Government for the delay occasioned by the discussion of that question—a delay which one Member computed at four days and another at eight days. The hon. Member for Sheffield said that the Amendment declared the principle for which all along the Opposition had been contending, while the hon. Member who has just sat down said it was a barren and I think he said an impracticable concession. Well, that is the question the Committee has now to consider and upon which I wish to say a word or two, as it is a question upon which I have been personally challenged again and again in the course of the Debate. The hon. Gentleman has stated that a large number of constituencies at the General Election entertained a very different view of the supremacy of Parliament from that which has been propounded from this Bench in the present Debate, and that they were under the belief that the Government were going to propose what has been familiarly described as a Gas and Water measure. Now, I had some little experience of many of the elections. It has been my fate to take part in a great many contests, and I have read particulars of a good many more, and I cannot recall at this moment any single Liberal Member who pledged himself to support a measure which would come within the category of what is called a Gas and Water Bill. I am only speaking from memory and I may be wrong; but my impression is that throughout the length and breadth of the Kingdom the Liberal Party, at all events, declared themselves as supporters of a measure which would give Ireland effective autonomy, the effective control of Irish affairs by an Irish Legislature elected by an Irish people and controlling an Irish Executive responsible to that Legislature. At the same time, with that effective autonomy, there was also to be an effective supremacy of the Imperial Parliament in which, and as a part of which, the Irish Members were to remain. I will not, however, speak for other people. I speak for myself, as my action has been called in question. I would say that that has been my confession of faith, and to that I now adhere, and I venture to submit that this Bill literally complies with those conditions. Clause 2 is a definition of the powers of what may be called, I believe, technically a non-sovereign Legislature. That is not, as the hon. Member for North Islington, whom I now see in his place, declared at the commencement of this Debate, a rival and co-ordinate Parliament.

MR. BARTLEY: I did not use the term "co-ordinate Parliament."

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: He said a rival Parliament. I would ask the Committee to consider how restricted the powers given by the clause are. They are given, in the first place, with exceptions, and they are subject to restrictions. Then there is granted to the Irish Legislature

"Power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Ireland in respect of matters exclusively relating to Ireland."

And then, lastly, there is the Proviso introduced last night—a Proviso for which I venture to think there is no legal necessity—which did not add to or take from the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament by one hair's breadth, but which was a declaration to meet the views of certain hon. Gentlemen who entertained doubts on the point. To put the matter beyond all doubt, there are these three things about this Irish Legislature—it is subject to restrictions and exceptions, the sphere of its operations is confined to matters exclusively Irish, and then there is the declaration that all is subject to the unimpaired, unfettered, and unrestricted supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. Whether that is a wise step to take or not I am not going to argue now. Whether wise or not, that is not the question before the Committee, not the creation of a rival Parliament, or even, as the hon. Gentleman opposite pointed out just now, of one with powers analogous to those granted to Colonial Legislatures. Colonial Legislatures are not restricted to the extent to which and in the manner in which this Legislature will be restricted. The hon. Member for Dover pooh-poohed the effects of these restrictions; and he thought the hon. Member for North Islington, in harmony with the subject of the Amendment which he moved at an earlier period of the Debate in which he proposed to abolish these restrictions, regarded them as of little value.

MR. BARTLEY: Only those in Clause 4.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: I cannot agree with him. The reservations in the Bill extend to ten matters which cover the whole foreign policy, the naval and military policy, the trade policy, and other matters of extreme importance, and with respect to which the Irish Parliament is absolutely prohibited from dealing at all. Then there are seven restrictions which I am prepared to prove, when the time comes, absolutely safeguard the civil and religious liberty of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland. [Laughter.] Hon. Members may laugh. This is a matter of argument in which I am prepared to meet them. I may be right or I may be wrong; but laughter is no answer to a contention of this description. I put it broadly that, under the wording of Clause 4, there is, in my humble judgment, an ample protection both for personal liberty and for the rights of property, if such protection is needed for the minority in Ireland. The hon. Member for Dover asks what is the use of the declaration of supremacy in the clause; he attaches great importance to having it put in here, and now, having got it, he says what is the use of it, unless there exists machinery to carry it out. That raises the question of what is supremacy and what is effective machinery. I heard with great interest the speech of the hon. Member for Waterford last night, who clearly and fairly defined the line that divides the two ideas as to the question of supremacy. An hon. Member said the other night that I admitted that an Irish Legislature would do foolish things. Well, I have no doubt about it. I know no Legislature that has not done foolish things. I have been a Member for some years of one which has done very foolish things, and I have no doubt if I continue a Member of it I shall see it do other foolish things. It is now doing some foolish things—[Opposition cheers]—I expected that cheer—according to the opinion of hon. Gentlemen opposite, just as during the past six years it did many things which we thought very foolish. But all this is no reason for a perpetual, constant, and irritating interference with the Irish Legislature. We in this House have neither the time nor the knowledge to deal with the internal affairs of Ireland. I do not mean in any sense to be disrespectful; but I may say that during the last 10 years a large portion of the time of the House has been wasted in putting and answering questions relating to the internal affairs of Ireland, which were absolutely unintelligible, in the main, to the great bulk of the Members of the House. Well, if you mean by supremacy that the House of Commons is to take on its shoulders the day by day government of Ireland, and to constitute itself a Court of Appeal on all Irish affairs, then the last state will be worse than the first. The plan will be practically impossible and unworkable. That is not the sort of supremacy which I believe Members on this side of the House advocate, and for it this Bill contains no machinery whatever. But if you mean by supremacy that if the Irish Parliament should commit gross injustice, gross oppression, gross wrong, if it should pass or attempt to pass any law which would deprive any of Her Majesty's subjects, no matter of what faith or class, of the elementary rights of English citizens, then the Imperial supremacy ought to be, would be, and could be brought into force. [Cries of "How?"] There are three modes of procedure. The first is the procedure contained in the 3rd and 4th clauses—the procedure of reservation and prohibition. There are certain matters which the Irish Legislature cannot touch, any more than certain States of the United States can touch matters prohibited them under their Constitution—aye, and which the United States Congress itself cannot touch without violating the Constitution. There is in the Bill simple and effective and successful machinery for utilising that power. If the Irish Legislature should transgress the limits laid down and contravene any of the ten prohibitions or the seven reservations, you have a Court constituted to which, immediately and in the briefest manner, appeal can be made by the Executive, by the Lord Lieutenant, or by anyone in Ireland, and from that Court there is an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. So that, so far as the prohibition and reservation is concerned, you have the most ample and effective machinery for carrying it out. What is the second part of the machinery for upholding the supremacy? It is the veto. Hon. Gentlemen say the veto in this country is practically obsolete, and that, therefore, this will be an obsolete veto in Ireland. But I must ask hon. Members to recall for a moment what is the position of affairs in this country. The Sovereign of this country can only act constitutionally by the advice of Her Ministers; and by that strange and, at the same time, admirable working of our Constitution, which is defined in no Statute, and laid down in no written Constitution, there is a most effective mode of exercise of the veto. Her Majesty's Advisers and Ministers must possess the confidence of the House of Commons; and, therefore, if a Bill is proposed in the House which the Executive of the day are not prepared to accept, and the Administration are defeated, they resign or appeal to the country, and either the Sovereign is at once put in possession of a Ministry who possess the confidence of the House, or a general appeal is made to the electorate, and the electorate return a House from which a Ministry is chosen. Therefore, there is no analogy between the veto as exercised in this country with the veto which would be exercised in Ireland under this Bill. The veto is not exercised in this country by the Crown on the advice of Her Majesty's Ministers, but Ministers who do not possess the confidence of Parliament are dismissed and others take their place. But what would the veto in Ireland mean? Supposing a Bill of an oppressive and unjust character were passed by the Irish Legislature, the Bill lays down, in the clearest manner, the right of Her Majesty, or rather, I should say, the duty of the Lord Lieutenant to refuse the assent of the Crown, on the instructions given to him by the Crown, acting on the advice of the Imperial Cabinet. The Cabinet is practically a Committee of the House of Commons—neither more nor less.

An hon. MEMBER: And the other House.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: It includes Members of the other House, but the Cabinet only goes in or out of Office as it possesses or forfeits the confidence of this House. This House as much elects the Prime Minister and the Cabinet as the United States elect the President. In the case of an oppressive Bill being passed by the Irish Legislature, the Cabinet will either veto it or allow it to stand. In either case, if anyone was of opinion that the Cabinet had acted wrongly, he would at once propose a Motion of Censure. That would not be dragged through weary weeks of Debate, but would be dealt with immediately, in a few days.

*MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): I rise to Order. The Committee will feel that the right hon. Gentleman is practically making a speech which covers the whole of the important points of the Bill. We do not object in the slightest degree. No more interesting speech has been delivered in the course of the Debate than that of the right hon. Gentleman; but I trust that it may be permitted to those who have to reply to the right hon. Gentleman to cover as wide a field. If the speech of the right hon. Gentleman is relevant to the clause, the same latitude, I hope, will be given to those who have to reply to his important speech on the whole Bill.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I do not want to introduce any other clause. The main point of the argument against the clause as to supremacy is that there is no machinery for making the supremacy effective. I am now showing that there is such machinery.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The Question before the Committee is that the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill. An Amendment was introduced last night with regard to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, and the right hon. Gentleman was answering questions with regard to this supremacy. Of course, so far as it is necessary in Debate to answer the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman, hon. Members will be able to do so. But, at the same time, I sincerely trust, considering the difficulty of keeping this discussion off other clauses, that hon. Members will take care to keep as closely to the present clause as possible.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: I should be sorry to weary the Committee, but I should like to make my point clear, and as I have mentioned two respects in which this machinery is brought effectually to bear, I will come to the third and last. The third mode in which the machinery is made effective is the ultimate resort—not the constant resort, but perhaps the rarest, to be used when everything else has failed—namely, the undoubted right of the Imperial Parliament to repeal any Act of the Irish Parliament. No lawyer will for a moment dispute the assertion that, however the Bill is drawn—whether in its present shape, or whether with every clause relating to Imperial supremacy struck out—it will still be in the power of the Imperial Legislature to repeal any Act passed by the Irish Legislature. Therefore, when I am told that we ought not to consent to this clause because it gives a barren declaration which cannot be put in force, I say that the Imperial supremacy can be enforced by prohibition, reservation, veto, and, finally, repeal. Under these circumstances, when I am challenged by the right hon. Member for the Bordesley Division (Mr. J. Collings) to say whether I still hold the opinions I held when I addressed my constituents in the Midlands, I say I do not recede from them one jot. I maintain here, as I maintained amongst my constituents, that we have effectually secured the supremacy of Parliament. I also maintain here, as I maintained in the Midlands, that if the Irish Question is ever to be settled it is absolutely necessary to give to Ireland an effective autonomy, not necessarily to hon. Members below the Gangway opposite, but to the Irish people. We are not going to give the control of the affairs of Ireland to so-and-so whom some hon. Members may not like; we are not going to give it to the nominees of this House, or of the Government, or of anyone else, but to whomever the Irish people may choose to elect. When elected they will be responsible to the Irish people, and must stand or fall according to the way they discharge the duties entrusted to them. Therefore, I say that, so far as I am concerned, I have been consistent in this matter; and when the right time comes I shall be prepared—having been charged with neglecting the interests of those with whom I have the deepest sympathy—to show that there are other clauses in the Bill which perfectly safeguard the position of the religious minority in Ireland. This clause is the natural consequence of Clause 1. The powers which it confers are distinctly defined; the restrictions to which the Irish Legislature will be subject are clearly set forth in the Bill; they will safeguard all the interests to which hon. Gentlemen opposite rightly attach supreme importance; and no matter whether this proviso is inserted in this clause or left out of the Bill altogether, the effective and constant supremacy which the Imperial Parliament possesses will remain a living and effective force.

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY (Bute-shire) said, they had waited with some anxiety since the commencement of the Debate that morning for some statement on the clause from a Member on the Front Ministerial Bench; and he thought the important speech just delivered was the best rebuke that could have been delivered to the somewhat irresponsible attempts earlier in the day to stifle this very important discussion. He had been for some time wondering what the supporters of the Government really thought was done by the Prime Minister last night when he assented to the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Member for Bury (Sir Henry James). It would have been in the power of the drafters of the Bill to have combined the 1st and 2nd clauses; but, as they had not done so, he took it they were in Order—indeed, the Chairman had ruled so—in discussing the measure of the powers which it was proposed to entrust to the Legislature created by the 1st clause. They had been challenged to produce the speeches of hon. Gentlemen behind the Government who went in for what might be called the gas and water view of Home Rule. But the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. H. Fowler) prudently gave up consideration of that point, and preferred to answer what he himself had said. The right hon. Gentleman said that his view at the General Election had been that the scope of Home Rule should be autonomy for the Irish combined with supremacy on the part of the Imperial Parliament. He (Mr. Graham Murray) rather agreed with a subsequent remark of the right hon. Gentleman, that everything turned upon what they meant, and what definition they gave to the words “autonomy” and “supremacy.” The right hon. Gentleman was a great assistance to them, because he afterwards qualified the word “autonomy” by the adjective “effective. With the Bill as it now stood, it was quite clear that, in the spirit of the Amendment the Government accepted last night, the scope of the action of the Imperial Legislature and the Irish Legislature was absolutely co-extensive, except, of course, as to those matters in which the Irish Legislature was particularly interested. He (Mr. Graham Murray) asked, when they had a scope that was absolutely co-extensive, and when they had the possibility of the Irish Parliament dealing with a particular measure in a particular way, with the Imperial Parliament going the next day and dealing with the same measure in another way, whether they could possibly say there was an effective autonomy, combined with supremacy? If they took that definition, and if there was a definition forced upon them by the Amendment accepted last night, they got nothing less than a pure contradiction in terms. Would they not be rival Parliaments if they were both dealing with the same thing? The impression left on his mind by the tone of the right hon. Gentleman was not that he did not see the extraordinary gravity of the terms of the Amendment accepted by the Prime Minister, but he rather thought it was high time to calm the fears which might very well arise in the minds of hon. Gentlemen blow the Gangway. This was not the only case where they found the sting in the tail; and there was no doubt that, with the clause as it stood, the Proviso put in had been rather too strong for the clause itself. He would ask if there were not many other causes which, if the clause was left as it was, would lead to collision? The Opposition had insisted on the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Member for Bury, for two reasons—because they thought it was right in the interests of the Irish, and because they were entitled to insist upon it, because it was in consonance with what they might presume to be the spirit in which this Bill was brought forward as they could gather from the words of the Preamble. He only referred to the Preamble by way of illustration; but the Preamble, which in so many words said it was expedient that the supreme authority of the Imperial Parliament should not be impaired or restricted, might be taken as containing the spirit of the Bill. It was quite possible that the Irish Parliament would pass legislation which would affect not English legislation but English interests, and that those whose interests were affected would try to make amends by getting legislation passed by the English Parliament. He would give an illustration. Legislation might be adopted by the Irish Legislature dealing with goods which were sent into Irish markets. It could not be said that this could not be done, because it would not be competent for the Irish Parliament to pass laws dealing with Customs. It had been pointed out over and over again that there was nothing in the Bill as it stood which would prevent the establishment of something in the nature of octroi duties, that would make it impossible for English goods to go into an Irish town as if Customs Duties were imposed. Could it be supposed that if any great branch of English or Irish manufacture were interfered with in this way an attempt would not at once be made to induce the Imperial Parliament to pass legislation to a contrary effect? He would give another instance, which, for practical purposes, was, perhaps, a little stronger. The Prime Minister's scheme was that both the Irish Legislature and the Imperial Parliament were to act in the future as the Imperial Parliament had done in the past by way of Party Government. Surely it was not impossible to suppose that the state of Parties should at some time be such that the minority in the Irish Parliament should have the same leanings, and consist largely of the same personalities as the majority in the Imperial Parliament. There might then be a band of men in the Imperial Parliament who would be able to put a great deal of pressure upon the Government of the day, and, in fact, to dictate the terms upon which their support should be given. Suppose the minority had any legislation passed against them in the Irish Parliament which it was powerless to resist, would not the first instinct of self-preservation under the arrangement stereotyped in this clause lead them to endeavour to get the Imperial Parliament to embark on a course of legislation on the same subject, in order, by a side-wind, to overturn the decision which had been recorded against them at home? It was quite evident, from the point of view of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, that unless the machinery for carrying out the supremacy were effective, the clause was a sham. There was no doubt that a great amount of the support that was given to the Bill was based on the hope that it formed the beginning of the development of similar schemes for other countries. Supposing there had been a further development of the Home Rule scheme, and it had been extended to Scotland and Wales, was it not absurd to suppose the Imperial Parliament having co-ordinate authority, and dealing at the same time with all the subjects that were taken up by each of the separate Parliaments? He objected to this clause because, when the Imperial supremacy had once been admitted as it had been, if these unrestricted powers were given to the Irish Legislature, the result would be not to set up a system of Federation, but to commence a struggle which would lead to the paralysis of both Legislatures, because they would be continually fighting on the same subjects, or else to the effacing of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, which, according to the declaration the Government had adopted, they were to be the first to cherish and preserve.

MAJOR-GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith) said, he was not satisfied that it was a right thing to give over to the Irish people, and especially to the Irish priests, the powers which the Government proposed to confer upon them. The safeguards which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had spoken of were only paper safeguards, and all power of enforcing them was being given up unless the Government were going to use bayonets. Did they intend to use British troops for that purpose? He was very sorry the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. J. Morley) did not happen to be present, because he would possibly be able to answer that question. He (Major-General Goldsworthy) was anxious that a large measure of local government should be given to Ireland; but he could not consent to the throwing upon the Irish Members of the immense power which the Government proposed to confer upon them. The question whether there should be an Irish Parliament or not had been put very plainly to his constituents, and they had replied in the negative. Under these circumstances, he could not support the clause.

Dr. Macgregor rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided :—Ayes 281 ; Noes 220.—(Division List, No. 92.)

Question put accordingly, "That Clause 2, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided :—Ayes 287 ; Noes 225.—(Division List, No. 93.)

MR. GOSCHEN : I rise, Mr. Mellor, to move that you report Progress.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) : I rise to a point of Order. Did you not call on another hon. Gentleman, Mr. Mellor? [Interruption.]

THE CHAIRMAN : The right hon. Gentleman is in Order.

MR. GOSCHEN : I wish, Sir, to make an appeal to Her Majesty's Government, not to increase any heat there may exist on either side of the House. I make this appeal most respectfully, believing that, if the Government can see their way to fall in with the suggestion I desire to make, it will facilitate the business of the Committee. The suggestion is that, when there is an extremely important Motion before the House, and when it is decided that only a single Minister should speak on that Motion, that Minister will speak at such a stage as to allow of some Debate after his speech, so that if the speech be one of commanding importance, like that made by the right hon. Member for East Wolverhampton, it may be replied to by hon. Members representing the various interests of the Opposition, the Ulster Members, and the Liberal Unionists. There is nothing more calculated to lead to irritation than that a Minister should deliver a speech which opens up new problems, and that there should be no adequate opportunity of reply. I do not wish to enter into any controversial matter; but I hope we shall hear a few words from the right hon. Gentleman upon this matter.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Goschen.)

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I gather, Mr. Mellor, that the Motion is made rather for the purpose of drawing a declaration from the Government than for interrupting the proceedings of the Committee; and I hope the answer I have to offer will give some satisfaction. As a rule, the Government has neither proposed nor supported the Closure immediately after a speech from a Minister. Again and again the Government has acquiesced in a Minister being followed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour) and others before the Closure has been moved; and that general rule has not been violated by anything which has happened to-day. The right hon. Member for East Wolverhampton spoke after hearing a good many speeches from the Opposition, and after he sat down the Closure was not moved until two more speeches from the Opposition had been heard. No doubt when the Closure was moved three or four hon. Members rose to speak. [Cries of "More!"]

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) : Fifteen.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : But it cannot possibly be supposed that the moving of the Closure implies any lack of consideration for the feelings of the Opposition. I submit to my right hon. Friend that in the closing of this Debate there has been no deviation from the general practice of the Government.

MR. GOSCHEN : The right hon. Gentleman has not referred to one point, which is that, besides the Opposition on these Benches behind me, there are others who are entitled to be heard on this Bill. There are the Ulster Members and the Liberal Unionists—[Laughter]. Yes, we have a fair claim to be heard in reply to the speech of the President of the Local Government Board, which the Prime Minister did not hear, and which had as important a bearing upon the whole subject as any speech that has been delivered. To that speech it was only possible to reply with two short speeches from these Opposition Benches. Very great disappointment is felt that no further opportunity was given for a reply to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. Hon. Gentlemen seem to think that I am using this as an opportunity for raising a controversy. I can assure them that that is not the case. I am anxious that there should be a feeling in all parts of the House that this Bill should be fairly discussed, and I think it is a candid and straightforward course to inform the Prime Minister of the feeling which has been roused when it is found that full and fair discussion is not allowed. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will weigh the point, that it is not simply one speech, which, though a very important speech, the first in the Debate from a Minister, will be thought adequate on a clause of such vital importance.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I must remind my right hon. Friend that, undoubtedly, as he said, the clause is one of vital importance ; but I think the right hon. Gentleman must remember that that is an allegation which we hear on every Motion that is made, on every clause, on every sentence of the clause, and on every series of Amendments. We are always told that this is the crux of the Bill. You cannot expect to have the full benefit of that plea in its largest terms, when it is a plea that we hear not only once, but many times in the day. It is quite true, as the right hon. Gentleman has said, that my right hon. Friend's speech was of great importance, and that I had not heard it. But I have heard of its purport since my right hon. Friend sat down, and I believe that there was no sentiment given by my right hon. Friend which was not in entire conformity with all previous speeches on the part of the Government. If there was not such conformity, there was a very able gentleman, the late Solicitor General for Scotland, to point it out, and he did not point it out at all that any special answer was required. I think my right hon. Friend will feel that he has received a fair answer from me in having accepted his proposition that the Government never sought to Closure when it was in a position of advantage in the Debate, and on that principle we shall continue.

Several Members rising—

*THE CHAIRMAN : I have allowed the discussion to go on in order that these mutual explanations might take place. Although it is very desirable that such explanations should take place, it is altogether undesirable that the discussion should continue. It would be out of Order to discuss the adoption of the Closure. That which was the action of the Committee is closed, and is not matter for debate.

*SIR T. LEA (Londonderry, S.) : I wish to appeal to the Government on a somewhat similar matter. I am sure the Government will not say that I ever trespassed on the time of the House. I have not said a word since the Bill was in Committee. I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether he thinks it desirable that on this Bill, which interests more than anything else can do the Irish people, important questions should have been decided without a single Irish Representative having been allowed to speak.

THE CHAIRMAN : I have already explained why I allowed the discussion to go on, and why I consider that any further discussion will be out of Order.

MR. J. COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) : Mr. Mellor—

THE CHAIRMAN : The Question is that I report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

MR. MACARTNEY : Mr. Chairman, I think it is impossible for the Committee to rest absolutely satisfied with the declaration of the Prime Minister.

THE CHAIRMAN : I have already said it would be out of Order to discuss this matter further.

MR. BARTLEY : On the point of Order, Sir—

THE CHAIRMAN : I have ruled that the hon. Member is out of Order, and under that ruling I have power to put the Question, which is that I report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The House then cleared for a Division, and when the Question was about to be again put,

MR. GOSCHEN, who spoke from his seat and with his hat on, said: Mr. Mellor, I wish to ask a question on a point of Order, under Rule 23. That Rule is—

“If Mr. Speaker or Chairman of a Committee of the whole House is of opinion that a Motion for the Adjournment of a Debate, or of the House, during any Debate, or that the Chairman do report Progress, or do leave the Chair, is an abuse of the Rules of the House, he may forthwith put the Question thereupon from the Chair, or he may decline to propose the Question thereupon to the House.”

I wish to ask whether the Motion to report Progress is an abuse of the House?

*THE CHAIRMAN: According to the ruling of the Speaker, that is so; when a Motion to report Progress becomes out of Order it is an abuse of the Rules of the House. This Motion became an abuse of the Rules of the House, when debate was persisted in which was contrary to the Rules in spite of my repeated remonstrance as each Member rose and attempted to reflect on the application of the Closure. I then decided forthwith to put the Motion.

SIR J. GORST (who also sat covered): On the point of Order, Mr. Mellor—

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question is that I report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 244; Noes 299.—(Division List, No. 94.)

MR. GOSCHEN: I rise, Mr. Mellor, to put a point of Order to you. I am sure the Committee generally will feel that, even if constructively the burden is put upon me that I made a Motion that was an abuse of the Rules of the House, it is a reproach that no hon. Member, and no one who has been in the House, as I have, for a number of years, would wish to be entirely silent about. I moved this Motion, and I venture to say that, whatever other speakers may have done, when I moved the Motion I was entirely in Order, and it could not for a moment be suggested that I was out of Order. If so, you, Sir, put the Motion from the Chair, and I venture to think that at that time no one thought that this Motion was an abuse of the Rules of the House. I have the Rule on which, I presume, you acted. It is—

“If Mr. Speaker, or the Chairman of a Committee of the whole House, is of opinion that a Motion for the Adjournment of a Debate, or of the House, during any Debate, or that the Chairman do report Progress, or do leave the Chair, is an abuse of the Rules of the House, he may forthwith put the Question thereupon from the Chair, or he may decline to propose the Question thereupon to the House.”

But you did not, Mr. Mellor, decline forthwith to put the Question from the Chair when I moved, nor did you decline to propose the Question thereupon. I understood that because other hon. Members rose, therefore you considered, in your discretion, that the Motion, which had not been an abuse when it was originally moved, had then become an abuse of the Rules when other Members rose. I think it will be seen that the privileges of the House are deeply concerned in this matter, because the point at issue really is, when a Motion to report Progress has been made, whether, if one or two Members are in Order in speaking upon it, the Motion, so to say, can be closed at once, and other hon. Members who might be prepared to speak perfectly in Order upon the Motion should thereby be deprived of their opportunity. It is with reluctance, Mr. Mellor, that I raise the point; but I am sure you will see that I am anxious it should not for one moment be supposed, either in or out of this House, that I had made a Motion which was an abuse of the Rules.

*THE CHAIRMAN: In answer to the appeal made to me by the right hon. Gentleman, I must, of course, declare what the Rule of the House is. It has long been decided, both by the Speaker and my Predecessor in the Chair, that to question the action of the Closure directly or indirectly is out of Order. Neither the action of the Chair nor the votes of the Committee can be questioned or reflected on except on a Motion moved in the House after notice duly given. I am bound, of course—it is my duty—to preserve to the best of my ability the Rules of the House. The right hon. Gentleman made this Motion immediately after the Closure had been moved. I felt it to be my duty in the Chair to endeavour to promote harmonious action between the two sides of the House, and I thought it better to allow the right hon. Gentleman the opportunity of putting his question to the Prime Minister, and to the Prime Minister of answering it, because I think such a course promotes a good understanding and the progress of business in this House. After the Prime Minister's reply the discussion became highly irregular—indeed, in the strictest sense the whole of the discussion was irregular—but after that it became distinctly irregular, because other hon. Members rose to question the propriety of the Closure, a course which I have had to rule more than once to be absolutely out of Order in this Committee, and they tried, in spite of my rulings, to take part in what had become a highly irregular discussion and an abuse of the Rules of the House. Out of respect for the right hon. Gentleman, and out of respect for his position, I put this Motion from the Chair. I never said or suggested that I declined to put the Motion, for the reasons I have already given. I can only say that—of course in the most strict and technical form—the discussion became out of Order and an abuse of the Rules of the House, but I never for one moment thought of imputing to the right hon. Gentleman, in the sense in which he uses the words, that he made any Motion which was intended to be an abuse of the Rules. Having explained this, I hope I may add that, if for one moment it is permitted to move to report Progress in order to question the action of the Closure, the whole Closure Rule, in my opinion, will become nugatory. I am bound to enforce the Rules of the House; there is an inherent power in the Chair to take the necessary steps to maintain order, and I am bound to do my best to carry out the duties which the House has entrusted to me.

THE CHAIRMAN then called on Captain Naylor-Leyland, when—

MR. SEXTON rose to a point of Order in reference to this Amendment. The hon. and gallant Gentleman proposed to move that the consideration of Clauses 3 and 4 should be postponed until after the consideration of Clause 8. Clause 2, which the Committee had just agreed to, dealt with the law-making powers of the Irish Legislature, and Clauses 3 and 4 dealt with the exceptions from and restrictions on those powers. Clause 3 defined the exceptions and Clause 4 the restrictions. He wished to know whether it was competent for an

hon. Member to move that these clauses, 3 and 4, should be postponed until after the clauses dealing with the Executive authority and the constitution of the Irish Legislature should have been disposed of?

SIR JOHN GORST: I rise to Order.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for North Kerry is distinctly in Order.

MR. SEXTON said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman who was going to move the next Amendment proposed to postpone Clauses 3 and 4 until they should have disposed of the clauses dealing with the Executive power in Ireland, the composition of the Irish Legislative Council, the composition of the Irish Legislative Assembly, and the mode of settling disagreements between the two Houses. The question of Order he had to put was this: was it competent for the hon. and gallant Member to move that the 3rd and 4th clauses, which related to the law-making powers affirmed by the acceptance of Clause 2, should be postponed until clauses dealing with different matters should have been disposed of?

SIR JOHN GORST: May I be heard on a point of Order? I submit that what the hon. Gentleman has raised is no point of Order at all. The reasons he has given are admirable reasons against postponing the clauses, and in Debate will no doubt be considered by the Committee; who will decide whether the clauses shall be postponed or not; but certainly he has raised no point of Order.

THE CHAIRMAN: In answer to the question put to me, I have to say that the Amendment as it stands on the Paper is not in Order. It has been explained to the hon. and gallant Gentleman moving it that he can move that the consideration of Clause 3 be postponed and then that the consideration of Clause 4 be postponed, but he cannot move their postponement until after any particular clause.

MR. MACARTNEY: On a point of Order I desire, for the information of myself and many other hon. Members sitting on this side, to know, Sir, what ruling you have laid down—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That matter is settled.

Clause 3 (Exceptions from powers of Irish Legislature).

CAPTAIN NAYLOR - LEYLAND (Colchester), who had the following Amendment on the Paper :—

“That the consideration of Clauses 3 and 4 be postponed until after the consideration of Clause 8,”

rose to move that Clause 3 be postponed. Although he could not move the Amendment as it stood on the Paper, it expressed what was his intention. If the Committee now agreed to that part of his Amendment which was in Order—namely, to postpone Clause 3 indefinitely, he would afterwards move that it be inserted in Clause 8. They had affirmed in Committee that they were going to set up a Legislature in Ireland consisting of two Houses—a Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly. They had also affirmed in Committee that, subject to certain exceptions and restrictions, these two Houses would be able to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Ireland. He contended that the next thing for them to do in logical sequence was to define that Legislature, lay down what it was to consist of, what franchise it was to be elected upon, and whether there was to be any property qualification. When they had defined the Legislature and completely set it up, then only should they be able to say what powers they meant to entrust to it. All they had done at present was to set up this nebulous Parliament, but goodness only knew what they were going to do with regard to the constitution of the Irish Legislature. He contended that they ought to determine the question of the composition of that Body before they determined what powers should be entrusted to it. Surely the question of the composition of the Legislature ought to be settled before they proceeded to consider the restrictions which were to be imposed upon its powers. Before they came to Clauses 5, 6, 7, and 8, and before they dealt with the constitution of these two Houses, there were three alternatives, any one of which might happen. They might leave the composition of the two Houses as it was, or they might make it a great deal more democratic. He had heard a rumour in the course of the last few days from a reliable source, that it was the intention of the Representatives from Ireland and of the Party headed by the hon. Member for Northampton, who exclusively composed it, to move that the £20 qualification, which it was now proposed to enact as necessary for the Second Chamber, should be removed altogether from the Bill. That, he heard, was the opinion of nearly all the Representatives from Ireland.

MR. SEXTON could assure the hon. and gallant Gentleman that he was entirely in error.

CAPTAIN NAYLOR-LEYLAND would accept the assurance of the hon. Member so far as it affected himself, but if he was going to withdraw what he had said he should require a similar statement to that of the hon. Member to be made, not by one hon. Member for Ireland, but by all.

MR. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): I think we can assure the hon. and gallant Gentleman that no Irish Member has any intention of reducing the qualification.

CAPTAIN NAYLOR-LEYLAND said, very well, he would withdraw his original statement, and say that the whole of the Irish Members, with the exception of two, were going to move it. [Cries of “Question!”] He should like to know who was the Leader of the Irish Party? Was there anyone qualified to speak more for the Irish Party than any others? Why, there were more Leaders than there were Members.

THE CHAIRMAN requested the hon. and gallant Gentleman to confine himself to the Amendment.

CAPTAIN NAYLOR-LEYLAND said, if they were to adopt one of the alternatives to which he had alluded and do away with the property qualification in order to make the Chamber more democratic, they would have to introduce into the Bill a great many more exceptions and restrictions than it contained at the present time; therefore it was desirable that the consideration of the restrictions should be deferred until after they had settled the constitution of the Legislature. The final alternative was that instead of making the Irish Legislature more democratic and doing away with any of the safeguards they should increase them. It might be possible when they came to the consideration of the Upper Chamber they could alter the property qualification by increasing it to £100 or double its Members. If they did these things then they could proceed to do away with nearly all the exceptions in Clause 3, and the restrictions which were included in Clause 4. It was quite certain that whatever they did they must follow one of these three alternatives, and no matter which of them they followed it was very desirable to constitute the Irish Legislature from beginning to end before they considered for a single moment the powers they were going to entrust to these two Chambers. They ought not to fashion Clauses 5, 6, 7, and 8 according to the composition of Clause 3, but they ought to fashion Clause 3 according to the composition of these clauses. He had several precedents for the course which he was suggesting by his Amendment, but he would not detain the Committee by quoting them. On many former occasions during the last 20 years they had deferred the consideration of some clause which was in the middle or at the beginning of a Bill because there was some subsequent clause which had an important bearing upon it. He appealed to the Government to accept the Amendment, on the ground that its adoption would tend to facilitate the discussions on the Bill. He begged formally to move that Clause 3 be postponed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 3 be postponed."—
(Captain Naylor-Leyland.)

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I will endeavour very briefly to state why it is impossible for the Government to accept this Amendment. I can conceive that the question may be legitimately raised whether, after you have determined to establish a Legislature, you shall then first proceed to consider the details of its composition or the powers which that Legislature shall exercise. But upon that question it appears to me that you ought first to consider the powers and afterwards the composition, and for this reason: the powers ought to be regulated by the wants of the country, and the composition ought to be according to the powers, and the whole by reference to the wants of the country. And I do not see what guide you have to the composition until you have considered the powers. But that, Sir, is not the position of the hon. Gentleman. He affirms we have decided the question. We have begun to consider the powers; we have enacted that this Legislature shall be appointed to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Ireland. But these are the terms in which usually, by the precedents and customs of Parliament, powers are given to a Legislature. Therefore the hon. and gallant Gentleman is not proposing to take the consideration of the composition before the consideration of the powers. What he is proposing is that, after we have conferred the main powers according to Parliamentary precedents, we shall postpone in the middle of the powers the consideration of the restrictions on those powers until we have considered the composition. I must own I cannot see any convenience in such a course of proceeding. Some consideration is usually shown to the promoters of a great Bill as to the arrangement of the clauses, unless matters of great principle are involved. It would be most inconvenient and most anomalous, the powers having been taken into consideration, and the clause conferring the powers having been dealt with, to interrupt the consideration of the powers for the purpose of considering the composition of the Assembly.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.) said, it seemed to him that the powers could not be said to be given until the restrictions upon them were defined, therefore it was a case here of interjecting the appointment of hon. Members of the Legislative Bodies in the midst of giving the powers. They (the Unionists) were desirous to understand who were the persons to whom those powers were to be granted, before they were granted; and they were of opinion that a great deal would depend, as to the powers to be given, upon the character and number and position of the persons who would compose the Legislative Body in Ireland. If they were entirely satisfied with the composition of the Body they might require no restrictions whatever; therefore, it seemed to him the Government ought to be willing to accede to the Amendment. Surely it was a reasonable Amendment. They who were from the North of Ireland were the persons who were particularly concerned and interested in this matter. They said that certain powers were to be given to certain individuals, and they wanted to know who the individuals were. If they could conceive that the individuals appointed to this Legislative Council and Assembly were such as they could have entire confidence in, it would be illogical to ask for any restrictions to be placed upon them, and the amount of restrictions they should propose and desire on that side of the House would depend entirely on the persons who were to exercise these powers. That being so, he appealed to the Government to accept the Amendment, so that they might see who were to govern them; and hereafter they might prove more reasonable than the Government thought. Was it not natural that the Loyalist Members from Ireland should be treated as being quite as reasonable as hon. Members from Ireland who held Home Rule views. They (the Unionists) represented those who had been successful in Ireland, while hon. Members below the Gangway represented those who had not been successful. It was on that ground they desired to know to whom these powers were to be committed, and then hon. Gentlemen would find they were perfectly reasonable, and that whatever requests they made they should have something reasonable to say for them.

Mr. Theodore Fry rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

THE CHAIRMAN: I have no doubt the Committee will soon be able to come to a conclusion on the point.

Debate resumed.

MR. J. COLLINGS would remind the Committee that there was such a place as Great Britain, and the interests of Great Britain would be very seriously affected by the composition of the Chamber in Clause 9. If the Government would state that they were going to adhere to the composition as it appeared in Clause 9 the Committee might proceed with Clause 3; but, inasmuch as they were in the dark as to the composition of the Legislature, it was a most reasonable thing to ask that the consideration of the powers should be postponed until the composition was settled. The Prime Minister, for very good reasons, had postponed the Financial Clauses, and he contended that there were equally good reasons why this clause should be postponed until after Clause 9 at any rate. They would then be able to see what really could be confided to the Legislature in Ireland when they knew what the composition of the Legislature was. This seemed to him one of the most reasonable requirements that had been made upon this Bill; the Government could not sustain any harm by accepting it, and its adoption would greatly smooth the course of the Bill.

Mr. Sexton rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) supported the Amendment. He said they contended that the power conferred upon this new Legislature was of a very general character, and that until the specific particulars were decided there was no determination of the powers.

It being half-past Five of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Tuesday, 30th May.

OUTDOOR RELIEF (FRIENDLY SOCIETIES) BILL.—(No. 184.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Strachey.)

Objection taken.

MR. STRACHEY said, there was practically agreement in all parts of the House; but the President of the Local Government Board, for Departmental reasons, objected to the Bill.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: I do not object to the Bill at all; and if the hon. Member is prepared to accept the Amendments which I have put down for public reasons, I shall be happy to further the progress of the Bill; but, unless they are accepted, it will be impossible for me to do so.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL (Wigton) said, he had an objection to the Bill. The subject with which it dealt was now being inquired into, and, therefore, it would be inexpedient to legislate upon it at the present time.

MR. STRACHEY desired to make a personal explanation. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board seemed to think he was charging him personally with objecting. He did not at all mean that.

What he meant to convey was that there were technical objections from the right hon. Gentleman's Department; but he did not mean to suggest that the right hon. Gentleman himself had no sympathy with the Bill.

Committee deferred till Wednesday, 31st May.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES (IRELAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 242.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. T. M. HEALY moved that the Committee stage of this Bill should be taken, but several hon. Members objected.

MR. BARTLEY appealed to his hon. Friends to allow the Bill to pass through Committee. They ought to allow Irishmen to read books, and then they would become more convinced of the demerits of the Home Rule Bill.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, that the Bill was only an attempt to extend in Ireland the provisions of the English Libraries Acts. While they were Members of the United Kingdom let them have common laws.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT asked whether the hon. and learned Gentleman would allow his Irish Police Enfranchisement Bill to pass if he withdrew his objection to this Bill?

MR. T. M. HEALY: This is not my Bill at all. It is the Bill of the Parnellite Member for Dublin.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT said, he would withdraw his objection if the hon. and learned Gentleman would use his influence with the Parnellite Member in question to allow the Irish Police Enfranchisement Bill to pass.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, he would do so.

SIR FRANCIS POWELL bore testimony to the services rendered by the Irish Members in passing the English Libraries Act, and hoped hon. Members would allow the clauses to pass through Committee.

Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The House may now complete its gracious work by allowing the Bill to pass the Third Reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Mr. Strachey

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT objected, but withdrew the objection on the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Healy) agreeing that he would not oppose the Irish Police Enfranchisement Bill.

MR. MACARTNEY objected to the Third Reading, in order that he might consider some communications he had received from Ireland on the subject.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then my bargain with the hon. Member for Sheffield is off.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow.

COMMONS REGULATION PROVISIONAL ORDER (WEST TILBURY) BILL.—(No. 323.)

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 18th May 1893.

NEW PEER.

Sir Archibald Campbell Campbell, of Blythswood, in the county of Renfrew, Baronet, having been created Baron Blythswood of Blythswood in the county of Renfrew—Was (in the usual manner) introduced.

Several Lords—took the Oath.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS
(IRELAND) BILL [H.L.].—(No. 54.)
COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1.

THE EARL OF ARRAN said that, having found, on consultation with those interested in this matter, that Lord Rookwood's Amendment to this clause, which came after his own, for leaving out, in line 8, from the word "and," to the end of the clause, was likely to be more popular and more in agreement with public opinion in Ireland than that Amendment, he begged to withdraw it.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, he believed that, if time had permitted, a strong Memorial would have been forwarded from all the towns proposed to be brought under the operation of the Bill against being touched by it, but their Corporations would not meet until the beginning of next month, and therefore they would have no opportunity of sending up any resolutions to their Lordships' House on the subject. He therefore, in accepting any Amendment, desired, on the part of those who might wish to bring forward any such resolutions, to reserve to himself freedom to make any proposal at a later stage of the Bill.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

LORD ROOKWOOD moved, in Clause 1, line 8, to leave out all the words after ("on") and to insert—

("Sundays within the Metropolitan Police District of Dublin Metropolis, and within the Cities of Cork, Limerick, and Waterford, and the town of Belfast, shall, instead of the hours now fixed by that Act, be the hours from 2 to 5 p.m.")

He apologised to the Irish Peers for venturing to interfere in a matter which concerned them more vitally than himself; but, at the same time, he perceived the dangers that might arise, especially in large cities, from any violent interference with the existing state of things until the House was satisfied not only that a majority of the people were in favour of it, but that it was practically the unanimous wish in any particular town. He was old enough to remember what took place when a similar attempt was made to limit the hours of closing in this Metropolis, the riots which followed it, and its having to be at once abandoned; and he was certain that any attempt of the kind would throw back for years, if not entirely, endeavours to deal with the subject. He was as anxious as any of their Lordships to see the cause of temperance advanced in Ireland as well as in this country, and quite admitted that the Act of 1878 had been in the rural districts a beneficent measure, and should be made permanent, as this was proposed to be, instead of being merely a continuing Act. But in regard to the towns which had hitherto been exempted from the operation of that Act, it would be far safer to begin with them in a tentative way, and to accept the proposals of the large minority of the Committee on Hours of Closing which sat in 1877. The hours now in force were practically the proposal of Mr. Madden, the Chairman, against a large section of that Committee. Shortening the hours, instead of entirely closing on Sundays, would, he thought, be the safer course, and he therefore begged to move this Amendment; but, as it had been pointed out to him that some of the later words would refer to something different to what he had intended, he would put the Amendment in the form "to leave out all the words after 'on,' and insert—

"Sundays within the Metropolitan Police District of Dublin Metropolis, and within the Cities of Cork, Limerick, and Waterford, and the town of Belfast, shall be read as if the hour of 5 o'clock were substituted therein for the hour of 7 o'clock."

That would carry out what he intended, and would be a better form of Amendment.

LORD O'NEILL believed that Lord Rookwood had expressed the views of many of their Lordships, and he had come to the conclusion that some Amendment of the kind was inevitable. The introduction of such an Amendment might be a disappointment to some who had supported the Bill on the Second Reading; but he felt he could not recommend the supporters of the Bill to resist the Amendment of the noble Lord, in view of the opinions so strongly expressed since the Debate on the Second Reading. Still, the evidence which had been given before the Committee went to show that in Belfast the feeling was almost unanimous in favour of the adoption of the Bill, and he should therefore propose to amend the Amendment so as to extend Sunday closing to the City of Belfast. Therefore, supposing their Lordships accepted the noble Lord's Amendment, he would propose to re-amend it by leaving out the words "in the town of Belfast," and by adding at the end the words "in the city of Belfast the closing shall be for the whole of Sundays."

LORD MONTEAGLE said, he had been asked by employers and others to adopt a similar course with regard to Limerick, from which city he presented several Petitions praying that entire Sunday closing might be extended to that city. Among the petitioners were the Young Men's Christian Association, the Baptist Church, the Congregational Church, and 66 of the principal employers and residents in Limerick, all desiring that that city should be included in the operation of the Bill. The last-mentioned Petition had also been signed by the Mayor and Sheriff of the city, and by the Protestant Bishop. The Roman Catholic Bishop, Dr. O'Brien, also was well-known to be in favour of the Bill, but was absent at the time the Petition was prepared.

THE EARL OF MEATH had been asked to say that it was not desired to include Dublin in the Bill in the same way as the two noble Lords had suggested with regard to Belfast and Limerick. It was found that in Dublin three hours was really a little too long for the public-houses to be kept open on Sundays. The opinion prevailed in different quarters that two hours would be quite sufficient to meet the needs of those who required to go to public-houses on Sunday, and accordingly he would be prepared to support Lord Rookwood in his Amendment if the noble Lord would kindly substitute 4 o'clock instead of 5 as the closing hour.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Earl SPENCER): My Lords, with regard to the course the Government will take on this question, I feel, I confess, some little difficulty. We should have been glad, considering the difference of opinion that exists with regard to the Amendments, to have taken time to consider the course which we think it advisable to follow. On the one hand, it is clear that in some towns, like Belfast, there is a strong opinion in favour of the Bill as originally framed. The noble Lord who spoke last but one (Lord Monteagle) appears to take the same view with regard to Limerick. On the other hand, Dublin is disposed to agree to the Amendment proposed by the noble Lord opposite, modified perhaps to the extent of one hour as referred to by my noble Friend Lord Meath. All these matters are deserving of careful consideration, and I therefore, on the whole, would be disposed to vote with the noble Lord opposite (Lord Rookwood) if it came to a Division. I would rather, however, the matter should be reserved for consideration before the Standing Committee, and then I shall be prepared on the part of the Government to take a more decisive line on the subject. Inquiries are being made in Ireland with a view to ascertaining the general feeling of the localities concerned on the subject. I think, therefore, it would be better not to divide the House on the present occasion.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, if the noble Lord went to a Division he should certainly vote with him; but he thought after what had fallen from the noble Earl on the Government Bench, if a little longer delay were accorded, their Lordships would be placed in possession of the views of the people in the corporate towns affected by the Bill, who would thus be afforded the opportunity of showing whether they were or not in favour of it. Whatever action might be taken that day, he must reserve to himself liberty to consult those Corporate Bodies on the subject.

LORD ROOKWOOD said, he gathered from what had been said by noble Lords that his Amendment was not really objected to, though they might wish to further amend it. If his Amendment were now engrafted in the Bill, the whole matter could afterwards be discussed in Standing Committee. None of the proposed Amendments would be prejudiced by the adoption of his own, if left open for further alteration should it be necessary.

THE EARL OF MEA^{ent} said, he thought a discussion in Standing Committee would be quite sufficient.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of Kimberley): I would suggest to the noble Lord that he should hardly guide himself entirely by what has been said by my noble Friend. This is not a Government Bill; and although we are very glad to give assistance in the matter and to express our opinion, yet it must not be considered as decisive. My noble Friend only suggested that it might be desirable to delay amending the Bill because he was aware that careful inquiries were being made on the subject in Ireland, for there seems to be a good deal of doubt as to what is the true feeling in some of the towns. I should, therefore, much prefer that the noble Lord who moved the Amendment should not persevere with it. I must say I do not see the logic of putting it in the Bill merely to amend it afterwards. All we can say in the matter at present is that nobody seems to be in a position to afford the House all the information we ought to have before us in order to decide upon a question of considerable difficulty.

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT: I understand the Leader of the House has made an appeal to the noble Lord opposite to withdraw his Amendment?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I do, rather.

LORD ROOKWOOD said, that under the circumstances he was not prepared to withdraw his Amendment on the present occasion. He only wished to get the Amendment fairly before the Committee to be considered on its merits, when it would be seen to be in accordance with the action which, in the general opinion, should be taken in the matter.

*LORD KNUTSFORD had some doubt whether such a question as the inclusion of the towns mentioned could properly be raised before the Standing Committee, but it might be brought forward at a later stage on Report, or the Committee might now be adjourned.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I do not think there could be any objection in point of Order in these Amendments being then raised. Your Lordships will remember that it must come before the House again on Report afterwards. We do not wish to prejudice the noble Lord's Amendment in the least. We only desire that it should not be pressed now.

*LORD KNUTSFORD: It comes before the House again on Report, not in Committee.

LORD HALSBURY: I do not think there would be any technical objection to this being discussed before the Standing Committee, though, no doubt, it is not the class of thing which is generally discussed there. I think it would be rather a precedent for our discussing what is more a Second Reading business than a question of this sort.

*LORD KNUTSFORD: It is really only a matter of convenience of procedure; and if no objection is felt to raising this question in Standing Committee, I do not see that it need be pressed now.

LORD HALSBURY: It is merely a question of technicality.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I understand that the noble Lord opposite would rather prefer that the Bill should come before the Standing Committee than a Committee of the whole House.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, under these circumstances, I would suggest that the proper course would be that this Debate should be adjourned.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Quite so; that would be the better course, I think.

Debate adjourned accordingly.

House resumed; and to be again in Committee on Monday the 12th June next.

RAILWAY SERVANTS (HOURS OF LABOUR) BILL.—(No. 73.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1.

LORD PLAYFAIR proposed an Amendment on this clause, which he said was of some importance. Your Lordships will recollect that if there was any dispute between railway servants and their employers as to overwork those disputes were to be considered by the Board of Trade, who would settle the question between them; but that if they failed, the disputes should be taken to the Railway and Canal Commissioners. The latter body had two powers—one administrative, to try and settle the dispute which the Board of Trade had failed to do; the other a judicial power of enforcing penalties if the two parties could not come to an agreement. The object of the Amendment is to limit the administrative power of the Railway and Canal Commissioners to two appointed members—that is, in the present case Sir Frederick Peel and Lord Cobham; and that the Judges who are engaged in judicial duties in the High Court should not be called upon to take part in the administrative part of the Act, but should be able to be called in in case of any judicial question. The Railway and Canal Commissioners are strongly of opinion that an Amendment should be made to this effect, and I now beg to move it.

Amendment moved,

In Clause 1, page 2, line 17, after ("Act") to insert ("provided that notwithstanding anything in section five of that Act the jurisdiction of the commission for the purposes of this Act may be exercised by the two appointed Commissioners"), and in line 18, after ("railway") insert ("and canal").—(The Lord Playfair.)

Amendment agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee; and to be printed as amended. (No. 102.)

STANDING ORDERS OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

Standing Order No. XVI. considered.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in moving that the following alteration be made in Standing Order No. XVI.—

In place of the words "betwixt the hours of nine in the morning and five in the evening," insert the words "at any convenient time when the House is sitting either for judicial or other business," said: My Lords, I have heard of many occasions on which noble Lords who have not taken the oath on coming down for that purpose after the hour of 5 o'clock have been much disappointed to find they could not do so under the

Lord Playfair

Standing Order, and have not been able in consequence to take their seats and take part in the business of the House. There appears to be no reason whatever for so rigid a rule, and I have worded my Resolution "at any convenient time." I imagine that would be any time that the Lord Chancellor fixed; but if the noble and learned Lord sees any objection, I do not press it, though I think myself it would be better to leave it in an indefinite position.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I do not think there will be any practical inconvenience. I can hardly conceive the possibility of a noble Lord insisting upon taking his seat at a time when the Lord Chancellor is engaged in his judicial business, which he would have to break off for the purpose; for, of course, unless the Lord Chancellor is on the Woolsack a noble Lord cannot take his seat. The matter is in the hands of the Lord Chancellor, but I do not think any practical difficulty will arise.

*THE EARL OF LIMERICK said, the principal difficulty was with regard to the Tuesday Sittings. On Tuesdays on more than one occasion noble Lords have come down to take their seats and have found under the present Standing Order that they have not been able to do so. I know of three cases on last Tuesday in which noble Lords were either actually within or on their way to the House, and have been unable to take their seats.

Motion agreed to.

Standing Order to be printed, as amended. (No. 103.)

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYMENT FOR DISCHARGED SOLDIERS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

*THE EARL OF MINTO asked the Under Secretary of State for War whether he had had under his consideration the advisability of reserving situations in the Government offices to be open preferentially for the employment of such discharged non-commissioned officers and soldiers of good character as might be able to pass the requisite examination; and whether a Report on the feasibility and the advisability of such a scheme had been made by any Committee; and, if so, whether such Report could be laid on the Tables of both Houses? He expressed some diffidence in addressing their Lordships' House for the first time upon so important a matter. Their Lordships were well aware that this country had a Short Service Army, which annually discharged from its ranks a large number of non-commissioned officers and men who had to shift for themselves for employment and had practically to begin life over again. Our Army was not raised on the same lines as the Armies of Continental Powers, which had conscription, and could pick and choose their men, while all we could do was to hold out inducements to the best class of men to join the Army. He did not think that any increase of money pay, infinitesimally small such as the taxpayers would be content to give, would have any appreciable effect on recruiting. What would be likely to have much more effect would be an improvement in the social standard of the soldier, greater care for his comfort, impressing on the public respect for the Queen's uniform, and, above all, the assurance that if he served a certain number of years with a good character, there would be certain Civil employments open to him, so that he need not have any fear for the future. It should be recollected that the Army had changed very much of late years, morally and educationally. The men were very much better educated, and drunkenness had greatly decreased. Still, there was a difficulty in getting people to employ discharged soldiers, who were consequently shut out from many posts for which they were well qualified. As he had said, education had done a great deal for the soldier, and drunkenness in the Army had largely diminished. The General Annual Return for the Army for 1891 contained a Return of men fined for drunkenness in each year from 1872 to 1891. He would give from that Return two examples. In 1881 the fines inflicted for drunkenness were 44,108; in 1891 they were 29,698. In other words, in 1881 the proportion was 243 to 1,000 men, while in 1891 it was only 147 to 1,000 men, the total reduction in the number of fines being 14,410 in 11 years. Their Lordships must, however, remember that the same men were fined over and over again, and, therefore, the number of men fined for drunkenness was much less than the number of fines. With regard to education, the same

Return showed that in 1879 the number of men in the Army who could neither read nor write was 7,597, or a proportion of 44 to 1,000; in 1889 it was only 3,814, or a proportion of 19 to 1,000. In 1879 the number of men of superior education in the Army was 85,566, or a proportion of 512 to 1,000; in 1889 it was 170,522, or a proportion of 854 to 1,000. He had not been able to find a Return of the number of discharged soldiers serving in Government offices, but those who so served were chiefly employed as messengers, and not at all in the higher places. There were now a very large number of non-commissioned officers, very highly educated, who were leaving the Army, and who were quite as capable of holding Civil posts as those who now held them, and he believed, in many cases, a great deal more capable. A soldier who had served his country well, holding a high-class certificate, surely had a greater claim upon the Government than any merely civilian clerk could possibly have. This was a matter which the State itself ought to take up. He was quite aware that the Admiralty, the War Office, and the Post Office had of late largely employed discharged soldiers, and had done a great deal of good in that way. He believed those who were so employed had discharged their duties very satisfactorily. But the voluntary employment of discharged soldiers in Government offices and by private employers was an entirely different thing from that recognised employment by the State which he had in view. What should be done was this: any recruit on joining the Army should be informed that, on his discharge with a good character after a certain number of years' service, and on passing a sufficient examination, he would have a Civil appointment open to him. That would put the matter on a sounder basis, and the Service upon an entirely different footing. If such an alteration were made, it need not involve any increased charge upon the Public Purse. The only loss that he could see would be of a certain amount of patronage in the Government offices. Foreign countries had recognised the great necessity of leavening a young Army with old soldiers, and they held out inducements to men to serve for 12 years on the understanding that they should receive Civil employment at the end of the time.

A Report from Colonel Douglaes Dawson, our military attaché in Austria-Hungary, showed that 59,641 were open to discharged soldiers. Another sent by Colonel Talbot from France showed that the most important inducement to soldiers to remain in the ranks had been not increases of pay, but the certainty afforded to well-conducted men of obtaining employment under the State. Colonel Talbot also alluded to the difference in the soldier's position in France and in this country, the uniform being always treated there with respect. Lord Vivian, Her Majesty's Ambassador at Rome, had forwarded a similar Report from Colonel Slade, showing that to provide employment for men leaving the Services with a good character was the best means of popularising and raising the moral tone of the Services by attracting a better class of men. In Foreign Armies the object, of course, was to induce men to serve on with the colours, while our difficulty was to induce men to join the Army at all. He would suggest some arrangement by which a certain number of situations in the Public Service should be reserved for old soldiers, and that those situations should be divided into two classes—upper and lower. The upper class should consist of clerkships and the better-paid offices suitable for non-commissioned officers—educated men; whilst the lower class, such as messengerships and porterships, should be given to soldiers. If such a plan were adopted and carried out, it would not only induce men to remain in the Service, but would do much to allay the discontent and discouragement which now existed in the minds of soldiers, and of non-commissioned officers especially. He begged to ask the question which he had placed on the Paper.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH said, he desired to put in a word for the Sister Service. While he hoped Her Majesty's Government would not hesitate to give the pledge asked on behalf of non-commissioned officers and men of the Army, he trusted they would not forget the warrant officers and good-conduct men discharged from the Navy. He would point out that it would hardly be fair for the Government to pledge themselves entirely to the Army on a question of this kind, and not give any consideration to the claims of the men of the Navy. Difficult as it might be for a discharged non-commissioned officer to obtain civilian employment, it was much more so for men who had spent all their lives at sea.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS thought the noble Earl had done a public service by bringing this matter forward. It was a question of importance not only to the Services—for the men of both Services should be considered—but to the country. The English War Office was the only one in Europe where civilians ruled, and he thought that positions in that Department especially should be found for non-commissioned officers and soldiers, and even for commissioned officers who might be willing to take them. In this we should only be following the example of other countries. We endeavoured to model our Army on the German system of short service, but we left out the important element of compulsion, which was the essence of the German plan, and gave no adequate inducement to men to join the Service voluntarily. Therefore, we had a bad imitation of a Short Service Army. He hoped the noble Lord representing the War Office would give a favourable answer to the request of the noble Lord.

LORD DORCHESTER said, the subject was a very important one, and he regretted not only that the House was so scantily filled, but the absence on that occasion of two of our most distinguished Generals, and especially of the illustrious Duke, who took a deep interest in all that concerned the welfare of the Army. Hitherto the British soldier's life had been one of punishment without reward. He could say that fearlessly, having served under the Queen's colours more than 50 years ago. Why did soldiers not get any reward in the direction suggested when they left the Service? It was, in his opinion, because of Parliamentary influence and the influence of private individuals in high places. Until it was clearly understood that those who wore the Queen's livery, and who were the worst paid of Her Majesty's subjects, would have some employment on leaving the Army there would be no real inducement for men to enter the Service. If, however, such an inducement were offered, the Service would be made a hundred times more popular than it had ever been. At one time the soldier's uniform would prevent his being allowed into Kensington Gardens, one of the Queen's Parks. With the exception of the Yeomen of the Guard and a few such corps, he hardly knew an instance where old soldiers were employed in public institutions or buildings. Certainly a sergeant who had served under him was now a gatekeeper at the National Gallery. But where there was one appointed to a public office there ought to be hundreds. The late Postmaster General, and also one of the highest officials of their Lordships' House, had done much to promote the interests of the soldier in this way; but there was room and opportunity to do much more, and he hoped the representations of the noble Earl would have the desired effect. He remembered that when he called on the late German Ambassador the door of the Embassy was always opened by an old German soldier decorated with the medals he had won serving his country. How many Members of their Lordships' House, and how many Members of the other House, selected soldiers to serve them? So far from being employed, they were rather rejected. To a great extent the remedy rested with employers. He trusted that the unpopularity of the soldiers among the classes would soon be a thing of the past, and that the public example set by the Postmaster General of the late Government would soon be followed and succeeded by the present Administrations.

THE EARL OF DUNDONALD reminded the House that in 1891 he brought before their Lordships the necessity of finding Civil employment for deserving non-commissioned officers on the expiration of their period of service. So far back as 1877 a Committee reported that a large number of Civil posts under Government could be suitably filled by discharged soldiers and sailors. That Report, however, was practically ignored by successive Governments. He hoped that this apathy on the part of the authorities would now cease. If the country could not afford to give non-commissioned officers, who were the backbone of the Army, adequate pensions on retirement, facilities ought to be given to them to enter the Civil Service. A certain number of posts ought to be kept for them exclusively, and to obtain these posts they should be required to pass a qualifying examination only upon the recommendation of their Commanding Officer. Of course, they could not be expected to compete after their term of service with lads just fresh from school, who were crammed with every trick for passing the examinations. This would do more for the benefit of the Service than anything else that could be devised.

LORD SANDHURST considered that the discussion had been very profitable. He might inform the noble Earl who had just sat down that the Report of the Committee of 1877 had had some good effects, one of them being that since 1879 nearly all the messengers appointed at the War Office had been soldiers, and he did not believe any more civilian appointments would be made. At the Admiralty, in like manner, the messengers were old sailors. The valuable suggestions of Lord Wantage's Committee on the subject under discussion were being considered by the Secretary of State for War, as were also the proposals that had been made for keeping non-commissioned officers in the Service for a longer time. The example set by the War Office in the employment of old soldiers had been followed by the Post Office, and he should be very glad if other Public Departments would also follow it. The great Railway Companies had come forward with great public spirit, and had promised to give a large number of situations to soldiers. In last year's Queen's Regulations it was provided that official registers should be kept at the head-quarters of recruiting depôts, upon which well-conducted men who had joined the Reserve or were time-expired, and who wanted employment, could place their names; and there existed a Society known as the "National Association for Finding Employment for Old Soldiers." This Association had been eight years in existence, and did very important work. Whilst eight years ago it provided work for 184 men only, last year it procured situations for upwards of 2,600. A Departmental Committee that had recently considered the subject of the employment of soldiers as messengers in the public offices recommended that the example set by the War Office, Admiralty, and Post Office should be followed by the other great Departments. He had explained to the House what was being done within his knowledge for the benefit of the retired soldier. He did not know of any such scheme as was mentioned in the noble Earl's question; but he could state that the Secretary of State was in complete sympathy with the noble Lords who had spoken on this subject, and would gladly do anything in his power to further the object which they had at heart.

*THE EARL OF MINTO said, in reference to the statement of the noble Lord the Under Secretary for War, that no doubt a great deal of good was being done by the Departments and public offices mentioned, but what he wanted to make clear was that all that was an entirely different thing from making it a right; so that the time-expired soldier might look to the State as a right for employment on leaving the Service. All those voluntary employments might break down to-morrow, and that guarantee ought to be given by the State. He had also intended to point out that while a discharged soldier was still in the service of the State he ought to be allowed to count his time for pension.

LORD SANDHURST said, that was a much larger question, and he was not able to make any general statement on the subject. At the same time, he would take care to bring the point before the Secretary of State, so that the whole matter might be taken into consideration.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN thought the statement of the Under Secretary would be generally satisfactory to their Lordships, but it was to be hoped that a great deal would be done in other Departments besides the War Office. He would suggest that it might be desirable that a Parliamentary Committee should be appointed to inquire into the matter to see whether the system could not be carried further. As far as that House was concerned, their Lordships had done what they could to forward the interests of old soldiers, for it had been ordered that in any junior appointments in their Lordships' House preference should be given to soldiers and sailors. One difficulty was that objection was sometimes raised to a soldier drawing his military pension when he was in Civil employment. It appeared to him—and he thought it was a matter in which Parliament should express an opinion—that when a soldier had earned a pension by military service, he ought not to be debarred from receiving also any Civil pension to which he might subsequently become entitled in Civil Service.

THE EARL OF DUNDONALD pointed out that out of the 4,768 posts reported by Lord Wantage's Committee as suitable for discharged soldiers and sailors, only 220 had been filled with those men between 1877 and 1891.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 18th May 1893.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

WATER PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 2) BILL.—(No. 338.)

MR. EDWARDS (Radnorshire) had the following Notice of Motion on the Paper:—

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Water Provisional Orders (No. 2) Bill to strike out of the Bill the Provisional Order empowering the Llandrindod Wells Water Company to raise additional capital.”

MR. SPEAKER: The other day the House sanctioned the Second Reading of a cluster of Bills of which this Bill forms one. To move an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to strike out one whole Bill is quite an unprecedented exercise of the right of Instruction, and would not be in Order. The hon. Gentleman, however, has got his remedy. The time for petitioning has not expired yet; and if a Petition is presented it will go, I understand, before the ordinary Committee, and will be dealt with as that Committee thinks fit.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

POLICE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.
(No. 103.)

Lords' Amendment considered.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.), in moving that the Lords' Amendment to this Bill be considered, said, the Amendment had been introduced by the Home Office for the purpose of enabling different and more beneficial investment of funds intended for pension purposes.

Lords' Amendment agreed to.

DAY INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 158.)

Lords' Amendments considered.

MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.), in moving that the Lords' Amendments to this Bill be considered, said, the only alterations which had been made in another place were one or two drafting Amendments, with the addition of clauses proposed by the Scotch Office. One was to the effect that Magistrates would always sit in open Court, and the other was a saving clause in regard to a Glasgow Bill.

Lords' Amendments agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

THE SCOTCH FISHERY LAWS.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) : I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that Lord Cromarty's gamekeeper and two watchers stopped a crew of Ullapool fishermen on the 13th ultimo at 11 p.m. when fishing for bait, at a spot which for the past 60 years has been regularly frequented by the fishermen for that purpose ; that the gamekeeper seized a small sea trout which was in the net and threw it into the boat, with the object of securing a conviction against them for poaching for sea trout ; and whether he will take any action in the matter ?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR, Clackmannan, &c.) : This question appears to relate to an occurrence which took place at the mouth of the Ullapool River—the gamekeeper and watchers were not servants of Lord Cromarty, but of the sporting tenant, who is about to institute proceedings against two of the fishermen, charging them with contravention of the Act of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 95. The whole facts of the case will, doubtless, be elicited at the trial, a report of which I have asked to be sent to me, and I shall then see whether any further action is called for.

BARRY GOLF LINKS.

MR. LENG (Dundee) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any opinion has been received from the Law Officers of the Crown in Scotland, relative to the public rights on the foreshore of Barry Links ; whether the Memorial from the Commissioners of Carnoustie, respecting the danger to the lieges from artillery practice, has been considered ; and what decision has been arrived at with regard to the same ?

Mr. D. Crawford

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.) : The opinion of the Lord Advocate has been received. It is to the effect that the War Department has power to make bye-laws to regulate the use by the public of the foreshore on Barry Links. The Memorial from the Commissioners of Carnoustie has been considered, and it has been found that no new situation as regards foreshores has been created by the recent purchase, seeing that artillery fire across them has gone on for several years past. Bye-laws will be made.

ST. HELENA.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Her Majesty's Government or Secretary of State have considered the state of things existing in St. Helena, as revealed in the Report No. 63 for 1891, recently issued, in which the Governor states that his gloomy forebodings in 1890 were more than justified by the year under review ; and whether, in view of the general financial depression and the serious fall in the Revenue, the serious character of the Census Return, which shows an excess of females over males of about 16 per cent., and the state of things described in the Report, the Secretary of State will consider the advisability of assisting some of these people to emigrate to South Africa who may desire to do so, and generally to consider whether the condition of the island demands more attention than it appears to have received ?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar) : The melancholy state of things existing in St. Helena has received the most anxious consideration of the Secretary of State. An account of the efforts which have been made ever since the shipping began to decline, more than 20 years ago, to find employment for the people by developing the natural resources of the island will be found in the Annual Report for 1889. Unfortunately, these efforts have not been successful ; and the only remedy for the distress is, probably, to be found in emigration. In 1891, through the kindness of the Admiralty, 75 persons were conveyed to the Cape by a troopship; and perhaps, if a similar opportunity occurs again, the Admiralty will allow some more emigrants to be taken.

ADMIRAL FIELD: Will the Government assist in emigrating these poor people, and, as was done on the former occasion, send a man-of-war?

MR. S. BUXTON: We are in communication with the Admiralty on the subject.

POSTAL CHARGES TO ST. HELENA..

ADMIRAL FIELD: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the Report on St. Helena, No. 63, 1891, by the Governor, and the postal charges therein complained of; and whether he will consider the desirability of relieving these people of the present rates of 6d. per $\frac{1}{2}$ oz. on letters to the United Kingdom, with still higher rates to other parts of the world, and notably 1s. 2d. per $\frac{1}{2}$ oz. on letters to Mauritius, together with other postal grievances to which attention has been called in the said Report?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): My attention has been called to the Report of the Governor of St. Helena. The policy of the Post Office has been to allow the Colonial Postal Authorities to fix their own postal rates on homeward correspondence; and when the letter postage from this country to places abroad (including St. Helena) was reduced to 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. the $\frac{1}{2}$ oz. the Colonies were left free to maintain or to lower their previously existing rates. St. Helena elected to maintain the high rates mentioned in the question, and I should not feel justified in putting pressure upon the Colonial Authorities, or in proposing a considerable subsidy to the Colonial Post Office, in order to induce them to lower the rates.

ADMIRAL FIELD: Will the right hon. Gentleman send a copy of that answer to the Governor who has made this very strong Report, so that he may know where the fault rests?

MR. A. MORLEY: That is rather a matter for the Colonial Office.

NATIONAL SCHOOL WINDOWS.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that some of Her Majesty's School Inspectors have reported that diamond panes should be removed from national school windows and be replaced by ordinary square glass windows; whether he has considered that this would cause great expense to the school managers; and whether any special instructions have been issued by the Council to the Inspectors on this matter?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): The Department have for many years past recommended that diamond or leaded panes should be avoided, as they obstruct light to some extent, are not always impervious to weather, and are not easy to keep clean. But their use is not objected to in moderation—for example, in the upper parts of the windows. No special instructions have been issued to Inspectors on the point. In some cases Inspectors have probably recommended the replacement of diamond by ordinary panes, on the above grounds, where the existing windows were not weathertight, or let in insufficient light.

TRADES UNIONS AND TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

MR. ALBAN GIBBS (London): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether objections have been raised by Trades Unions against the instruction in technical schools of persons not connected by their ordinary employment with the industry about which they desire to be taught, and whether the managers of any such schools, either in London or elsewhere, have consented by agreement or tacit understanding, or in any other way, to exclude students unconnected with the trade about some branch of which instruction was being given; and in view of the fact that these technical schools were designed to give instruction to all persons who might desire it, and that the Charity Commissioners have allotted large sums derived from charitable sources to founding and supporting such schools, whether he will take steps to secure the open use of these schools by all who may wish to attend them?

MR. ACLAND: I believe that the objections raised by Trade Unions have considerable weight. It is not the function of technical education, as understood in England, to teach trades, but rather to supplement workshop practice by a knowledge of scientific or artistic principles connected with certain industries. That being so, it may be reasonably held to be undesirable to admit to certain kinds of technical classes those who have not the foundation of workshop practice. If a number of amateurs were admitted to such classes, the teaching given would have to be distorted, or even altogether largely changed. It is mainly a question of organisation for the Governing Bodies concerned. I am not aware of any reason for interference.

TELEGRAPH SERVICE TO URLINGFORD.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can arrange to have the telegraph extended to Urlingford, County Kilkenny?

MR. A. MORLEY : I am glad to inform the hon. Member that the extension can be granted.

PERIODICAL INSPECTIONS OF MILITARY ARMS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the stated intention of the War Office has been carried out, and the whole of the small arms in the hands of troops at home are periodically tested by viewers specially detached from the inspection staff—once a year in the case of Regular troops, once in two years in that of the Militia, and once in three years in that of the Volunteers; how often such inspections have been made in each case; and what are the arrangements as to the inspection of these arms abroad?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : Inspections of small arms are carried out annually in the case of troops at home—once every two years in the case of the Militia, and once every three years in the case of the Volunteers. No special arrangements have yet been made as to the troops in the Colonies, and the Indian Government makes its own arrangements.

Mr. Acland

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE AND HIS TENANTS.

MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware, as has been stated in The Daily Express of 10th May, 1893, that cattle, the property of Mr. Matthew Bates, Primrose Lodge, Carnew, have been seized for rent due to the hon. Member for West Kerry; whether he is aware that an ejectment has been taken out by the same landlord against the orphan children of the late John Bolton, of Gorey; and that these two families are Protestants, and have been recently visited by severe family affliction; and whether he will refuse to allow the Forces of the Crown to be employed in carrying out these legal processes?

MR. J. MORLEY : I am informed that the facts are substantially as stated in the question. It is not anticipated that the Forces of the Crown will be requisitioned for the ejectment referred to, though if such a requisition should be made I shall have no choice in the matter.

MR. JOHNSTON : Is it not a fact that the Forces of the Crown will not be required owing to the circumstance that these people are Protestants?

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Kerry, W.) : By the indulgence of the House I may be allowed to state, with reference to the question of the hon. Member for South Belfast, that in the case of Mr. Bates his holding is an agricultural holding, the rent of which has been fixed by arbitration. The old rent was £41. The arbitration rent is £25. The Poor Law valuation of the holding is £29, and the acreage 75 acres. When the arbitration rent was fixed in 1889, arrears to the amount of £151 14s. 2d. were wiped out. In addition to the rent for which the Sheriff lately seized, Mr. Bates still owes £26 4s. 2d.—over a year's rent. I may add that in this case proceedings have been allowed to lie over for several months. Seizures were being made at the suits of other creditors, some of whom, I understand, are co-religionists of Mr. Bates. The seizure to which the question refers was not made at my suit only, but at the suit of another creditor also. In the case of the representatives of John Bolton, the holding is a town holding, consisting of a house, yard, and garden situated in the main street of the town of Gorey, the rent of which is £18 9s. In 1886, at the late Mr. Bolton's request, I spent £200 in improving his house. There is now due on the holding £97 12s. 3d., over five years' rent. I may add that I offered to take £50 in lieu of arrears, and to reduce the rent to £15 per annum; but that offer was not accepted.

ST. CLEMENT'S, KENSINGTON.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the Lord of the Manor of Fulham (the Bishop of London) in 1869 gave five acres of the waste of the manor to the Vicar of St. Clement's, Kensington, for building thereon a vicarage and conveniences without the consent of the commoners; and that since that time, 1869, nearly the whole of the five acres, with one rood and eleven perches of the waste of the manor added afterwards, has, with the Bishop's consent, been converted into a building estate, producing £360 per annum; and whether the Lord of the Manor was acting within his legal rights; and, if not, what steps the Government propose to take to have the land returned to the commoners?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): I am informed that the five acres referred to, being part of the waste of the Manor of Fulham, was granted in 1869 to the Vicar of St. Clement's as glebe by the Lord of the Manor (the Bishop of London), with the concurrence of the commoners (as represented by the Homage Jury), although such consent is not required by the Act 51 Geo. III., c. 115, under which the grant was made. The land having thus become glebe, it was subsequently leased for building purposes. I am advised that the Lord of the Manor was within his right in making the grant in question.

SIR A. BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.): May I ask whether it is the case that the Vicar, Mr. Dalgarno Robinson, although the Bishop had full power to grant the land, has compensated the commoners to the full extent of their interest—£300; whether it is true that, on the parish having to make up the North Pole Road for about 350 feet, the Court Leet, who were responsible, had no money, and the Vicar paid the expenses on condition of their surrendering their rights over the rood and few perches in question, which offer was gladly accepted; whether the public have no right to Wormwood Scrubbs, but only the Lord and the commoners, about 80 of them; and whether it is not the case that, owing to the persistent efforts of Mr. Dalgarno Robinson, both the Greater and the Little Scrubbs have been secured to the public for ever?

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I rise to Order. Is the hon. Baronet in Order in putting a series of questions which contain statements of facts as to which there is a dispute? I myself take an entirely different view of the matter.

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Baronet will take upon himself the responsibility of the statements he can ask whether those statements are true.

SIR A. BORTHWICK: I am not in any way responsible for the statements, but I simply ask whether they are true?

MR. SPEAKER: The better course would be for the hon. Baronet to ascertain the facts, or else to give notice of his question.

MR. A. C. MORTON: I am afraid the Home Secretary did not quite catch the point of my question—why land which had been given for a vicarage has since been converted into a building estate; and whether it is legal that land given for one purpose should be used for another purpose?

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): Mr. Robinson has told me himself that he paid the money.

MR. SPEAKER: That is not putting a question.

MR. ASQUITH: I have no knowledge of the facts stated by the hon. Baronet, and am totally unable to answer his question; but if the hon. Baronet puts a question down on the Paper I will endeavour to answer it. As to the last question, I am informed that the land has been granted with the consent of all the persons interested, and that whatever has been done has been perfectly legal.

TRIAL BY JURY IN BENGAL.

MR. PAUL (Edinburgh, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India will be directed to consider the desirability of carrying out the recommendation made by two members of the recent Commission that trial by jury should be extended to all Sessions cases in the district of Bengal, where it now partially prevails; and whether the Government will consider the desirability of introducing it as an experiment into those districts where it is not now in force, as the Commissioners have unanimously found it to have been successful over so large an area?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL, North Beds.): A further Despatch on the recommendations contained in the Report of the Commission is expected from India, and the Secretary of State must reserve any expression of his opinion until that Despatch has been received and considered.

WAGES IN DOCKYARDS AND ARSENALS.

MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War when the Report on Wages and Conditions of Labour of Arsenal and Dockyard Labourers will be presented to the House?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: This Report has now been completed for the consideration of the Government, and I hope no great delay will occur before that consideration is given. It is not a Report which can be, according to ordinary practice, presented to the House.

CHARGES AGAINST IRISH CATHOLICS.

COLONEL SANDYS (Lancashire, S.W., Bootle): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is now able to give any further information regarding the young woman, in charge of two nuns, who in the month of March leaped overboard from the steamer Waterford between Ireland and England, intending to commit suicide, as to whether she was actually insane or not; and, if so, how this conclusion was arrived at; whether he is aware that a young woman named Mary Breen, the servant of a Methodist minister in Dungannon, County Tyrone, who had informed the priest there that she could no longer remain in the Roman Catholic faith, was forcibly taken by three men from her master's house on 7th July, 1891, and cannot now be found; and whether he will make inquiries into the matter?

MR. ASQUITH: I am unable to give any further information on the first part of this question beyond that which was communicated to the hon. and gallant Member by my directions on the 21st of April last, when I informed him that I had ascertained that the young lady had been duly certified to be insane. I am not aware that Mary Breen ever informed the priest that she could no longer remain in the Roman Catholic faith; but, so far from her having been removed forcibly by three men from her master's house in July, 1891, it appears from inquiries made at the time by the Irish Government that she went away with her father of her own free will. I am happy to be able to inform the hon. and gallant Member that Mary Breen was seen at her own house on April 10 last, and then expressed her intention of proceeding to America in two or three weeks' time, having received her passage money from a brother who is already there. I do not think any further inquiry as to either of these cases is necessary.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask whether it is not the fact, as stated in a letter from the Bishop of Waterford, that the certificate of insanity was signed, not only by the local medical practitioner, but by the resident medical officer of a large Government institution, who is a Protestant, and one of the highest authorities on mental disease?

MR. ASQUITH: I believe the facts are as stated by the hon. Member; but I have no information as to the religious faith of the medical man.

MARKS OF ORIGIN.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if, having regard to the injury inflicted on poor basket makers in Essex by the importation of foreign baskets, frequently made by prison labour, and their sale as of English make, he will give effect to the prayer of workers from all parts of the country addressed to him by deputation on 6th May, and introduce legislation to enable purchasers to distinguish between home-made and foreign products ?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside) : No, Sir. I have no intention of introducing legislation to compel the marking of the place of origin on all goods imported into this country ?

ELECTORAL PRIVILEGES OF CIVIL SERVANTS.

MR. MACDONALD (Tower Hamlets, Bow) : I beg to ask the Solicitor General which Acts of Parliament deal with the electoral privileges of Civil servants ; and what is the section of any Act from which officials of Civil establishments derive their authority for restricting the actions of their subordinates who desire to take part in public affairs ?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar) : There are no Acts of Parliament unrepealed that deal specially with the electoral privileges of Civil servants. Whatever regulations are made with reference to the action of subordinate officials in the Civil Service, are made not under the authority of any section of an Act of Parliament, but under the inherent authority of Heads of Departments to make regulations for the discipline and government of those under their control.

THE CASE OF MARY DYMOCK.

MR. MACDONALD : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will inquire into the circumstances in which a sentence of seven years' penal servitude was passed at Stirling two weeks ago on Mary Dymock for throwing her illegitimate child into a river, she being at the time exhausted from a long night walk, and almost desperate and starving ; and whether, if the circumstances justify it, he will advise a reduction of the sentence ?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton) : This question should have been addressed to me. I will give any Petition presented to me on behalf of the person referred to the most anxious consideration. I am sure the hon. Member will see I cannot say more than that.

BOARD OF AGRICULTURE PUBLICATIONS.

MR. LENG : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether, considering the importance of making the valuable Reports received by the Board on such subjects as rust or mildew on wheat, and on dairy farming in Denmark, Germany, and Sweden, as largely available as possible, he will lay them upon the Table of the House ; and whether, either through the newspapers, free libraries, or village schoolmasters, he will give a larger circulation to the useful leaflets prepared by the Board on matters of general agricultural interest ?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden) : I shall be happy to give effect to the wish expressed by my hon. Friend, and to lay upon the Table the two Reports to which he refers. With regard to the leaflets issued by my Department, I can only say that I am anxious to secure for them as wide a circulation as possible amongst those concerned ; and I will endeavour to arrange for them to be regularly supplied to any newspapers, free libraries, or village schoolmasters, who may signify their desire to receive them, and whose names are not already on our circulation list.

"THE LABOUR GAZETTE."

MR. LENG : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether copies of The Labour Gazette will be issued to such free libraries as may apply for them, or whether any other means will be taken to bring the information it contains under the notice of the labouring classes ?

MR. MUNDELLA : The Labour Gazette has been sent gratuitously to free libraries, mechanics' institutes, Trades Unions, co-operative societies, workmen's clubs, and other similar institutions of a non-political character.

MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.) : Will the distribution be continued ?

MR. MUNDELLA : Yes, Sir.

WOOLWICH BARRACKS.

MR. ABEL SMITH (Herts, E.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what is the sanitary condition of the Grand Depot Barracks at Woolwich ; and whether the medical officer of the district has reported on the state of the drains?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No Reports have been received as to the Grand Dépôt Barracks at Woolwich being in an insanitary condition; but the system of drainage of the Royal Artillery Barracks is reported to be old and defective. A reconstruction of the whole system is under reconsideration. The general health of the troops has been reported to be good.

MR. ABEL SMITH: Will the right hon. Gentleman press this work forward? I am told that some of the existing drains are 100 years old.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: My experience is that drains 100 years old are sometimes better than those of recent construction.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY FORCE FUND.

MR. MAINS (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether extra clerks are at present engaged in each County Inspector's office in Ireland, with a view of immediately winding up the benefit branch of the Royal Irish Constabulary Force Fund, and distributing it amongst the subscribers to it, who are unanimous in having it wound up; and if the fund is about to be wound up, will pensioners who have contributed to it for lengthened periods, but who have ceased to contribute on the death of their wives and relatives, be refunded the amount they have paid into it?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): No distribution of assets of the benefit branch of the Constabulary Force Fund is contemplated, or any winding up other than that already announced by me on more than one occasion in this House—namely, by meeting its obligations as they become due. The clerical work now being performed at County Head Quarters has reference solely to the collection of certain items of information for the Commissioners of the National Debt, in whose hands the management of the fund is being placed.

Mr. Abel Smith

HALF-PAY COLONELS.

SIR FREDERICK SEAGER HUNT (Marylebone, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, with reference to his statement to the effect that the Government have thought it desirable to make some addition to the pay of Colonels on half-pay during their period of suspended animation, he is now in a position to inform the House what addition it has been decided to make; and whether the additional payment will take effect from the commencement of the present financial year or from a prior date?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am sorry for the delay which has occurred in this matter; but if the hon. Gentleman will repeat the question after the Recess, I shall be able to give him a positive answer.

GUN LICENCES IN IRELAND.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork Co., W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. William Cotter, P.L.G., residing at Breenymore, Bantry, has applied to Captain Welsh, R.M., for a licence to carry a gun on his farm, but has been refused; and, if so, will he inquire what are the grounds for the refusal?

MR. J. MORLEY: I learn that Mr. William Cotter has been refused an arms licence as stated. The power of granting or withholding such licences is vested by law in the Resident Magistrate of the district, and with this discretionary power the Government cannot interfere. Possibly the refusal in this instance may have had something to say to the state of the district at the time when application was first made some years ago. Of course, there is nothing to prevent Mr. Cotter from renewing his application now if he should see fit to do so.

MR. GILHOOLY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. John Cotter, of Barna, Skibbereen, has applied to Captain Welsh, R.M., for a licence to carry a gun on his farm; that Dr. Lewis, J.P., gave Mr. Cotter a letter of recommendation to Captain Welsh; but that Mr. Cotter was refused the licence; and will he inquire on what grounds the licence was refused?

MR. J. MORLEY : I am informed that the Resident Magistrate has no recollection of having received an application from Mr. John Cotter. It also appears that the local Justice named cannot recollect having recommended Mr. Cotter for a licence.

THE HANSARD UNION PROSECUTION.

† MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what fees in addition to salary are payable to the Solicitor General, under the new system recently introduced, in connection with the prosecution of Bottomley and others at the last Old Bailey Sessions ; and how the amount of such fees compares with the amount that would have been payable under the former system ?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham) : The Solicitor General's fees in the Hansard Union prosecution amount to about £1,650. I am informed that in this particular case the same, or very nearly the same, amount of fees would have been payable under the old as under the new arrangement.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS : Is it not the fact that there is a considerable increase in the amount of the fees payable under the new system over what was payable under the old system ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : There are fees payable under the new system which were not payable under the old system ; but that point does not arise in this case.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR (Leeds, Central) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what is the total amount of the costs, charges, and expenses incurred in the recent prosecution of Sir Henry Isaacs, Mr. Horatio Bottomley, and others, in connection with the affairs of the Company known as the Hansard Publishing Union, Limited ; and out of what Vote such costs, charges, and expenses will be paid ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : The exact amount of the costs cannot yet be stated ; but they are estimated to amount to about £6,200, and will be paid from the Vote for Law Charges.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) : Is the Treasury in a position to certify the costs of any particular trial in England or Ireland ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I cannot answer that question without notice.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY INSPECTORS.

MR. T. M. HEALY : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland will he issue instructions to have the actual cost of foraging troop and transport horses in the Royal Irish Constabulary duly vouched and shown in the public accounts like other items of expenditure ; how many of the 267 County and District Inspectors of the Royal Irish Constabulary in receipt of rent for a private house have their office in a barrack, while they draw rent for an office elsewhere ; how many of such offices in barracks are wholly or partially furnished with articles of barrack furniture paid for by the public ; how many County and District Inspectors in receipt of an annual allowance of £50 for a private horse and £45 for a servant, while residing away from the station, keep their horses, cars, hay, straw, &c., on the barrack premises ; and on what grounds was it stated that sergeants in charge of stations had their stationery allowance lately doubled ?

MR. J. MORLEY : As regards the first paragraph, I see some disadvantage in this sort of contract with officers. There is this to be said, however, against the suggestion of the hon. Member—namely, that it would result in the loss of control over the expenditure. The allowance covers not only feeding, but also shoeing, medicine, and stable requisites ; and if these were purchased and paid for separately, the total cost would, it is considered, be greatly increased. I will make further inquiry, however, into the matter. No allowance for an office elsewhere than in barracks is drawn by any officers, except eight District Inspectors, and the Inspector General has no reason to believe that any of these do not provide offices in their own houses. No articles of distinctively office furniture are supplied by the Constabulary Department. In some instances articles of furniture were supplied by the Board of Works in barracks built by that Department ; the practice, however, has long since been discontinued, although the few articles so supplied were not removed. The Inspector General cannot reply to the fourth paragraph, but I have requested him to make inquiry into the matter. He informs me that in some instances, however, he is aware that it is most difficult for officers to procure suitable stabling in the town where stationed, and some are compelled to live in lodgings and cannot obtain houses. In cases where such difficulty exists officers have always been allowed to keep their horses on barrack premises. It was not stated that the stationery allowance for sergeants in charge of stations had been lately doubled. The increase was granted from April 1, 1882, whilst the increase in the officers' allowance did not take effect till December, 1890.

MR. T. M. HEALY : We want to get the basis on which these officers propose to commute their allowances after the Home Rule Bill is passed.

MR. J. MORLEY : I quite understand that, and the point is being borne in mind.

THE LEITRIM MAGISTRACY.

MR. P. A. M'HUGH (Leitrim, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that there is no Nationalist holding the Commission of the Peace for the County of Leitrim resident in the Petty Sessions district of Drumkeeran, in which 94 per cent. of the inhabitants are Nationalists ; has a Nationalist Magistrate ever adjudicated in the Petty Sessions Court of Drumkeeran district ; has the Lord Chancellor of Ireland been requested to appoint to the Commission of the Peace for the County of Leitrim a Nationalist residing in the district ; has the Lord Chancellor up to the present refused to comply with the request, and why ; and will the Lord Chancellor consider the advisability of appointing a Nationalist in the district to the Commission of the Peace for the County of Leitrim ?

MR. J. MORLEY : It is probably the fact, as I am told, that no Nationalist Magistrate adjudicates in the Petty Sessions district referred to ; but the Lord Chancellor has no authentic information on the subject. The Lord Chancellor has been asked to appoint one gentleman to the Commission in this district ; but he has not appointed him, and he has asked me to say that, as the result of inquiries, he is compelled to decline to appoint the gentleman in question. The Lord Chancellor will be glad to consider on his own responsibility the claims of any gentleman whose name may be submitted to him, and to appoint him if he ascertains him to be fit.

THE DUTIES OF PROCURATORS FISCAL

MR. A. C. MORTON : I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that Procurators Fiscal are in the habit of employing clerks to make inquiries which should be made by themselves ; and, if so, will he see that properly-qualified persons are employed to make these secret and important inquiries ?

*MR. J. B. BALFOUR : By the Act of 40 & 41 Vict., c. 50, Section 7, Fiscals were authorised to appoint Deputes with the consent of the Lord Advocate and Sheriff, and I believe that this provision has been generally taken advantage of. It is, however, clearly pointed out in the Crown Office Orders issued to Fiscals that the statutory provision for the appointment of duly-qualified Deputes is not intended in any way to deprive the Public Service of the advantage of the personal discharge by Fiscals of the duties of their office, but only to provide for cases in which it is impossible for them to do the work themselves. It may sometimes be necessary to employ the services of clerks, where neither the Fiscal nor his Depute can undertake the work ; but successive Lord Advocates have done everything in their power to impress upon Fiscals the importance of personal discharge of duty. If any such practice exists as is pointed out in the question, I shall be glad to receive information in regard to particular cases of it, and shall cause them to be inquired into.

SIR T. BRADY'S PENSION.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Government will carry out their promise respecting Sir Thomas Brady's pension, as requested by all sections of the Irish Members ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I am not aware that any promise has been made, except that Sir Thomas Brady's case would be again carefully considered. The Treasury have made a proposal which they hope shortly to be able to communicate to the House.

Mr. J. Morley

MR. HANBURY: Have the Treasury power to increase a pension?

MR. CARSON (Dublin University): Is it the fact that all sections of the Irish Party agree in supporting the suggestion for an increased pension?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I think all sections are agreed on that.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): No; I shall oppose any proposal which the right hon. Gentleman may make to increase the pension.

THE TRALEE AND DINGLE RAILWAY.

* SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware that last week another dwelling-house, near Camp, County Kerry, was set on fire by sparks from an engine of the Tralee and Dingle Railway, and burned to the ground with everything in it; whether, in the event of the owner of the house obtaining damages against the Tralee and Dingle Railway, the ratepayers of the barony will have to pay the damages; and whether these ratepayers have any control over the management of the line?

MR. MUNDELLA: I am informed by the company that no house was set on fire or burnt last week by the company's engine. I can express no opinion as regards the liability of the company or the ratepayers of the barony. The railway is authorised by an Order of the Lord Lieutenant in Council, and with the constitution of the company I have nothing whatever to do.

EXCESSIVE RAILWAY RATES IN IRELAND.

* MR. COLLERY (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has had any communication with the Midland Great Western Railway Company of Ireland relative to a refund of the excessive charges put on by that company in January last; whether he is aware that those charges amounted in some cases to 40 and 50 per cent. on certain goods between Dublin and Sligo; whether those rates have been voluntarily withdrawn by that company, or whether it was owing to competition from a competing line; and if any or all those increased charges are still continued on goods to intermediate stations where no competition exists; and whether those charges are regulated by mileage rates, or by such as the circumstances of the case will permit them to make?

MR. MUNDELLA: I have received a communication from the company informing me (1) that where rates have been reduced since the 2nd January, refund is made in all cases where applied for by persons paying freight; (2) rates (Dublin and Sligo) put out on the 2nd January contained increases varying from 1 to 29 per cent., and also decreases from 1 to 30 per cent.; (3) Dublin and Sligo rates have since been reduced, and now stand, compared with 1892, increases varying from 3 to 20 per cent., and decreases from 5 to 35 per cent. With regard to the last question of the hon. Member, competition is undoubtedly an element in fixing a rate.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN BENGAL.

MR. JEFFREYS: In the absence of the hon. Member for the Faversham Division of Kent, I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Judges of the High Court of Calcutta have protested against the interference of the Government of Bengal with the administration of justice; and whether any Papers on the subject can be laid upon the Table?

*MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: The matter referred to is now under the consideration of the Secretary of State in Council; and no Papers on the subject can be laid upon the Table.

LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANIES.

MR. BARROW (Southwark, Bermondsey): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has further considered the subject of the public registration of mortgage debentures created by Limited Liability Companies?

MR. MUNDELLA: Yes, Sir, I have; and I am now in communication with the Lord Chancellor with reference to a Bill dealing with the subject.

INVERNESS PRISON.

MR. WILLIAM WHITELOW (Perth): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he can state how many prisoners, male and female, were in confinement in Inverness Prison each day between 8th May and 15th May, both inclusive?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: In reply to the hon. Member, the numbers in Inverness Prison on 8th to 15th May, both dates inclusive, were:—8th May, 1893, 34 males, 1 female; 9th, 37 males, 1 female; 10th, 38 males, 2 females; 11th, 37 males, 2 females; 12th, 38 males, 3 females; 13th, 33 males, 3 females; 14th, 33 males, 3 females; 15th, 30 males, 3 females. The accommodation of the prison consists of:—For males, 27 ordinary cells, 3 large cells (for three prisoners each), 1 infirmary cell, and 1 punishment cell, accommodating in all 38 male prisoners. For females:—9 ordinary cells, 1 large cell (for three prisoners) and 1 infirmary cell, accommodating in all 13 females. From the 11th to 15th, 3 prisoners were associated on medical grounds; and when the high number of males on the 9th was reported in the weekly Return to the Commissioners, the Governor submitted the names of three long-sentence prisoners for removal.

PRECAUTIONS AGAINST CHOLERA.

MR. BURNIE (Swansea Town): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he has considered the desirability of utilising the pilots round the coasts of the United Kingdom as a cordon or line of defence against the introduction of cholera through our sea-ports; and, if so, will he state what decision has been arrived at?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): Assistance is frequently rendered by licensed pilots in connection with precautions against the introduction of cholera, and the assistance is fully appreciated. But I do not see that the pilots can be utilised as a cordon, or line of defence, as suggested.

THE MURDER OF GEORGE ROLT AT SPALDING.

MR. LOPES (Grantham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, when he recently ordered the release of Elizabeth Ireland, who was sentenced in 1879 to penal servitude for life for the wilful murder of George Rolt at Spalding, he also took into his consideration the case of the two men, Henry Howitt and John Vessey, who were convicted of the same crime?

MR. ASQUITH: Yes; the case of all three persons concerned in the outrage was fully considered; but in advising the release of Elizabeth Ireland on licence I had special regard to the fact that the violence which caused the death of Rolt was inflicted by the men, and not by the woman, and that she had during her punishment been certified to be insane, and had passed nearly three years in Broadmoor. The case of the men referred to will, under ordinary circumstances, come under review again in 1895; but I am not prepared at present to make any recommendation in regard to them.

GOVERNMENT WRITERS AND ABSTRACTORS.

SIR FREDERICK DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Government has yet come to a decision as to the limit of age in case of Writers recommended for promotion to the Class of Abstractors; and, if so, what is the maximum limit now prescribed?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The question is still under consideration.

SIR F. DIXON-HARTLAND: How soon will a decision be arrived at?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I cannot answer that without notice.

OUTRAGE IN KERRY.

MR. DANE (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that, early on the morning of Sunday last, the house of a man named Fleming, near Castleisland, County Kerry, was attacked by a number of armed men, and fired into several times; has anyone been apprehended; and has protection been afforded to Fleming's family?

MR. J. MORLEY: The house of James Flynn was fired at on the 13th instant in this locality. Three men have been arrested in connection with the outrage, and have been remanded without bail to Petty Sessions. Flynn and his family are receiving police protection?

Mr. William Whitelaw

REPORTS ON CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGES.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in reference to the Return showing the majorities necessary for changes in the Constitutions of Foreign States, whether he can state when the Reports will be presented from the States not included in the Parliamentary Paper, C. 6970 ?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick) : Reports from all the more important places have been received and laid. Of the remainder only three have yet been received, and we are waiting for more before laying a further batch.

PAY DAY IN DEVONPORT DOCK- YARD.

MR. KEARLEY (Devonport) : I beg to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty whether he can explain why the weekly pay day at Bull Point, Devonport, which hitherto has been as in the Dockyards on Fridays, has been recently altered to Saturdays, thereby causing considerable inconvenience to the weekly shopping arrangements of the men and their families ; and whether there is any reason why the original day should not be reverted to ?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee) : The wages at the different depôts were formerly paid on different days ; but, this being found inconvenient for purposes of account, Saturday was fixed upon as being, on the whole, the most convenient day to pay at all the depôts ; and that day being a half holiday, and the men receiving their wages at mid-day, it was considered ample time would be given for shopping. Should, however, real inconvenience be felt in consequence of the change, I shall be happy to consider any representation on the subject.

MR. KEARLEY : Will the hon. Gentleman accept the statement from me that it is felt to be very inconvenient ?

MR. E. ROBERTSON : Certainly, if the hon. Member makes it with authority.

BULL POINT, DEVONPORT.

MR. KEARLEY : I beg to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty whether, when the employés at Bull Point, Devonport, were transferred from the Army Ordnance Department to the Naval Ordnance Department, they were guaranteed the continuance of certain privileges in respect to leave, sick pay, and medical attendance ; whether he is aware that recently when some of the men were offered a small increase in their weekly wages, such offer was made conditional on these privileges being surrendered ; whether several refused the proffered advance rather than submit to such conditions ; and whether this attempt to break the agreement was made at the instigation of the Admiralty, or on the responsibility of the local officials ?

MR. E. ROBERTSON : The arrangement made was that the men should retain all the privileges to which they were entitled under the War Office, so long, and so long only, as they remained in the same position as at the time of transfer ; but that as soon as they received promotion or increased pay, they should come under the ordinary regulations. No information has reached me to the effect stated in the second and third paragraphs. I may add that the operation of this arrangement is one of the many questions into which the Admiralty has recently been inquiring, and will receive careful consideration.

MR. KEARLEY : Do I understand the hon. Gentleman to say that at the time the agreement was signed the men were told that they would forfeit these advantages in the case of promotion ?

MR. E. ROBERTSON : Yes, the agreement set forth that so long as they remained under the War Office there should be no change, but when they were promoted then they should come within ordinary Rules of the Admiralty.

MR. KEARLEY : Is this change the outcome of inquiries which the Admiralty have been making ?

MR. E. ROBERTSON : No, Sir. The original bargain was that the men should retain all their old privileges until they changed their position, but when they did change they should come under the ordinary Admiralty Regulations. I added that the operation of this arrangement was now being considered by the Admiralty.

THE SCOTCH WEST COAST FISHERIES.

MR. WEIR : I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether, since 27th February last, any steps have been taken to procure from the Admiralty steam cruisers for the purpose of protecting the fishermen on the North-West Coast of Scotland and the Western Isles against trawlers ?

SIR G. TREVELYAN : Yes, Sir ; communications have been passing between the Scottish Office and the Admiralty, in order to insure that when the great summer herring fishery begins the usual additional cruisers given for its protection shall be forthcoming.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.) : May I ask whether, seeing that the Secretary to the Admiralty has declined in this House any responsibility on the part of his Department for supplying sufficient ships for this purpose, he will consider the advisability of inserting in the Sea Fisheries Regulation Bill some provision for maintaining a proper sea fleet ? Otherwise the new Act will not be workable.

SIR G. TREVELYAN : That is a very interesting and proper suggestion, but I am not sure it will be necessary to introduce any legislation. The Fishery Board, undoubtedly, is not at all prepared to acquiesce in the amount of protection now afforded by the Admiralty, and I am quite aware that it is not sufficient.

MR. MACFARLANE (Argyll) : Will the right hon Gentleman apply to the Treasury for money to purchase vessels to be at the disposal of the Fishery Board ?

SIR G. TREVELYAN : That is a proper matter for consideration. Lancashire has a vessel of its own, but then that is a rich county. With regard to the summer herring fishery, I have every reason to believe that the protection given by the Admiralty will be sufficient.

MR. WEIR : Will steps be taken to secure the removal of that old sailing tub, the Jackal, which costs more to keep up than it is worth ?

[No answer was given.]

Mr. E. Robertson

SWINE FEVER.

MR. JEFFREYS : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if he can now state whether he proposes to take any action in order to carry out the recommendations of the Committee on Swine Fever ?

MR. GARDNER : I am afraid that as yet I can only refer the hon. Member to what I said in reply to the questions addressed to me on this subject a few days ago. I have not yet received the evidence on which the Report of the Departmental Committee is founded, but I understand that it will reach me in the course of the present week, and we shall then be able to see how far it will be possible for us to give effect to the conclusions at which the Committee have arrived.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) : Arising out of that reply, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman, as a matter of fact, whether in the Report of the Departmental Committee on Swine Fever there is any information whatever which could not have been obtained in his own Department without the appointment of any such Committee at all ; and whether, under these circumstances, he cannot make up his mind to deal with this question, so important to the agricultural interest, and to carry out the recommendations of the Report without waiting for the evidence upon which the Report is based ?

MR. GARDNER : I cannot admit for one moment that the Committee was unnecessary, or that I had the information in the Department already. I must refer the right hon. Gentleman to the Report. With his knowledge of public business he must know it is impossible for the Government to decide on a Report without seeing the evidence on which it is based.

MR. CHAPLIN : Well, then, I have examined it carefully, and I will ask whether the right hon. Gentleman can say what the information is in the Report which he could not have obtained in the Department ? and, failing an answer to this question, I shall take the earliest opportunity of raising this question again.

MR. GARDNER : I cannot give the right hon. Gentleman any further answer on the subject.

MR. JEFFREYS : Has the right hon. Gentleman's attention been given to a Bill already before the House on this subject ?

MR. GARDNER : But that Bill does not contain the provisions which enable us to deal with this question.

THE FURNESS RAILWAY COMPANY.

MR. W. SMITH (Lancashire, N., North Lonsdale) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware that the Furness Railway Company is charging for the carriage of agricultural products rates 50 to 60, and in some cases even 100 per cent. above the rates current in December, 1892 ; and whether he will make representations to the management of this company against such abuse of the powers conferred upon them ?

MR. MUNDELLA : I have received representations to the effect stated in my hon. Friend's question, and have placed myself in communication with the Railway Company on the subject.

THE IRISH UNDER SECRETARY'S SALARY.

MR. DANE : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the present salary attached to the office of Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant ; whether the said salary was increased, and by what amount and upon what grounds, when Sir Robert Hamilton was Under Secretary ; was Sir Robert Hamilton, when holding that Office, allowed any extra sum for the payment of premiums upon life assurance, or for the education of his children ; and, if so, upon what grounds ; and is the present Under Secretary granted the same allowances, or when were the same discontinued ?

MR. J. MORLEY : The salary attaching to the office of Under Secretary is £2,000 per annum, without extra allowances. In April, 1883, the salary was temporarily increased to £2,500 under exceptional circumstances, the increase being personal to Sir Robert Hamilton, the then Under Secretary. The special increase of £500 was continued to Sir Redvers Buller while acting temporarily as Under Secretary. It ceased on Sir West Ridgeway's appointment in October, 1887.

MR. DANE : The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the third portion of the question.

MR. J. MORLEY : I really do not think that the third paragraph of the question at all affects the root of the matter. I do not think there is any reason for me to go into the grounds which induced the Government of the day to increase the salary. A certain amount of delicacy is called for in these matters.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Is the right hon. Gentleman responsible for what was done by the Government 10 years ago ?

MR. DANE : I only want to know if the sums of money named were allowed ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I have already stated that the allowance was special and personal. Sir R. Hamilton received £2,000 a year, plus £500 a year as a special allowance in his case.

MR. DANE : Were those allowances plus the £500 ?

MR. J. MORLEY : No, Sir ; the hon. Member is entirely mistaken if he thinks that.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Will the right hon. Gentleman give us the amount of special fees paid to all the Tory lawyers under the late Government ?

MR. CARSON : And also the amount paid to the prisoners' counsel in the Maryborough trials ?

[No answer was given.]

THE DUBLIN, WICKLOW, AND WEXFORD RAILWAY.

MR. DANE : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that Major General Hutchinson has reported that the bridges carrying the line of the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway Company over Bath Avenue and South Lotts Road are in an unsafe condition, and require reconstruction ; whether he is aware that Bath Avenue is a most important thoroughfare, along which the Dublin Tramways run ; and what steps have been or will be taken to compel the Railway Company to reconstruct these bridges at their own expense and with the least possible danger to the public using these thoroughfares ?

MR. MUNDELLA : Yes, Sir, General Hutchinson has reported that the Railway Company should lose no unnecessary time in adopting the requisite measures to place the bridges in a safe condition. The Board of Trade have urged the Company to do this, and have received a reply that their engineer intends to adopt a trough girder to support each rail, the side high enough to act as a guard rail. This is now under consideration.

COMMISSIONS FOR DISTINGUISHED SERVICE.

MR. WICKHAM (Hants, Petersfield) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether any commissions have been granted to officers of the Royal Naval Reserve under Article 43 of the Revised Regulations for Royal Naval Reserve, sanctioned by Orders in Council of 23rd February, 1891, which provide that officers who shall have greatly distinguished themselves in action with the enemy, or who may, by the character or length of that service, obtain the special approbation of the Admiralty, will be eligible to receive commissions as officers in the Royal Navy; and, if no such commissions have been granted, whether the Article is to be considered inoperative?

MR. E. ROBERTSON : No commissions have yet been granted under the Regulations, but they are not to be considered as inoperative, and they will be put into operation when suitable cases arise.

DUBLIN GUARDIANS' ELECTION.

MR. FIELD : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland with reference to the recent correspondence between the Local Government Board and Messrs Joseph Delahunt and Patrick Corrigan as to the inquiry on oath into the recent election for Guardians for the Fitzwilliam Ward of the City of Dublin, in the course of which Messrs. Delahunt and Corrigan asked whether, if they should substantiate the charges made, the Board would direct a new election, and the Board replied that they could not properly set aside the Return unless it should be shown at the inquiry that votes had been wrongly allowed or disallowed to such an extent as would affect the number of votes forming the majority recorded; whether, having regard to the letter of Messrs. Delahunt and Corrigan of the 24th April, 1893, charging, amongst other things, that the Returning Officer has a direct personal interest in discouraging contests at Poor Law elections for the reasons set forth in the said letter, will he direct, should the charges made be substantiated, a new election to be ordered?

MR. W. KENNY (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green) : Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that counter-charges have been made of gross misrepresentation?

MR. J. MORLEY : I am not aware of that. In reply to the question on the Paper, I have to say I am informed that the purport of the correspondence between the two gentlemen named and the Local Government Board is correctly set forth in the question. Section 23 of the Act 6 & 7 Vict., c. 92, empowers the Local Government Board, when a question is raised as to the right of any person to act as an elected Guardian, to inquire into the circumstances of the case, and to issue such Order as they may deem requisite for determining the question. If, on inquiry under this section, the Board ascertain that the Return made by the Returning Officer is correct, i.e., that the person returned by him has obtained a majority of good and valid votes and is in all respects qualified to fill the office of Guardian, the Board do not disturb the Return; but if, on the other hand, they find that the Return is incorrect, they issue a sealed Order setting it aside and directing the holding of a new election. Complaints not affecting the validity of a Return would not constitute a legal ground for setting aside such Return, though of course if such complaints were substantiated it would become necessary to take some action against the persons affected by them.

EDINBURGH MUSEUM.

MR. PAUL : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he has received from the Education Department a statement of the grievances under which the attendants at the Edinburgh Museum believe themselves now to labour, as compared with a similar class of public servants at South Kensington; and what steps the Treasury propose to take in the matter?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The Treasury has received a letter from the Science and Art Department respecting the rates of pay of the attendants at the Edinburgh Museum, and is now in communication with the Department on the subject.

THE LEE-METFORD RIFLE.

★ MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many of the Lee-Metford magazine rifles, Mark I. pattern, have been returned by Commanding Officers owing to defects in the working of the bolt and bolt-head?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: When the rifles of early manufacture were first issued complaints were made in regard to the bolt and bolt-head. Modifications were introduced and have been applied to all arms of the pattern in question. Since the introduction of these improvements all complaints have practically ceased, and no failures have been reported.

In answer to a further question by Mr. WEIR, whose words were quite unintelligible in the Gallery,

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN asked that the period during the Recess might be allowed him in order to ascertain.

THE ARREST OF AN OXFORD TUTOR.

✓ MR. BYLES (York, W.R., Shipley): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is acquainted with the facts in a recent case of mistaken identity at Oxford, in which a tutor of Mansfield College (Mr. Lewis) was arrested at mid-day, at the Oxford Railway Station, without warrant, on a charge of theft from a public-house, he being entirely innocent of the charge; whether he is aware that Mr. Lewis wrote a letter to the Principal of his college to prove his identity and entrusted it to the police for delivery, and that, instead of delivering the said letter, they used it to endeavour to obtain further evidence against the accused, thus extending the time of his unjust detention; and whether the Home Secretary will think it his duty to take any action or make any inquiry into the matter?

Mr. ASQUITH: I have received a Report from the Chief Constable of Oxfordshire, from which it appears that a barmaid employed at the public-house at Wolvercote, where a theft had been committed, was leaving Oxford for Wolvercote by the canal towing path, when she met Mr. Lewis, and thought she recognised him as the thief. She followed him to the railway station and there gave him in custody, charging him with the theft. He was brought to the County Police-station, and as the Bullingdon Bench of Magistrates was then sitting, he was brought before them and remanded on her evidence for a week, the Bench offering to take bail. He then asked for a piece of paper to write to the Principal or Bursar of Mansfield College, asking them to be bail for him. This note was handed to the sergeant to deliver, but at that moment a friend of Mr. Lewis's came in and offered to fetch the Bursar. Mr. Lewis then told him not to trouble about the note, which was put down in front of Mr. Lewis on the table, and his friend fetched the Bursar. The sergeant, who had been told by Mr. Lewis where he lodged, went there to make inquiry, taking the paper with him to help to prove his identity. The inquiries he went to make were as much in Mr. Lewis's interest as in the prosecution's, and the time of his detention was not in the least extended by the action of the police. I think my hon. Friend will, after hearing this account, agree with me in thinking there appears to be no reason to impeach the conduct of the police in question, and I do not, under the circumstances, consider it my duty to take any action in the matter. If Mr. Lewis has sustained any legal wrong the remedy by action is, of course, open to him.

Mr. BYLES: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the statement of Mr. Lewis and his friends differs materially from that given by the police. Is it not their duty to protect the innocent as well as detect the guilty?

Mr. ASQUITH: The statements do differ; but, as I have said, Mr. Lewis, if aggrieved, has his remedy in his own hands. I have no control over the Oxfordshire Police.

RAVAGES BY FOXES IN ROSS-SHIRE.

MR. WEIR : I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been drawn to the ravages of foxes amongst the lambs in the Lochcarron district of Ross-shire, and the inability or unwillingness of the Landlords' and Sporting Tenants' Association to capture or destroy these vermin; and whether steps will be taken to deal energetically with this grievance?

SIR G. TREVELYAN : My attention has not been called to these special ravages. If there is a serious grievance from the neglect to kill foxes in deer forests, there are bodies representing public opinion in the Highlands officially and non-officially from whom I should expect to receive resolutions.

FRANK BUCKLAND'S COLLECTION.

COLONEL MURRAY (Bath) : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether it is the case that a collection of plaster casts of fish, and models for fish culture, and a sum for eventually founding a curatorship were left by the late Frank Buckland, and accepted by the Kensington Museum for the nation; whether he is aware that the collection is in a very neglected state; that many specimens have been lying on a piece of building land for many months exposed to the weather, and are now so much damaged as to be useless; and, that those which remain are deteriorating in an old and damp shed; whether the collection is considered of sufficient general interest and value to be preserved; and, if so, whether immediate steps can be taken to place and keep it in a proper state; whether, for this purpose, the terms of the legacy admit of the collection being transferred to the Natural History Museum; and whether such transfer can be effected?

MR. ACLAND : Under the will of the late Mr. F. Buckland, his collection illustrative of fish culture was bequeathed to the South Kensington Museum, together with the reversion of a sum of money in which his widow was to have a life interest. Certain specimens were some years ago removed from the collection as being useless or unsuitable for exhibition, and some of these have, no doubt, deteriorated. I am not aware of any deterioration in those specimens which are exhibited.

The building in which they are cannot be said to be very suitable for a museum, but the collection is believed to be quite in as good a condition as when Mr. Buckland left it. A Treasury Committee, of which Sir J. Evans was Chairman, reported in 1889 that it was desirable that the collection should be removed from South Kensington. In order to transfer the trust, the sanction of the Court of Chancery, or possibly of an Act of Parliament, would be necessary. The authorities of the Natural History Museum declined to receive the collection. The Department has been in communication with the Marine Biological Association to endeavour to arrange for a transfer of the trust, but hitherto without success.

IRISH CLERKS OF THE CROWN AND PEACE.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Report of the Departmental Committee which sat in Dublin early in January last with reference to the clerical and other office allowances to be paid to the Clerks of the Crown and Peace in Ireland, in view of the additional duties which they have to discharge under the Registration of Title Act, has yet been made; and, if so, will he cause it to be laid upon the Table of the House; and has the Treasury yet fixed the amount of those allowances; if not, what is the cause of the delay?

*SIR J. HIBBERT : The remuneration of the Clerks of the Crown and Peace and their allowances for clerical and office expenses under the Act to the 31st March last have been settled, and also their remuneration for the future. I expect to receive in a few days the Report of the Committee as to the future clerical and office expenses, and the Treasury will then be ready to fix the amounts to be allowed. I do not think that any good purpose would be served by laying the Report upon the Table of the House.

GUNS FOR THE MERCANTILE MARINE.

MR. HANBURY : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what is the number of breech-loading and muzzle-loading guns respectively available for the use of the Reserve of the Mercantile Marine when undergoing annual drill; and whether, in view of the importance of this Reserve for manning the increasing fleet, and the nature of the modern ordnance on men-of-war, steps will at once be taken to largely increase the present supply of modern guns in batteries and drill ships?

MR. ROBERTSON: My answer is as follows: (1) Guns available for drill of Royal Naval Reserve—breech-loading, 92; muzzle-loading, 146. (2) Arrangements are in progress to gradually replace the older pattern guns by modern ordnance. During the past two years all Royal Naval Reserve drill ships, and certain drill batteries have been supplied with quick-firing guns of the latest pattern.

MAJOR RASCH: Are not the guns the hon. Gentleman refers to the old 68lb. Palliser M.L. guns which were practically obsolete 25 years since?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I must ask for notice of that question.

ATTENDANCE BOOKS IN PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any, and, if any, what public Departments are not subject to the Orders in Council requiring attendance books to be kept for the purpose of registering the arrival and departure of their clerks of both divisions of the Civil Service; and whether all the Departments have yet formulated their normal establishment; and, if so, whether a statement will be laid upon the Table before the Votes for the various Departments are taken showing the proposed establishment in each case?

SIR J. HIBBERT: With regard to the Legal Departments, the hon. Member is aware that they have been held to be outside the Order in Council of 15th August, 1890. I cannot, therefore, at present answer either paragraph of the question, so far as relates to matters under the jurisdiction of judicial authorities not responsible to Parliament. Subject to this qualification, I am not aware of any public Departments except, perhaps, the Houses of Lords and Commons that are exempt from the requirements of the Orders in Council. All Departments except the Legal Departments, the Houses of Lords and Commons, the Foreign Office, the Admiralty, and the Education Department, have submitted schemes for their future normal establishment; but as, owing to reductions which have been made in the Upper Division and other causes, the normal establishment cannot be reached for some time, and the increase or diminution that may in the meantime take place in the work to be done by the Departments may necessitate changes in that normal establishment as now estimated, I think it would not be desirable to lay upon the Table particulars which must, from the nature of the case, be more or less theoretical.

MR. HANBURY: Is it the intention of the Treasury not to give this information for two or three years?

SIR J. HIBBERT: Oh no! I thought the hon. Member wanted it laid on the Table for the purposes of to-night's discussion.

MR. HANBURY: And what is the objection to that?

SIR J. HIBBERT: It could not be done in time.

THE RATING OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY.

MR. FREDERICK FRYE (Kensington, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury will he explain on what grounds the immense properties owned and occupied by the Government in the parishes of Woolwich and Plumstead are not rated at more than half their real value, thus causing a high rate to be paid by the inhabitants of those parishes generally; and whether he will cause a due assessment of the Government property in those parishes to be made, and wait to see what reduction in the rate it will produce, before he calls upon other parishes, by fresh legislation, to assist the ratepayers of Woolwich and Plumstead further than is now done under the existing law?

SIR J. HIBBERT: There is no warrant for the assumption in the first paragraph. The properties in question have been carefully valued, and the assessment fixed with the Assessment Committee of the Union on three separate occasions, in 1875, 1884, and 1891, and on each occasion the Committee have by formal resolution declared the valuation to be fair and equitable. On the last occasion the following resolution was passed :—

"The Assessment Committee, after going through all the details of the value of Government property in the several parishes comprised in this Union, are of opinion that the figures proposed by the Treasury Valuer at their special meeting to-day is a fair and equitable revision of the valuation, and they accept the figures accordingly."

The second paragraph of the question does not, in view of these facts, appear to require any answer.

GRANTS IN AID TO PROVINCIAL MUSEUMS.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education if it is the intention of the Government to reduce the grant-in-aid to provincial museums from £800 to £500 for the present financial year ; and, if so, if he will state the reason for such reduction ?

MR. ACLAND : The grant-in-aid to local museums, which was made to assist them in the purchase of casts and other reproductions, has been put this year at £500 instead of £800. On the other hand, the Purchase Vote for the museum and for circulation to local museums has been increased by £3,450. The £800 grant was not fully taken up last year, and it is believed that £500 will be sufficient to meet all demands. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not think that I have any evil designs against Birmingham, for that city with one other last year absorbed six-sevenths of the grant, and in the year before two-thirds. I think there will be sufficient now for Birmingham.

MR. J. COLLINGS : Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the leading Local Authorities have made special arrangements this year to purchase specimens and original examples, a special opportunity having offered itself, and will he, by a Supplementary Estimate or by some other means, assist the Local Authorities in that respect ?

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) : I wish to know whether the Government will refuse to give any more money for the purpose to Birmingham until Northampton has had some ?

MR. LENG : I have to make a similar inquiry in the interest of Dundee.

[The questions were not answered.]

Sir J. Hibbert

THE CONVEYANCE OF AMERICAN MAILS.

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will give the day and hour of the delivery at London, Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow, and Belfast respectively, of the correspondence brought from the United States by the Campania, which sailed from New York after the Paris, and the time of the delivery of the mails at these places brought by the latter vessel ; and which of these vessels was selected by the United States Government to convey the mails to the United Kingdom ?

MR. MACARTNEY : At the same time I will ask the right hon. Gentleman when the American mails per Campania and when those per Paris were delivered in London and Provinces, and in Dublin and Provinces ; and whether he has received any intimation that the American Government would consider favourably a representation made by the Post Office as to the carriage of the mails from the United States to England ?

*MR. A. MORLEY : The times at which the delivery of the correspondence in question commenced at the places named were as follows :—London, from the Campania, May 13, 8.30 a.m. ; from the Paris, May 13, 8.15 p.m. ; Birmingham, Manchester, and Liverpool, from the Campania, May 13, 7.0 a.m. ; from the Paris, Sunday, May 14, 7.0 a.m. ; Glasgow, from the Campania, May 13, 10.15 a.m. ; from the Paris, May 15, 7.0 a.m. ; Belfast, from the Campania, May 13, 7.0 a.m. ; from the Paris, May 15, 7.0 a.m. ; Dublin, from the Campania, May 12, 7.0 p.m. ; from the Paris, May 14, 8.0 a.m. The vessel selected by the United States Post Office was the Paris. The method of choice announced by that office is comparison of results attained on eastward voyages ; and the Campania had made no such voyages. There is no ground for doubting that any reasonable representation made by the British Post Office to that of the United States would receive due consideration ; but it would not be reasonable to ask for preference to be given to a steamer concerning which the materials for the customary comparison do not yet exist.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Do these times relate to the delivery of newspapers as well as letters ?

MR. A. MORLEY : I cannot say.

GOOD CONDUCT STRIPES FOR POSTMEN.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General why the London and provincial postmen who were recommended good conduct stripes by their superior officers have not yet received them, and what is the cause of the great delay ?

MR. A. MORLEY : So far as I am aware, there are no such recommendations on hand, but if the hon. Member will furnish me with particulars I will have inquiry made.

POSTMEN'S SUMMER UNIFORM.

MR. CREMER : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the recent Order compelling postmen to work with their tunic buttoned at the top is regarded with dissatisfaction ; and whether he will give instructions that postmen who have to climb stairs and carry loads shall during the summer months be exempt from such Order ?

MR. A. MORLEY : I am not aware of any dissatisfaction caused by the Regulation referred to in the question, and I am not prepared to relax the Regulation, which is intended to prevent a practice which led to a slovenly appearance on the part of the postmen. In the summer the men wear lighter tunics.

THE CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

MR. WEIR : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will explain on what grounds the Senior Commissioner of the Civil Service Commission has received salary at the rate of £1,200 per annum after the age of 70, in contravention of the Order in Council of the 15th August, 1890 ; for what period such salary has been paid ; and on what authority the provisions of Clause 10 of the Order in Council have been departed from ?

SIR J. HIBBERT : The services of the late Senior Civil Service Commissioner were retained to meet a temporary emergency, pending the appointment of his successor. The whole matter has come before the Public Accounts Committee, and I do not think it desirable to make any further statement in anticipation of their Report.

EVENING SCHOOLS CODE.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire) : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education if he can state when the Code for Evening Schools will be issued ?

MR. ACLAND : I have laid the Code for Evening Schools on the Table to-day, and it will be circulated towards the end of next week.

INLAND REVENUE REMOVALS.

MR. TULLY (Leitrim, S.) : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is true that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have recently declined to entertain applications of removal to Ireland made by officers of Inland Revenue stationed in England ; and, if this is so, what is the rule on the subject ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) : The general rule is that officers are allowed to serve on stations for which they apply. The Board of Inland Revenue, however, reserve to themselves an absolute discretion to refuse or postpone such applications, in the interests of the Public Service.

DUBLIN MILK RATES.

MR. T. M. HEALY : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Irish Great Northern Railway has refused to refund to the Dublin milk trade the differences between the old and new rates where the old rates have been reverted to ?

MR. MUNDELLA : I have received no information to the effect referred to. If the hon. Member will furnish me with any particulars I will have them inquired into. We have asked the question of the company, but have not yet received their answer.

NATIONAL DENUNCIATION OF LAND GRABBING.

MR. SMITH-BARRY (Hunts, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to a meeting at Fethard, County Tipperary, on 7th May, reported in The Nationalist of 13th May, over which the Rev. Archdeacon Ryan, P.P., presided, and held for the purpose of denouncing a Mr. Ashmore for having taken a farm which had been surrendered by a man named Fenelly; whether he is aware that a resolution was adopted to treat Mr. Ashmore as a grabber, and the attention of the meeting called to the fact that a certain trader was supplying those on the farm with provisions; whether it has been brought to his notice that last autumn several outrages to cattle were perpetrated on a neighbouring farm which was being worked in conjunction with the farm in question; and whether he will take steps to prevent the holding of public meetings to intimidate individuals who are exercising their legal rights?

MR. J. MORLEY: My attention has been drawn to the proceedings referred to in the first and second paragraphs of the question. With regard to the third paragraph, it appears that two such outrages were reported to the police as having taken place. In one of these compensation was awarded by the Grand Jury, but in the other case the claim for compensation was rejected at Presentment Sessions. As regards the fourth paragraph, steps have been, and will continue to be, taken to prevent and to prohibit, if necessary, public meetings where there is reason to believe that they will endanger the public peace or intimidate individuals in the exercise of legal rights.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What is meant by the word "denouncing" in this case? Is it not perfectly legal for persons to maintain the advisability of non-grabbing of evicted land?

MR. J. MORLEY: I rather think that denouncing in this case meant pointing an individual out to public disapproval. If it leads to overt acts, or if the denunciation is directed to the individual in question as to intimidate him in the exercise of his legal right, then the Government will interfere.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Has the right hon. Gentleman seen the decision of a London Magistrate within the last week, whereby persons circulating in front of his door handbills calling attention to the fact that an employer had refused to allow his servants certain holidays were held to have acted legally?

Mr. Smith-Barry

MR. J. MORLEY: I did not say this was illegal.

MR. SEXTON: On what ground was one of the two claims for compensation refused?

MR. J. MORLEY: I must ask for notice of that.

THE BOWLING PUBLIC HALL.

MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland what were the special circumstances of the case, and who informed him as to the special circumstances of the case, which induced him to depart from what he has stated is "the ordinary course," and, at the last moment, to withdraw the sanction for the sale of Bowling Public Hall, against the finding of an inquiry held by the Education Department on the spot?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: The ordinary course is for a School Board to sell a building which it does not want. The special circumstances in this case were that a right of public use was attached to the premises, and, therefore, a very small sum only could have been obtained for them; while it was of the first importance that the strongest security should be taken that the community at large should have full and free use of the building. The arrangement which is being made by the School Board is the best that can be made in order to secure this object.

MR. HOZIER: From whom did the right hon. Gentleman derive his information?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: The Department informed itself of the facts partly from the School Board and partly by the inquiries of its own officers.

ADMIRALTY SURVEYS OFF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the new surveys of Burrard's Inlet and English Bay, in British Columbia, which were ordered to be made in 1890, have yet been completed and any corrections entered in the Admiralty charts?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: The survey was completed, and a new chart has been issued.

RAILWAY RATES ON LIVE STOCK.

MR. FIELD : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been again drawn to the increase in railway rates on live stock carried by the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway, and more particularly on calves and pigs, the increase on the former being nearly 100 per cent. and the increase on the latter nearly 50 per cent. (vide way bills, Pulborough to Streatham Hill), and in the case of the London and South-Western Railway Company, where the increase on sheep from Hurstbourne is nearly 100 per cent. (vide way bills dated 15th April, 1893), notwithstanding the assertions of said companies in respect to a former occasion ; and whether he will again call their attention to this subject ?

MR. MUNDELLA : As the hon. Member has been good enough to call my attention to this subject, I have communicated with the companies concerned, but have not yet received their explanation.

MERCHANDISE MARKS.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he has taken, or proposes to take, to fulfil his promise to the deputation received by him on the 6th inst., representative of many British productive industries and of over 250,000 workers, that—"He would confer with his Colleagues to see what could be done to enforce the provisions of the Merchandise Marks Act, both in the spirit and in the letter ;"

and if he has had any inquiries made, with a view to prosecution, into the examples submitted to him of stamping the foreign brand required on foreign imports (if they bear English words or trade marks) in fugitive inks, or in obscure and concealed places, in order to deceive purchasers, a result frequently proved to be the case with foreign articles bearing no mark of origin, and capable of being sold as English ?

MR. MUNDELLA : I have given instructions that in every case of alleged infringement of the Merchandise Marks Act, where the matter is brought to the attention of the Board of Trade in the manner directed by the Rules and in compliance with the Act, 1891, that the Board shall proceed to enforce the provisions of the Act if they are advised that there is a reasonable prospect of obtaining a conviction.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT : Has the right hon. Gentleman made inquiries into the cases brought before him by the deputation that waited on him on the 6th instant ?

MR. MUNDELLA : No ; I could not do that. The statements must be submitted, with evidence, to the Board of Trade.

THE LABOUR GAZETTE.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether any person, and, if so, who, has been registered at Somerset House as the proprietor of The Labour Gazette ; whether any arrangement has been made whereby the various Government Departments are to furnish to this journal information which they do not furnish to other journals ; what amount of money has been expended so far in connection with the establishment of The Labour Gazette ; and whether the expenditure will appear in any form ; and, if so, in what form upon the Estimates ?

MR. MUNDELLA : The registration of The Labour Gazette rests with the Stationery Office, and I understand from that Office that it is unnecessary to register The Gazette at Somerset House, as it does not come within the definition of a newspaper contained in 44 & 45 Vict. c. 60. The arrangements made with the various Government Departments for the supply of information are fully set out in the Memorandum of the Labour Department laid before the House. If any expense is incurred in the printing and publishing The Labour Gazette, it will appear in the Votes of the Stationery Office in the usual way ; but I do not anticipate there will be any beyond the gratuitous distribution of a certain number of copies. The Board of Trade Journal has cost nothing to the State for the last seven years, and The Labour Gazette has been so well received that I anticipate a similar result ; 20,000 copies were taken the first day, and a further 20,000 have been printed.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT : May I ask whether it is intended that advertisements shall be inserted in The Labour Gazette, thus bringing it into competition with the journals of the country ? I may remind the right hon. Gentleman that his Predecessor received a large deputation from the entire Press of the country on the subject.

MR. MUNDELLA : I am going to act precisely on the line laid down by my Predecessor.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : Who is to be responsible for any libellous matter appearing in The Gazette ? It seems to me that it already contains libellous matter.

THE SPEAKER : Order, order !

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the question ?

MR. MUNDELLA : It is not a proper question to put.

EGYPT.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the statement made by M. Develle, the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, on Tuesday last, to the effect that in 1884 and 1885 England entered into negotiations with France respecting the evacuation of Egypt, and that a Convention was signed fixing 1888 as the date of the evacuation ; whether Her Majesty's Government accept this as a correct statement of the facts ; and whether all the communications and despatches relating to the negotiations and Convention in question are included in the Papers already laid before Parliament ; and, if not, whether he can state what communications and despatches are not included therein, and will now lay them before this House ?

SIR E. GREY : An exchange of Notes between Lord Granville and M. Waddington took place in June, 1884. The Notes in full, and the conditions on which the proposals contained in them depended, will be found in Egypt, No. 23, 1884.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : Cannot the hon. Gentleman give me some indication of what the tenour of the answer was ?

SIR E. GREY : The answer to which I referred the hon. Gentleman was, that it is not the practice to publish all the communications and Despatches, but only such as give an adequate impression of what has occurred. It may be that in this case all were published, but I have had no time to ascertain.

EVICCTIONS IN ARRAN.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) : I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been called to the fact that a number of notices of removal (stated at from 70 to 100, or upwards) have been served on behalf of the Duke of Hamilton upon tenants of his in the Island of Arran ; whether he is aware that the houses and lands from which these tenants are threatened with eviction have, as a rule, been built and reclaimed without assistance from the landlord ; and whether, in view of the urgency of the situation, he will consider the propriety on behalf of the Government of taking measures to bring Arran under the operation of the Crofters' Acts ?

SIR G. TREVELYAN : The subject which my hon. Friend has brought forward is one of much gravity and importance. I have not had my attention called to it otherwise than by the newspapers ; but I have read what is alleged by the Press to be taking place in Arran. I will make inquiries on the subject, and if he will put his question again after the holidays I will give him an answer.

THE SCOTCH REGISTRATION BILL.

MR. MAXWELL (Dumfriesshire) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if his attention has been called to a copy of a letter which appeared in The Scotsman of the 11th instant, addressed to secretaries of Liberal Associations in Scotland, by the right hon. the Member for Berwickshire, in which it is stated that it is impossible that the Registration Bills now before Parliament can become law in time to affect the registration this year ; and whether, in these circumstances, the Government intend to proceed further during the present Session with the Registration of Voters (Scotland) Amendment Bill ?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: In the absence of the Prime Minister, I will repeat what the First Lord has more than once emphatically stated, i.e., that the Government intend to proceed with and to carry into law the Registration of Voters (Scotland) Bill during the present Session.

LEEK BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. BILL (Staffordshire, Leek): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has considered the Memorial of the inhabitants of the township of Leek and Lowe, which was sent to him on the 13th of February last, with reference to an increase in the number of the Guardians for that township on the Board of Guardians for the Leek Union; and whether he is disposed to comply with the prayer of the Memorial?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: The communication referred to contained certain proposals for the grouping of parishes, for the purpose of the election of Guardians, by the Local Government Board. But the Board have no power under which they could give effect to these proposals. The township of Leek and Lowe appears to have a claim to further representation; and the Board propose to issue an Order in the matter.

THE DUNSANY CO-OPERATIVE STORE COMPANY.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Dunshaughlin Board of Guardians reported to the Local Government Board that Mr. George F. Murphy, J.P. and Mr. John Wilkinson, J.P. (both of Dunsany), voted as ex-officio Guardians in favour of giving the meat contract for the Dunshaughlin Union to the Dunsany Co-operative Store Company, a concern in which they are shareholders; and, if so, whether the Local Government Board intend to prosecute Messrs. Murphy and Wilkinson for corrupt and illegal voting; whether the Local Government Board are aware that Lord Dunsany, principal of the Dunsany Co-operative Store firm, Messrs. George F. Murphy, J.P., John Wilkinson, J.P., and other shareholders in that concern, by whose votes and influence on the Dunshaughlin Board of Guardians the meat contract was secured for the Dunsany Co-operative Store Company, are in the habit of selling fat cattle to their Co-operative Store, which, trading as butchers, sell their meat to the Board of Guardians, of which they are members, and, finally, voting themselves (indirectly) payment out of the funds of the ratepayers, thus having a double financial gain for their votes; whether the Local Government Board have sanctioned such a system of contracting, and consider it advantageous to the ratepayers and the poor; and whether the Local Government Board will take any, and, if so, what action in the matter?

MR. HORACE PLUNKETT (Dublin Co., S.): I wish on this to ask the right hon. Gentleman a question of which I have given him private notice—i.e., Whether he is aware that on the occasion referred to 13 Guardians voted for and six against accepting the lowest tender—namely, that of the Dunsany Co-operative Store Company, Limited, an association for the benefit of the poor of the district, consisting of 200 shareholders, 85 of whom are labourers, and which has now been successfully established for 16 years?

MR. T. M. HEALY: I rise to Order. Is it the practice in this House, when a person closely connected with a Member of this House has his public conduct attacked, for his relative to come to his aid with a long question?

MR. SPEAKER: I saw nothing in the supplementary question calling for my interference.

MR. H. PLUNKETT (continuing his question): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that none of the Guardians who voted were shareholders except the two named who had shares value £5 and 10s. respectively, and that, therefore, their financial interest in the contract was nominal; that Mr. Wilkinson has never sold any cattle at all to the Stores, while Lord Dunsany and Mr. Murphy only sell occasionally for the accommodation of the stores at Liverpool prices, less freight and expenses, and without benefit to themselves; and whether the Local Government Board inquiry has shown that there is the slightest foundation for all the suggestions of jobbery on the part of the men named in the question of the hon. Member for East Clare?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am unable to certify as to the accuracy of the facts quoted by the hon. Gentleman. They may be substantially true, but I have had no time to test them. On the 20th April I stated, in reply to a question addressed to me on this subject by the hon. Member, that the Local Government Board had drawn the attention of the Guardians to the statutory penalties to which members concerned in Union contracts are liable. I now learn that on the 2nd instant the Board of Guardians, at a special meeting convened to consider the matter, unanimously passed a resolution to the effect that two of the Guardians, who are interested as shareholders in the concern to the extent of—in one case of £5 and in the other of 10s.—had voted in favour of the acceptance of the tender of the Co-operative Stores, and that in doing so they acted solely in the interest of the poor and of the ratepayers. With the view of eliciting all the facts, the Local Government Board have instructed one of their Inspectors to make inquiry into the matter; and, upon the receipt of his Report, the Board will decide whether the case is one in which they should proceed for the recovery of the statutory penalties.

MR. W. REDMOND: I will put another question after the Recess.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

THE STATE OF CLARE, KERRY, AND LIMERICK.

MR. MACARTNEY: I beg to give notice that on the Vote on Account the hon. Member for South Tyrone will call attention to the lawless condition of the Counties of Clare, Kerry, and Limerick, and move to reduce the Vote by an amount equivalent to the salary of the Chief Secretary.

THE VOTE ON ACCOUNT.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): When will the Vote on Account be issued? Will it be in time to enable us to put down notices before the Recess?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I will lay it on the Table to-night.

Mr. H. Plunkett

THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.): Will the Motion for the Adjournment over the Whitsuntide Recess be taken as the first Order to-morrow?

SIR W. HARCOURT: The Motion, which will be that the House, at the conclusion of the Morning Sitting, shall adjourn till Monday, the 29th of May, will not be the first Order, but it will be taken at a time that will give hon. Members an opportunity of making any observations they desire upon it.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

TREASURY CHEST FUND BILL. (No. 321.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 1st May.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

MR. HANBURY asked what was the exact purport of the Bill? As yet he had not been able to get a satisfactory answer, and he should like to know if he was correct in assuming it was another means of attempting to reduce the deficit? So far as he understood, what had happened in past years was this: the Treasury Chest was kept at a certain amount, but this year—for the first time for many years—they were told that it was not necessary to keep that amount in hand for foreign payments, because, in consequence of the facilities of communication with the different parts of the world through the post and telegraph, payments could thus be more easily made. But there was no distinction in that respect between this year and the last few years, and any Chancellor of the Exchequer hard up for money might have done the same thing that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was doing now. What he wanted was an answer to two plain questions. First, whether, as a matter of fact, the right hon. Gentleman was not borrowing this money in order to reduce the deficit; and, in the next place, whether the right hon. Gentleman could tell him what special circumstances there were in connection with this Bill which enabled him, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, to reduce the balance by means of this chest, that were not equally applicable to any of his Predecessors? It might be a very proper thing to do, but if the Chancellor of the Exchequer was really borrowing—about which he thought there could be no doubt—then he should boldly say so. He would ask whether this was not, in fact, a new form of loan to a limited extent? If the right hon. Gentleman said it was, then the matter would be ended; but what he wanted was to prevent the Chancellor of the Exchequer sailing under false colours. The right hon. Gentleman had condemned similar action on the part of some of his Predecessors, and if they found that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was borrowing in this way, then it was only right that he should apply the same condemnation to himself which he had so readily extended to those who preceded him in Office. To put himself in Order he would therefore move the rejection of the clause.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Clause 1.—(Mr. Hanbury.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I put this down as the first Order of the Day in order that hon. Members might have full information upon it. The transaction contemplated by the Bill is one that has been done several times. This Treasury Chest is, in point of fact, the working balance for making payments abroad. From time to time it is found this working balance is more than necessary for that purpose. In 1861 the present Prime Minister, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, reduced the balance. In 1873 the same thing was done by Mr. Lowe, and exactly the same amount of money, £300,000, was taken. At that time the balance was £1,300,000, and Mr. Lowe applied the £300,000 to the financial arrangements of that year, and the Bill went through without any observation, it being treated as a mere Treasury matter. If the hon. Gentleman wants to know why it is done this year, I have not the slightest hesitation in telling him; it is because we want money. I have made no secret of that. Money is wanted; this is available for the purposes required; and if hon. Members consider that borrowing, I have no objection to their thinking so.

*MR. COHEN (Islington, E.) said, that whatever might have been thought before the explanation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer there could not now be any one in the House who could imagine for one moment that the transaction was one of borrowing, because he apprehended that borrowing contemplated repayment. This was an appropriation out of capital for the purpose of meeting a deficit; it was an experiment the Chancellor of the Exchequer would scarcely call borrowing. The right hon. Gentleman was appropriating £300,000 which belonged to capital in order to meet expenditure which he (Mr. Cohen) should consider ought to be defrayed from Revenue. The money ought to be applied in the same way as the surpluses were taken for the reduction of Debt. He thought his hon. Friend (Mr. Hanbury) would no longer consider it borrowing. It seemed to him that when his hon. Friend made the observation that he was under a misapprehension, and it was now absolutely clear that it was not borrowing, but was, he might almost say, confiscation. But whatever the expression ought to be, it was appropriating towards annual expenditure capital sources, and therefore he wondered that such a financial purist as the right hon. Gentleman should resort to an expedient that was scarcely so justifiable as the system of borrowing for capital expenditure.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) thought this raised a somewhat serious question, inasmuch, as he understood it, all surpluses of this sort were obliged to be applied to the reduction of Debt. The money had arisen out of taxation in former years, and being no longer necessary for the purpose for which it was voted, it ought to go in the reduction of Debt. Therefore, he apprehended, this Bill was really and truly to do away with that provision and to give the Chancellor of the Exchequer the accommodation of £300,000 this year to make up deficiencies. That was following the bad precedent of the present Prime Minister in 1861, and he hoped the Committee would be strong on this point and insist that the £300,000 should not be diverted to a wrong purpose, but should go in the reduction of Debt as it ought to do.

SIR W. HARCOURT: That would make it necessary to put on another tax. The question of what is capital and what is not, no doubt, we might discuss at great length. If you have a great windfall on an estate you might treat the timber that fell as capital, but if you were hard up that year you would use it as revenue. The Committee knows very well what has been done in these cases in former times, and I hope they will allow us to have this Bill.

*SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University) said, the right hon. Gentleman called this a windfall, but he submitted it was no windfall at all. Let them understand what they were about to do. The Treasury Chest, as he understood it, were certain sums kept abroad to meet expenditure, and the right hon. Gentleman now brought in a Bill to diminish the sum kept in the Treasury Chest; therefore it was not a windfall in any sense of the word. If the Treasury found it was not necessary to keep so large a sum, it was quite right to bring the money home; but having done so, it ought to go in reduction of Debt, and they must clearly understand they were not making both ends meet to that extent, because taking the money out of one pocket and putting it into another could not be called a windfall. The right hon. Gentleman was quite right in bringing the money home, but it ought to go in the reduction of Debt, and not to the Revenue of the year. It was really part of the property of the nation being transferred from one place to another, and to treat it as income was ridiculous, and if his hon. Friend went to a Division he should feel bound to go with him. If they were to understand that merely because £300,000 had been transferred from the Treasury Chest to the Exchequer they were to spend it, he thought that was a matter they ought to protest against.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): I think my hon. Friend behind me and the right hon. Baronet opposite are really financial purists. Of course, it is very easy to lay down the very honourable, strict, and creditable maxim that never must you apply money to one purpose that was intended for another, and for the guidance of the Treasury to pass a cast-iron rule; but when you consider what the action of the Treasury has been during many years in the management of English finances, and how the House of Commons has never been able to detect the Treasury in any fault, you must be careful to give a certain elasticity to the licence and liberty you allow the Treasury in dealing with the financial incidence of the time and the requirements which one year with another may bring. The Treasury is advanced a sum for the purposes of the year. A balance of £300,000 is lying on a deposit, as it were, called the Treasury Chest; it is not wanted for the purposes of the Treasury Chest, but is wanted for the purposes of the year, and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not adopted this course what would have been the result? The services of the year would not be fully provided for, and the Government would have to run the risk, at the end of the year, if they did not avail themselves of this, of increasing the Floating Debt by the amount that is required, and I want to know, in these days, whether those gentlemen who object to getting money from the Government at a rate of not more than 2 or 2½ per cent. will run the risk of this year paying the interest they might have to pay if they increase the amount of the Treasury Debt? It is obvious to anyone that the Government have made a convenient arrangement for the country. If, following the purist rule of the right hon. Baronet, they had not provided for the deficit they would have been attacked in the House of Commons, and if they had put on a tax they would have again been attacked in the House of Commons. They have followed the precedent that has been set by Chancellors of the Exchequer like the First Lord of the Treasury and like the late Mr. Lowe, and they certainly procure money on more advantageous and convenient terms than if they followed any other course. That is financial common sense, and I shall certainly support the Government.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) had not intended to take part in the Debate, but it was really important to protest against the language and the attitude assumed by the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord R. Churchill). He had said before in this House that he knew of no more striking illustration of the immense power of the Treasury than the way in which it had captured the noble Lord and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, both of whom had gone there as enemies of that institution and had become the most docile disciples. The noble Lord had said that a certain balance (£300,000) had been appropriated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in order to meet the exigencies of the year. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had treated as Revenue that which was, in fact, part of capital. That was open to objection, and that was the part of the financial purists. In his opinion that ought not to pass without notice, and the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) very properly called attention to what was being done. The noble Lord had said that "you must trust the Treasury; they behave extremely well." He protested against that line of argument, because they were not dealing with the permanent officials of the Treasury, but with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It might very well be that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had overridden the scruples of the Treasury, but the right hon. Gentleman knew perfectly well that a very eminent Predecessor of his was once very sharply blamed for conduct like what he now practised. In the famous Budget of Mr. Disraeli in 1852, when he was in great straits to balance his accounts, as other Chancellors of the Exchequer had been, he made a proposal in respect to the Exchequer Loans, which was discussed for two nights, and which was opposed by the present Prime Minister and defeated. What the right hon. Gentleman was now doing was of precisely the same character, and it was quite right that it should be condemned. In this case borrowing was not the only alternative, for the Expenditure might have been cut down or the Revenue raised, and it was not a question of the difference in the interest, as the noble Lord had put forward, but it was a matter of real principle.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I only rise to protest against the statement of my right hon. Friend that I was the enemy of the Treasury, because I never was the enemy of the Treasury. It is true that during the reign of a particular Secretary to the Treasury, the administration of the Treasury became so unpopular in most of the Departments that there was a feeling against that Body, but that does not exist now. I am, however, obliged to my right hon. Friend for his speech, because he has supported my case, and has, to use a vulgar expression, "given himself away." The right hon. Gentleman says that the balance should have been reduced, and what he proposes is that, instead of reducing the balance upon which it was not necessary to draw, we should reduce balances every penny of which is wanted. That is the real argument of the late Secretary of the Treasury, and I have never heard a more remarkable argument from an ex-Secretary. The right hon. Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) is desirous of reducing the Debt. I have now a margin of £175,000, and I hope it may be realised; if so, that sum will go to the reduction of the Debt, because it would be a real surplus, and the £300,000 would find its way into the Treasury. Under these circumstances, I hope the hon. Member will not press his opposition.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, the prospect of this sum going in the reduction of Debt, if certain things happened, was satisfactory to the Committee. The question now was, however, not that the balance should be reduced—they were prepared to agree to that—but what was to be done with the £300,000, and no doubt it did turn to some extent on the character of the sum the right hon. Gentleman had captured as a windfall. He did not think that was an appropriate description. A windfall was timber or apples blown down by the wind, but in this instance they had got the right hon. Gentleman in the orchard up the tree after the apples himself. The right hon. Gentleman admitted it; he wanted money, and therefore had gone out to get it. He was a pirate. The animus furandi was ascertained. What they complained of was the allocation of it not to the diminution of Debt, not to the purpose which the wisdom of Parliament had pointed out as a proper destination of any sums of this kind, but to the payment of the inordinate expenses of this year. They said that according to all the sound principles of finance the expenses of the year should be met out of the Revenue of the year, and that the right hon. Gentleman had no right to put his hand in the public till, to go up the public apple-tree, and take the public apple which properly belonged to capital and not to Revenue. That was what they objected to.

*MR. FREEMAN MITFORD (Warwick, Stratford) said, the right hon. Gentleman stated that the right hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney) had given himself away; but there were two ways of reducing the balance, one by investment and the other by spending it, and in the present case it appeared to him they were spending it. The Treasury Chest was a matter they had been taught to look on as a sacred thing not to be lightly touched, and if the hon. Gentleman went to a Division he should vote with him.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) thought that if there was any doubt about the nature of the transaction before, the illustration the right hon. Gentleman had favoured them with as an excuse was enough to convince them. The right hon. Gentleman said that if his calculations were borne out there would be a surplus which would go to the reduction of Debt; but if they should not be borne out there would be a deficiency, and the capital sum would have been diminished by that amount.

Question put, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided :—Ayes 230; Noes 116.—(Division List, No. 95.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 2 stand part of the Bill."

MR. BARTLEY said, it would be better to cite the Bill as the Treasury Chest Revenue Relief Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again," put, and negatived.

Bill reported without Amendment.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I move that the Bill be read a third time. I hope the House will agree to this.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Sir W. Harcourt.)

MR. HANBURY said, he was opposed to the Third Reading being taken then. Hon. Members knew very little about the Bill.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Then, Sir, I put it down for to-morrow.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

SUPPLY.—CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS, 1893-4.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS I.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £48,719, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1894, for Expenditure in respect of Miscellaneous Legal Buildings—namely, County Courts, Metropolitan Police Courts, and Sheriff Court Houses, Scotland."

*SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) said, when the Committee last met, the subject of the Vote for London Police Courts was discussed, and several hon. Members expressed the opinion that they ought to be paid for out of the London rates. In London, however, they maintained that, so far from being unduly favoured in comparison with other districts, they had, on the contrary, great reason to complain. He did not allude to the scanty representation accorded to the Metropolis, but to the financial treatment they experienced. A considerable part of the police expenditure was for Imperial purposes. The London police was in the hands of the Home Office, and cost no less than £1,600,000, or 5d. in the £1, while in other boroughs it was only 4d. A difference of 1d. in the £1 amounted to £130,000 a year. Again, the Hackney Carriage Licences, amounting to £38,000 a year, in other boroughs went to the borough rate. Again, in the City of London the whole of the police expenses were paid out of rates, and the Imperial Government contributed nothing. These items together placed London at a disadvantage of over £200,000 a year as compared with other boroughs. But that was not all. The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. H. H. Fowler) in his recent Report pointed out that, whereas the contribution from the Imperial Government towards local expenses amounted in other county boroughs to 10d., in counties to 9·6d., in London it was only 8·6d. Here, again, the difference amounted to over £100,000 a year. In fact, so far from being unduly favoured, London was unfairly treated to the extent of something like £400,000 a year, and they would certainly resist any additional burdens being thrown on them. He would not, of course, go into the whole question just then; but he felt sure that when the Committee had the whole facts before them they would see that they in London suffered under a very great disadvantage in this matter.

*MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea) said, the hon. Member for North Islington (Mr. Bartley) was rather precipitate in his method of dealing with this matter on a former occasion. There was much to be said in favour of London paying for its Police Courts. But if this change was made, they would have to go into an inquiry as to whether the Metropolis was not called upon in other matters to bear far more than its share of the public expenditure. In the provincial towns the fees and fines obtained in the Police Courts went to the Municipal Authority maintaining them, and in that way relief was given to such authority. In London at present the fees went to the State. The fees and fines received in the Metropolitan Courts, amounting in 1891 to £26,889, were paid into the Imperial Exchequer. If the proposed change was made it was obvious that this large sum should go to the local funds, to be applied towards defraying the cost of the Courts. He anticipated that the whole question of the relation between the finances of the County of London and those of the Exchequer would have to be gone into at some future time, and he hoped when that time came justice would be done to London.

*MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the London University had put the case of London with such admirable point and justice that it was not necessary to add a word to what he had said to the Committee. He (Mr. Stuart) wished to express his sympathy with the observations of the right hon. Gentleman. He would not have intervened in the Debate but for the remark of the hon. Member for Chelsea, that this was a small matter as compared with others that had been mentioned. It was important that a relief should be given to London rates, in comparison with burdens in the other large centres of the country. He would refer the hon. Member to the Report which had lately been issued by the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. H. H. Fowler). The hon. Member might have in recollection that the inequality that now existed was mainly due to the late Government, and was supported by the hon. Member's friends, whilst he (Mr. Stuart) and his hon. Friends representing London did all they could to relieve the London burdens, in comparison with other burdens as already mentioned. The Bill of 1888 established a difference between the aid given to London and County rates of $1\frac{3}{4}$ d. in the £1. The rates of London had been relieved of $4\frac{1}{4}$ d., and the rates of other County Boroughs 6d. in the £1, whereas the country districts were relieved of rather more than $5\frac{3}{4}$ d. It was that Bill which had introduced the great inequality between the relief given to London from the central fund and that given to the rates of the country. He and his friends had endeavoured to rectify this state of things, but were strenuously opposed at that time by hon. Gentlemen opposite, who were now endeavouring to obtain a little cheap popularity. He seconded all that had been said by the Member for London University, and hoped that, before long, relief would be given to London burdens, as compared with the burdens of other parts of the country. In bringing about that result they would be glad to see all exceptional circumstances taken into account.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): I will not say anything about the allocation of Imperial Funds to local purposes at present; but as to the Metropolitan Police Courts it is said you ought not to throw on London the cost of maintaining them, unless you also give to London the fines and fees levied in them. The hon. Member said that the fines and fees are taken by the Local Authorities in the Municipal Boroughs. But I would point out that the Municipal Boroughs pay for their own Magistrates and Magistrates' Clerks, whereas the salaries of the London Police Magistrates and their Clerks are paid out of the Imperial Exchequer. There are 23 Magistrates in London, and as the salary of each is £1,500 a year, it will be seen that the fines and fees would not cover that expenditure as well as make provision for the staff at each Court. When it is said that London has not the advantage of drawing fines and fees, I would point out that London has the great advantage of drawing on the taxpayers of the United Kingdom for amounts which ought to be paid out of the Local Funds. I admit that the whole case of London finance is a difficult question, and I should be the last to maintain that London has obtained justice under the present arrangement.

*MR. WHITMORE said, his argument was that if London in future had to pay out of its own resources for the maintenance of the Police Courts and Magistrates, the fees and fines obtained in them should go to the London local exchequer.

MR. BARTLEY said, the hon. Member opposite (Mr. J. Stuart) had referred to some of them as trying to get popularity out of their opposition to the Vote. He would remind the hon. Member that he (Mr. Bartley) had always advocated London paying for its own Courts. He had always supported the hon. Member for Northampton in these Motions. No doubt this was part of a larger question, and when the whole subject came to be dealt with, no doubt it would be more complicated than it was at this particular time. But he thought that they ought to show that they were bonâ fide in their desire that the cost of maintaining the Police Courts should be borne by the localities. He was opposed to Imperial taxation assisting, as it was called, local taxation. The two ought to be kept as separate as possible. This might not be a very popular view to take of the matter, but it was a strictly financial one. These Police Courts were special to London, and were not at all of an Imperial nature. The hon. Member for Northampton had intended to reduce this Vote of £7,516 by £7,000. He had spoken very boldly, and had then run away without moving a reduction. He (Mr. Bartley), therefore, would move to reduce the Vote by £50, as an intimation that this particular item should be put upon the Local Authority.

Mr. H. H. Fowler

Motion made, and Question proposed: "That Item G, New Works and Metropolitan Police Court Buildings, be reduced by £50."—(Mr. Bartley.)

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I rise to say a few words which may induce the hon. Gentleman not to press his Motion to a Division. The hon. Member for Northampton did propose a reduction in the Vote, but withdrew his Motion on the intimation that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be prepared to deal with the question before another year came round. I will state what has taken place since we discussed this matter a few weeks ago. Since that discussion the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given instructions for a letter to be written to the County Council, and I have already undertaken the duty of writing it, setting forth the opinion of the Treasury with respect to taking this item of expenditure off the Imperial Funds and placing it on the funds of the County Council. That letter will, I hope, satisfy the hon. Member who has moved the reduction, and will give the London County Council a chance of considering the whole question. I do not think that this is the time to go into the question of Imperial finance and County Council finance, as against county finance. I have always been of opinion that this expenditure ought, in fairness to other parts of the United Kingdom, to be placed on the Metropolis; and I trust that, looking at the intentions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, we shall be able, before another year comes round, to arrive at some agreement with the County Council with respect to this matter. I rise to say this in the hope that it will induce the hon. Member not to press this Motion to a Division.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) said, he was pleased to hear the remarks of the Secretary to the Treasury to the effect that there would be some attempt made to alter the present arrangement, and to get purely local charges put on the Local Bodies, so that equal justice would be done all round, which ought to have been done in 1888, when the allocation took place under the Local Government Act. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had not informed them of one thing. If they were going to re-adjust the question of the Police Courts, they must re-adjust the whole question of the civil administration of justice, and they must deal with the question of the control of the police. This was a question as to whether certain charges now borne by the Imperial Funds should be borne by the Local Authorities, and it was not a question of a reduction of £50 or £7,000; because, if hon. Gentlemen would glance at the full amount of the Vote, they would see that something like £50,000 was involved. This would have to be dealt with as a whole. He took it that the hon. Member for North Islington, in moving the reduction of the Vote, wished, as one of his Colleagues had put it, to appear very heroic. There were always hon. Gentlemen in the House prepared to give London something when it cost nothing; but when it came to going into the Division Lobby on the question of giving extended powers to London they always found those hon. Gentlemen voting against such extension. He should vote against this reduction, because he believed they could not deal with this question by a simple reduction. The moment they had an opportunity given them of dealing with the whole question of local charges they would be prepared to go into it. They would not assent to London being deprived of anything it now received until they had a thorough re-adjustment and London was treated in the same way as the rest of the country.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he did not think it necessary to go into the whole question of the amount London should receive from the general funds. The question now was simply with regard to the Police Courts—whether the Provinces ought to pay for them, or whether the cost should be thrown entirely upon London? The hon. Member opposite had said he (Mr. Labouchere) had moved an Amendment and was now going to run away. He had moved his Amendment time after time, even when the Party opposite were in power, but had never succeeded in getting a majority in favour of it. All that he cared for was that the thing should be done, and the question was what was the best way to obtain that end? It certainly seemed to him that when a responsible Minister said that he agreed with the principle, and would attempt to carry it out next year, that it would be a mistake to go to a Division.

At the present time the London County Council could not raise money for the Police Courts even if they wished. It would be ultra vires. If he had carried his Motion to reduce the Vote by the sum of £7,000, it would have been necessary to put the sum back on Report because it was evident that London could not go without its Police Courts, and in a lesser degree the same argument would apply to the proposed reduction of £50. But were they sure that they would carry a reduction if they went to a Division, and what would be the result if they did not? Why, it was understood that if hon. Members did not accept the pledges of the Government and went to a Division and were beaten the Government were freed from those pledges. For his own part, he desired to hold the Government to their pledges. If no action was taken in the matter by the Government next year they would go to a Division, and if they did he believed they would carry a reduction. The answer of the Government to-day, however, had been so ample and practical that he believed if hon. Members took a Division they would be beaten, and do more harm than good in the cause they were espousing.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS did not think the answer of the Government was a practical one. They did not deal with the particular item which was the subject of attack, but said they had written to the London County Council raising the general question of the charge for the Police Courts, and a large number of other questions involving great complications. What they wanted to do was to get rid of the gross injustice which was very deeply felt in the London constituencies of the London Police Courts receiving assistance from the Imperial Funds while the local Police Courts had to be supported locally. It seemed to him that the Motion of the hon. Member opposite was a direct attack upon that state of things; therefore, he hoped he would press it to a Division, notwithstanding the consequences the hon. Member for Northampton threatened them with.

MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.): I did not understand the Secretary to the Treasury to state the case as the hon. Gentleman has just put it. I understood him to say that, although there was a very large question, he had communicated with the London County Council with reference to a particular item—the Police Courts—or that he was about to.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : Was about to communicate.

MR. JACKSON : Presumably the communication will be made before very long. I understood the Secretary to the Treasury to go further than that, and to say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was prepared to deal with the matter before the next Estimates are proposed. I take it, therefore, as far as the Police Courts are concerned, that this is the last time the item will appear on the Estimates.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : No, no!

MR. JACKSON : I think the right hon. Gentleman will find that he said that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had promised to deal with it before the next Estimates. It seems, then, from what we have heard from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board and from the Secretary to the Treasury that the Government are of opinion that this change should be made. I think we may be reasonably satisfied with the pledge we have received. I do not know whether this promise is confined to the buildings, or whether it extends to the more important question of who is to bear the expense of the salaries of the Police Magistrates. I should have been glad if the Secretary to the Treasury had told us something on that point. It would be tinkering only to deal with the buildings and not to touch the larger question. Whether London receives its fair share is a much larger question. My impression is that the late President of the Local Government Board was of opinion that London does not get its fair share. If the point is to be raised we should have a full opportunity of examining the whole question. I should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would inform us whether his communication to the London County Council proposes that they should consider only the question of buildings, or whether they should deal also with the question of how the charge for Police Magistrates is to be borne in future?

Mr. Jackson

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I am anxious to confine the discussion as far as possible to the Vote, and I wish to avoid stating anything as to the larger question of the taxation of the Metropolis and as to the Police Magistrates and the police. At present the intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is to deal with the question of buildings. I cannot say whether the whole question of the Magistrates will be entered upon; but the London County Council will have an opportunity of dealing with the whole question.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK said, he could understand the desire of the Secretary to the Treasury to confine this controversy to the question of the Police Courts; but he thought that if the House of Commons were going to deal with the matter at all they should deal with it as a whole. If they were going to place the whole burden of this item on the London County Council, no one would deny that it would be difficult to withhold from them the control of the police.

THE CHAIRMAN : I must remind the right hon. Baronet that this Vote is for Police Court Buildings.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : We propose now to write a letter to the London County Council to give that Body an opportunity of stating their views.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS wished to know what was the use of making any representation to the London County Council on this particular head, inasmuch as the County Council had no legal means of taking this charge on themselves? The Provincial Corporations had power to levy a rate for Police Courts, but the London County Council had no such power.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK said, his contention was that as the Metropolitan Police cost no less than £1,600,000, or 3d. in the £1 on the rateable value—which was £130,000 more than ought to be paid—and considering that the Metropolitan Police discharged a great many Imperial duties, if the question was raised at all it should be raised as a whole.

MR. HANBURY said, he did not see the close connection between the police and the Magistrates' Courts. There was a much closer connection between the Police Courts and the payment of the Magistrates. They formed a part of the same question, and he had been astonished to hear the Secretary to the Treasury adduce as a reason for passing the item that he was about to bring a part of the question before the London County Council. If the London County Council paid for anything at all it would have to pay for the Courts and the Magistrates too, as was done in the Provinces. Members who represented large Provincial towns could not understand why London should be placed in a different position to other towns in regard to the police and Magistrates. What was the exceptional character of the Police Courts of London? Extradition cases were heard at Bow Street no doubt, and an exception should be made in the case of that Court; but in the case of the other Courts it was ridiculous to say that they were in any sense international, or that they ought to be treated in a different manner to Provincial Police Courts. Clerkenwell, Greenwich, Lambeth, Southwark, Woolwich—all these Courts were essentially local Courts. It was in that sense that opposition was being offered to the Vote by hon. Members who represented the Provinces. He did not think the promise to refer the question to those who had no legal powers in the matter would be of any use to them.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I would point out that it will be impossible to introduce a Bill until we have arrived at some kind of agreement with the London County Council.

MR. HANBURY said, he and his hon. Friends said they should object to a Bill which dealt with one part of the question only. The Government would deal with the Magistrates as well as the Courts, and yet on that the most important part of the question they were not going to consult the London County Council.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I say we have not yet decided whether the question of the Magistrates shall be included with the buildings.

MR. HANBURY thought that if they did not get a promise that all these questions would be considered together a Division should be taken. He observed that most of the Police Courts were rented, yet he saw charges for repairs and alterations—in the case of the Thames Street Court, £315; and in that of the Southwark Court, £401. What did these charges mean?

SIR J. HIBBERT: The buildings are held under long leases.

MR. HANBURY said, that even then it seemed that they were spending large sums of money on these Courts. Before he assented to the money being voted he should require to know the length of the leases.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central) said, that most of the buildings were originally taken on 99 years' leases. Large sums of money had been spent in warming and ventilating.

MR. LABOUCHERE thought it would be a great advantage if Magistrates and Courts could be brought into the same Vote; but they could not do that. This Vote affected buildings—the salaries were on the Consolidated Fund. If the Motion to reduce the Vote were carried it would only affect the buildings, and would in no way prejudice the question of the salaries of the Police Magistrates. The only way they could raise that question would be on the question of the salaries of the Police Commissioners, or of the salary of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He agreed that all these charges ought to be thrown on the Metropolis; but they would not advance the matter further even if they carried the reduction of £50. Indeed, they would prejudice these cases if the Division went against them. It was, therefore, very much as the Prime Minister said the other day, "Heads I win, tails you lose." If anyone could show that, by dividing against this Vote, the Committee would in any sense put the Government under an obligation of taking the salaries of the Police Magistrates off the Consolidated Fund, he should certainly divide against it. That, however, would be impossible, because that was not the question raised by the proposed reduction. The proper course to adopt was to move a reduction of the salary of some Minister who was responsible for the present state of things. If such a reduction could be carried, the Committee might be absolutely certain that the reform which so many Members desired would be carried out in the following year.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, he had voted on two or three occasions against this charge being put upon the Consolidated Fund, and he should have done so this year but for the undertaking given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he would endeavour to meet the views of hon. Members before the next Budget. He had always objected to London being put in a different position from other large towns. To his mind it was somewhat disgraceful to London that the Metropolis was not allowed to manage its Police Courts and its Police Force in the same way as other towns. Next year, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not carry out his undertaking, he (Mr. Morton) should certainly join in attacking the Vote.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) said, he was sorry that the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) was not going to vote for the reduction; but he could not help admiring the hon. Member's flexibility and adaptability. The hon. Member seemed to change his opinions as he changed from one side of the House to the other. As the Representative of an agricultural constituency, he (Major Rasch) thought he should not be doing his duty to his constituents if he did not support the Vote. He could not conceive anything more unfair than to pay out of the taxes for the maintenance of the London Police Courts, when people in the country had to pay for their police out of their miserable local rates. With wheat at 25s. a quarter, it was rather hard that the Government should exempt any localities from the payment of taxation which they clearly ought to pay, and should refuse absolutely to give any assistance in the direction of reform, beyond writing a letter to the County Council, which the Council would probably not answer.

*MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD said, the present state of things was altogether indefensible, although it was evident that any alteration must be of an extremely complicated character. At the present moment there was nobody to whom these buildings could be handed over if the Government gave up the control of them, because there existed no Body with any funds which would enable them to look after them properly. He thought Bow Street stood in altogether an exceptional position, as it was, perhaps, the one Police Court in this Metropolis which had a distinctly Imperial character. Something had been said about the necessity, if the Police Courts were handed over to the Representatives of London, of handing the Police over also. That was an absolute and entire non sequitur. There was no reason why the Metropolitan Police should not remain under Government control, whilst all the Police Courts except Bow Street were handed over to the London County Council.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. A. C. MORTON wished to know why the Commissioners of Works had not bought the freehold of the South Western Police Court site instead of putting up an expensive building on a leasehold site? It was well known that after erecting a building the land on which it was built could not be obtained as cheaply as before the building was put up.

MR. SHAW - LEFEVRE said, the transaction referred to by the hon. Member occurred before he himself went into Office, and all he could say was that the Government were anxious in every case to obtain the land on which their buildings were erected.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.) said, he observed that the cost of new works for the Sheriffs' Courts of Scotland was divided equally between the Local Authorities and the Crown. He was informed that this arrangement was due to the fact that the Sheriffs' Courts had criminal as well as civil jurisdiction. But he would like to ask on what principle the cost was divided equally between the Local Authorities and the Crown?

MR. SHAW - LEFEVRE said, the amount was arrived at some years ago on a rough estimate that one-half the business of those Courts was of a criminal and the other half of a civil character.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS said, he wished to get at the principle on which the payment was made. Suppose in the case of Airdrie the criminal side of the Court needed greater accommodation, and it was necessary to expend £1,000 on that increased accommodation, would the Treasury take no cognisance of that fact, but still pay half the cost? If so, it was perfectly clear that the Crown was contributing to Scotland considerable sums annually for the purpose of local criminal business, although it was making no such contribution to England.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, that in the hypothetical case stated by his hon. Friend it would only be reasonable to take into account the fact that the increased cost was due to the need of further accommodation on the criminal side.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £22,951, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1894, for Expenditure in respect of Art and Science Buildings, Great Britain."

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) asked what the sum of £2,850 for new works, alterations, and additions meant?

MR. HANBURY wished to ask a question as to the item for additions to the Assyrian collections in the British Museum. He was personally glad that such additions were being made, and should like to know of what they consisted. From his own experience he could say that there were places in Assyria where one could see lying on the ground for almost the first comer to pick up very valuable winged bulls, and other monuments of antiquity, covered with inscriptions. These would be very valuable additions to the British Museum, and he wished to know whether the Museum authorities were obtaining any of them?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, that what the hon. Member desired had, he thought, practically been carried out. A large number of Assyrian sculptures were being put into place, and it had been found necessary to remodel the room for the purpose.

MR. HANBURY said, that was not his point. What he had said was that, for historical purposes, it would be well if the Government saw whether it was possible to bring to this country a number of the Assyrian sculptures at Nineveh, which could be had almost for nothing, and which he had been assured by those conversant with the matter were of great value.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): On a point of Order, Mr. Mellor. Is not the hon. Gentleman out of Order in bringing this question up on a Vote for Buildings?

THE CHAIRMAN: Strictly speaking, that is so; but the hon. Member is merely asking a question.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: I have explained that the Trustees of the British Museum have already a greater accumulation of those Assyrian sculptures than they can find room for.

*MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD asked whether the item of £250 for Sanitary Works at the British Museum would complete the works, or was it likely that additional expenditure in that direction would appear on future Estimates?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: It is to be hoped that the expenditure of this sum will put the drainage into a proper condition; but I may say that the drains are old, and are not up to modern requirements.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN (Lambeth, Brixton) drew attention to the inadequate lighting of the British Museum. He owned that the question was not a novel one. It was brought up year after year. And year after year, Ministers made promises that something would be done to effect an improvement; but nothing was ever done. Considering the efforts that were being made to educate the working classes through the agency of the Free Libraries and similar institutions, it seemed a pity that such a great educational institution as the British Museum could not be lighted at night when the working classes had time to visit it. The stock argument against the lighting of the Museum was the danger from fire; but that danger was now obviated by the great perfection to which electric lighting had been brought. He hoped, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give an assurance—not that the work would be carried out this year, for the expense would be too great for one year—but that the matter would not be practically shelved.

MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby) said, he understood that a considerable sum had been spent in improving the lighting of the Museum; and he would like to know whether any appreciable increase in visitors had followed?

Some time ago he used to go in the evening to South Kensington, and from his experience there——

THE CHAIRMAN : I do not think that matter is properly raised on this Vote, which is for buildings.

MR. A. C. MORTON asked whether the First Commissioner of Works intended to get the Assyrian bulls referred to by the hon. Member for Preston. He did not know much about Assyrian bulls, or whether there was any connection between them and three acres and a cow——

MR. BUCHANAN : Mr. Mellor, is the hon. Gentleman in Order on this Vote?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : I wish to ask you, Mr. Mellor, whether an Assyrian bull is not a building?

THE CHAIRMAN : The hon. Member for Peterborough is clearly out of Order.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, he saw an item of £2,000 for the new Assyrian rooms at the British Museum. He wanted to know whether it was intended to provide a room for the Assyrian bulls?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE : There is a large amount of Assyrian sculpture to be provided for, and the Vote is intended to procure the necessary accommodation for sculpture that cannot now be shown.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick) drew attention to the inadequate accommodation for readers in the Reading Room of the Museum. He had been there several times, and had found the place so full that it was extremely difficult to get a seat. He thought it was a great deal more important, from the point of view of the convenience of the British public, to provide room for readers than room for Assyrian bulls at the Museum. It would be a great public advantage if an additional Reading Room were provided for the benefit of the old gentlemen who went to the Reading Room for the purpose of spending a placid if not an instructive day there.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE : There is no provision this year for increasing the accommodation in the Reading Room. I quite agree with the hon. Gentleman that the pressure on the accommodation in the Reading Room is becoming an urgent question; and I have no doubt that if the Trustees of the Museum press for an increase in the accommodation it will be the duty of the Government to provide it.

MR. PARKER SMITH : I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether any representations have been made to him by the Trustees of the want of accommodation?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE : Not while I have been in Office.

*MR. JACKSON : I notice a sum of £900, a Re-Vote for the conversion of the Medal Room into an Exhibition Room for gold ornaments. I was responsible, more or less, for putting £900 for this purpose on the Estimates last year, and I judge from the fact that it is stated to be a Re-Vote that none of the £900 voted last year was expended. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will tell us why no progress was made with the work last year, and whether any progress will be made with it this year? I remember that this work was pressed on the Treasury with great assiduity, and we could never have sanctioned the £900 unless we were satisfied at the time, not only that the work was necessary, but that there was an immediate intention of carrying it out. Let me add that the noble Lord the Member for Brixton has done some injustice to those who are responsible for the lighting of the Museum; for when I was at the Treasury we sanctioned the necessary expenditure for introducing the electric light. The work was carried out under the supervision of Mr. Preece, the Electrical Engineer of the Post Office, and I understand it gives the greatest satisfaction.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE : In answer to my right hon. Friend, I have to say that it is intended to provide a Library and Students' Room; but the work could not be proceeded with in consequence of no room being ready into which to transfer the medals. I understand the work will be proceeded with this year.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he was under the impression that there was a large Library at the Museum already, and he would like to know why an additional Library was required?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE : I am afraid I cannot give the hon. Member any information about this Library and Students' Room. It was a work undertaken last year.

*SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, he desired to urge on the Government the necessity for developing the British Museum, which was probably the finest institution of its kind in the world, and was the glory of the British nation. The question was whether due provision was made year by year for the development of the institution? The opinion amongst those who were best versed in literature, science, and art was that the provision made was of a scanty and insufficient character. They did not take sufficient care to add to their magnificent and world-renowned collection from the different regions under the influence of the British Crown—

THE CHAIRMAN: The Vote before the Committee relates to the buildings of the British Museum, and not to the policy of the Trustees of the British Museum.

*SIR RICHARD TEMPLE said, he wished to urge the importance of adding to the collections, and, no doubt, the first step in that direction was to provide additional building accommodation. Then he wished to say that the electric lighting apparatus of the Museum must be deficient, because the Museum was not regularly lighted by the electric light at times convenient for the working classes. From an educational point of view, it was most important that the Museum should be lighted every evening, and, if not every evening, on certain evenings of the week for the benefit of all those who desired access to the collections.

MR. PLUNKET (Dublin University): I wish to call the attention of the First Commissioner of Works to the fact that there is no provision in the Estimates for the year for the prosecution of the scheme for completing the building of the Museum at South Kensington. The Committee are probably aware that there was a sum of £5,000 voted last year as a preliminary to the prosecution of those buildings, and I wish to tell the Committee very briefly how the matter now stands. This matter has excited a great deal of public interest for a long time. The condition of the buildings of South Kensington Museum on the east side of Exhibition Road, fronting the Brompton Road, are really a scandal to that part of London; and we have been pressed not only by men of science and art who are interested in the proper housing of our most valuable treasures of art and science, but also by the residents of the locality, who naturally complain of the very unsightly condition in which the buildings are allowed to remain. I am glad to say that we took steps to begin this most necessary work. In 1890 the late Government invited eight eminent architects—four of whom were nominated by the Institution of Architects and four by the Office of Works—to enter into a competition for providing designs for the building, with the result that the very handsome designs of Mr. Aston Webb were accepted. In the Estimates for 1891-2 a sum of £5,400 was voted for the expenses of the competition amongst the architects, and in the Estimates last year a sum of £5,000 was provided for the purpose of erecting temporary buildings into which it will be necessary to remove the valuable treasures before the new building can be commenced. I am sorry to see that there is no provision in the Estimates this year for carrying the project further; and I should like to ask the First Commissioner of Works why it is the work of providing proper accommodation for these national treasures at South Kensington, which are at present housed in very inadequate and very insecure buildings, is not continued this year?

MR. SHAW - LEFEVRE: I can assure my right hon. Friend that, personally, I fully sympathise with what he has said on this subject, and I hope that at an early period the works he has indicated will be carried out. I agree with him that it is extremely important that increased accommodation should be provided at South Kensington. The present buildings are extremely indifferent, and the plans to improve and enlarge them decided upon by the right hon. Gentleman have, I believe, given general satisfaction. The estimated cost of the new buildings, however, is no less than £400,000, and the right hon. Gentleman will not be surprised that the Treasury hesitated about beginning a work of such magnitude, at all events when they already have very large works on hand. The expenditure on new works this year is more than double that of the last four or five years, having risen from £150,000 in 1887-8 to £388,000 in the present financial year. In view of that large expenditure, it would not have been wise on the part of the Government to have undertaken, at least until the public buildings of different kinds now in progress are completed, another great work involving an expenditure of £400,000.

DR. FARQUHARSON said, the necessity for this very heavy expenditure had not been made quite clear. They had at South Kensington a very large amount of unused gallery space, sufficient, he believed, to meet any demand on them for the accommodation of works of art; and he would, therefore, like to have an explanation what further buildings were needed. He was bound to say he thought the expenditure on this proposed gallery was of a very unnecessary kind; but he would like to urge an expenditure for a different purpose, for which he saw no provision in the Estimates, and that was to procure additional accommodation for teaching at South Kensington. The conditions under which teaching in science was carried out there was hardly creditable to the country. There was a great deal of important work not only of a teaching character, but of an original and investigatory character, carried on at South Kensington under conditions that would disgrace a fifth-rate University in Germany or any other foreign country. He hoped, therefore, that the First Commissioner would be able to give an assurance that proper accommodation would be provided at South Kensington for carrying out this great national work.

SIR W. HART DYKE (Kent, Dartford): I must call the attention of the Committee to the very unsatisfactory reply of the Representative of the Board of Works with regard to South Kensington Museum. This is no new complaint about the state of the buildings at South Kensington and their surroundings. No doubt the sum required for these buildings is very large, and in the present state of the Exchequer no hon. Member would propose that a very large amount should be at once voted. But what I complain of is that no effort whatever is made in these Estimates to alter the existing disgraceful state of things at South Kensington.

Mr. Shaw-Lefevre

ton. The outside appearance of those buildings is a disgrace to our civilisation. The First Commissioner of Works has been especially unfortunate in regard to this question. In 1882—11 years ago—the present President of the Board of Trade wrote that the Committee of Council expressed their satisfaction at learning that the Lords of the Treasury were going to take steps in the next financial year with a view to the completion of those buildings; and in the Estimates of 1883-4 a sum of £5,000 was inserted by the right hon. Gentleman who was then also First Commissioner of Works on account of the south-west wing. The proposal was attacked by the hon. Member for Northampton, and the right hon. Gentleman did not think it would be wise to press that part of the Vote, and so he withdrew it. Now, there is another withdrawal of £5,000 from the Estimates, and the right hon. Gentleman does not say that there is a probability of a sum being taken for the purpose even next year. I am not making this a question between Her Majesty's Government and the Opposition, and I am making no personal attack on the right hon. Gentleman. What I do complain of is the studied neglect shown by Her Majesty's Government and the Office of Works with respect to those buildings. What is the present state of affairs at South Kensington? There is a quadrangle filled with several wooden buildings covered with some hideous corrugated iron; the buildings are of the most inflammable materials, and are placed next to a collection of the most valuable kind in the world, estimated to be worth over £2,000,000. But what I am anxious to press above all is the want of accommodation within the buildings themselves. In 1882 my right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works wrote, as I have already shown, to the Treasury, stating that the accommodation was deplorable. But since then the work carried on has doubled or trebled. Since drawing was made compulsory in the elementary schools, the number of schools sending work to South Kensington for examination has gone up from 4,500 to 20,000. For many years past the examination work has been carried on in passages where the water trickles through the roof on to the papers, and even over the staircases of the building. That is a most disgraceful state of affairs. It is really like spoiling the ship for a halfpenny worth of tar. The rest of our educational system has risen by £3,000,000 a year. No one objects to it, for a better policy of insurance no nation could have. But, surely, in order to assist the great work of education, we ought not to hesitate about spending £5,000, which would, at least, commence the necessary buildings. Instead of that, we are brought face to face with the fact that we have no pledge whatever from Her Majesty's Government that even next year this paltry sum of £5,000 will be voted for those buildings. That state of things at South Kensington cannot be remedied for four years—that is, not before 1897, for it will take at least four years to complete the buildings. With the consent of both parties a Museum has been made at South Kensington where art objects are displayed, and it is one of the best educational institutions in Europe. There is at South Kensington a splendid collection of art objects, which are sent from that place and circulated at local Museums throughout the country. That shows the great educational value of the institution. Technical education is also carried on under the auspices of the Science and Art Department. There has been a great increase in the work of the Department through the spread of technical education, and I hope it will be soon doubled and trebled. I trust I have said enough to show to the Committee and all the inhabitants of the Metropolis that this question of the South Kensington buildings should not be allowed to sleep. Parliament ought to insist that, either by this Government or by another—for I acknowledge that both Governments are to blame in this matter—the grave state of things to which I have called attention should at once be remedied. I only wish that the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he got his fingers into the Treasury Chest the other day had taken out £50,000 for this purpose, and had the right hon. Gentleman done so I am sure it would have met with the approval of the country. I hope, therefore, that another year's Estimates will not be framed without some prospect of this condition of affairs at South Kensington being remedied.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that in questions of this kind there was little to choose between one Government and another; but still it seemed they had had some advantage in this matter in having a Conservative Government turned out and a Liberal Government placed in power. The right hon. Gentleman had told the Committee that a disgraceful state of things prevailed at South Kensington, and that the rain trickled down on the unfortunate examiners. But who was responsible for this for the last six years? The Conservative Government. Instead of buying some silly old cabinet for 50 times its value, if they had mended the roofs at South Kensington they would have protected the examiners from the rain, and saved a considerable amount to the country. Then the right hon. Gentleman said, "We want more space; look at the vast number of things we are sending round the provinces." But surely that was a reason why they did not want more space. Let them send more things round the provinces, and then the pressure on space at South Kensington would be relieved. He asked the Committee to consider what they had heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University. The right hon. Gentleman calmly stood up and told them that £5,000 had been expended upon the architect's plan for the proposed buildings; and that when the plan was accepted it was found it would not do and had to be altered.

MR. PLUNKET: What I said was that there were some slight alterations suggested by the Office of Works and by the Science and Art Department, but they did not interfere with the plan.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, the plan was impracticable, and alterations were proposed by the Science and Art Department and by the Office of Works. He did not think much of that plan, and he thought it cost a great deal too much when they had to spend £5,000 on it. Then, after they had been told that £5,000 had been spent on the plan, complaint was made by another right hon. Gentleman that the £400,000 necessary for the buildings was not spent.

SIR WILLIAM HART-DYKE: I stated that I would not support a scheme for spending the money at once.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, no Government wanted to spend the money at once. They slipped in a little Vote—a mere trifle; next year there was another Vote, and when complaint was made, it was—"You are pledged to the work, and will you waste the £10,000 that have been spent on it?" He rejoiced that there was not a shilling for the work on the Estimates. He was thankful that they had got a Chancellor of the Exchequer who was a jealous guardian of the Public Purse. He was thankful to say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer probably shared his objection to this wild and reckless and useless expenditure at South Kensington. Let them have it as a centre for examinations, as an exhibition of works of art, and as a means of sending those works over the country for pleasure and instruction, and South Kensington was, no doubt, in that way a valuable institution, but it was reckless and outrageous to suggest that they should be asked to spend £400,000 more in building a new gallery without even knowing what they were to put into it. He hoped the Chief Commissioner of Works would firmly oppose it, and he would give him his support; but if the right hon. Gentleman took the advice of right hon. Gentlemen opposite, who took care not to vote the money while they themselves were in Office, and proposed this expenditure, he would give it his most strenuous opposition.

An hon. MEMBER said he strongly opposed any such expenditure as that suggested for new galleries or extension of buildings, but there was one item in the present Estimates which he supported. That was a sum of £2,500 for making the gallery in which the Raphael Cartoons were exhibited fireproof. It was certainly a most reprehensible state of things that these priceless works of art should have been allowed for years to be exhibited in a gallery which was liable to be destroyed by fire. He hoped the gallery would be made fireproof without the least delay.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): I desire to refer to some of the observations made by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, who at Question time made an appeal to me when I answered a question of the hon. Member for Bordesley, as to the money spent in existing local museums, that Northampton should get its share. Well, I wish to say that this money for buildings is not merely for new galleries for exhibits, as hon. Members seem to suppose. A good deal of work of arranging specimens for circulation amongst the museums through the provinces is carried out at present in buildings which are not waterproof, or in any way in a favourable condition for the work. And when the hon. Member sneers at the Government for buying what he calls "a silly old cabinet" he should remember the purpose for which objects of the kind are purchased. The raison d'être of the Museum is that it should be a collection of splendid works of art having a close relation to the industries of the country, and a very large number of the working classes, who know what good work is, are of opinion that the money expended on South Kensington has been well spent on the whole. The object in view is, and should be, to make the Museum, as an educational institution, effective in every respect; to see that the arrangements for circulating specimens among local museums and other work of the institution are carried on in decent and convenient buildings, and by degrees to relieve the present overcrowded condition of the courts and galleries, so that the great works of art may be seen to advantage. I regret that the state of the national finances do not allow us to move faster in the matter. The whole question of Science and Art in this country is bound up with the Museum, and I say that the present condition of things at South Kensington is therefore a matter which all Governments alike should desire to see remedied.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said, he had a great deal of sympathy with the protest of his hon. Friend the Member for Northampton against any additional expenditure at South Kensington. He remembered that some years ago there was a large Party in the House who regarded the whole institution at South Kensington with a great deal of suspicion, and he admitted that he was an embodiment of old and obsolete ideas, so far as that he had not absolutely divested himself of those sentiments. But he thought the expenditure of an adequate sum to keep the buildings in proper repair should not be grudged by any Party. What he wished to draw attention to was that the First Commissioner of Works had not answered the question with regard to the lighting of the British Museum. As to the lighting of a great national institution like the British Museum, he thought the Government ought to have ascertained that they were proceeding on a right principle. Great disappointment had attended the efforts of those who had sought to apply the electric lighting system to many of our buildings, and he thought his noble Friend the Member for Brixton was quite right in asking for assurances on this point. He ventured now to ask the right hon. Gentleman to explain what steps he had taken to meet the requirements of those who used the British Museum at night, and how far the amount which appeared in the Estimate as the amount which was to be expended in that direction would meet the requirements of the situation.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: The right hon. Gentleman has adopted a very inconvenient course in going back.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER said, that so far from going back the right hon. Gentleman had not replied to the inquiries which had been addressed to him.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: Discussion has arisen already on this matter, and I thought the Committee had passed from the British Museum to South Kensington. In point of fact, the greater portion of the British Museum is lighted by electricity, and a great portion of it is open to the public, but not the whole of it, the same night. I agree that the result has not been altogether so satisfactory as was expected, and that the attendance of the public has not been so large as was expected; but, at the same time, there is no occasion whatever for reducing the present facilities.

MR. PARKER SMITH, alluding to the electric lighting of the British Museum, asked if the right hon. Gentleman could give them any facts as to the number of people who attended the British Museum in the evening; whether the experiment of lighting up the Museum was tried mainly at the instance of the House of Commons; and whether it was not the fact that the attendance at the Museum consequently on its being opened in the evening had been very small, and was diminishing? He was afraid the experiment of lighting the British Museum by the electric light so as to keep it open at night had not been attended with success, and there was not much prospect of it being so in the future. It was a costly matter to have the Museum opened at night; and seeing that the amount which the Treasury could vote for the service of the British Museum was limited, he thought the money might be expended to much better purpose. With regard to South Kensington, he called attention to the fact that they had there two galleries with almost the best light in the world for pictures, and these were at present devoted to diagrams and magnifying models of the insides of insects, &c. These were, no doubt, very useful objects, but they did not need the perfect light which was needed for pictures. He thought everything that had been said was true as to the crowded chaos that existed on the east side of Exhibition Road. He congratulated the Government on the new appointment of Director that had been made at the South Kensington Museum. The gentleman who had received the appointment had a power of scientific arrangement, and by proper scientific arrangements, and by getting rid of duplicate casts—the originals of which might be seen at Bloomsbury—they would find that further room might be utilised. The accommodation for science teaching at South Kensington was absolutely and grossly inadequate. The rooms in which the science work was conducted were scandalous and would disgrace a country School Board or a provincial town, not to speak of a German University. He hoped the Government would give the Committee an assurance that they were prepared, without further delay, to carry out some scheme by which a proper, suitable, and adequate building for the teaching of science would be provided, and that they would no longer be content with the present miserable makeshifts.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE said, his only reason for rising was because of the educational aspect which had been given to a portion of this Debate. The Committee had heard a very strong statement from the late Minister of Education—than whom a more competent authority they could not have—as to the utter insufficiency of the accommodation for conducting the various examinations in Science and Art, and especially in elementary drawing. The right hon. Gentleman had pointed out the growing expansion of that branch of elementary education—namely, the instruction of pupils in drawing, most of whom had to be examined ultimately in South Kensington, and the question before the Committee was not the style of examination or the mode of conducting it, but the deficiency of the accommodation provided for holding such examinations. The hon. Gentleman who had last spoken had said that no Education Department in Europe and no School Board in England would tolerate such accommodation. Of course no School Board would, and certainly the School Board for London would not. But he must point out that between our Parliament and the School Boards there was an essential difference in providing accommodation. School Boards provided it from capital account; they borrowed for it; but in the House of Commons a different policy was pursued. If a School Board had to provide this accommodation they would do it at once, but that House must do it by degrees, because whilst a School Board borrowed, Parliament had to defray the cost from current revenue and thus they had the delay which scandalised the nation and impeded the progress of education as well as of many other branches of national life. That was the kernel of the question, and of course there was much to be said for the Parliamentary practice. What they required in this case was an outlay of a sum of £400,000 which would supply their wants. As they could not obtain that sum they could not undertake the work, as it was no good attempting to spend £400,000 by dribblets, and all that could be done was to provide this £15,000 or £16,000 for keeping the present temporary buildings in a tolerably satisfactory condition. He believed that was the outcome of the question, and what that House was about voting was the money for providing temporary accommodation or remedying the deficiencies, faults, and shortcomings which the late Minister of Education had so properly pointed out, and certainly there were no signs of extravagance in this respect; for, while the deficiencies became more and more glaring every year, the amount voted for that House became slightly less. They were now absolutely going to vote £2,000 less for this object than they voted the previous year. Under these circumstances he could not understand the hon. Member for Northampton when he talked about squandering money on South Kensington. Could it be said that money devoted to the purposes he had mentioned was squandered? Such language would not be popular with the new democracy, inasmuch as the students were drawn from the humbler classes and from all parts of the country, in order to pursue their studies and to pass their examinations there. Was it, he asked, likely to be a popular thing to decry this expenditure and say it was not wanted, and that students and prize-winners were to be treated as if the nation despised them and their occupation? On the contrary, the nation desired to receive them with true national hospitality, and in a manner in which students of this character, drawn from all classes of the nation, ought to be received. The hon. Member for Northampton went on to say that the money ought not to be spent at South Kensington at all, and that some better place ought to be found. But he would point out that South Kensington was the finest technical institution in the world, with immense ramifications, exercising a world-wide influence, so far as the English-speaking races were concerned, and it was to that great national centre students from all classes were invited. It could not be an unpopular thing on the part of the governing classes to provide the finest, handsomest, and most attractive site to be found in the whole of the Metropolis. He contended that this Vote deserved the approval of the Committee, and the only question was whether it ought not to be larger. If the money could not be given this year it might be given next year. He regretted the disparaging expressions that were sometimes used in that House with reference to the objects of art which were collected in South Kensington, and which were not merely matters of curiosity, but which were required for affording object-lessons to the students, and, therefore, it was very important that sufficient money should be voted for their proper accommodation. He would desire to say a few words about the Natural History Museum. Whatever objection might be urged to the accommodation in the other buildings, he believed that certainly the accommodation in the Natural History Museum was extremely fine. The museum collection itself was well worthy, he thought, of the large buildings in which the objects were placed—buildings not only so elaborate as to attract the popular taste, but suited in every way for scientific instruction, and unsurpassed in any country in the world. Well, then, they had certain subsidiary matters in connection with all these buildings, and money was required for the workshops that were necessary to be kept in operation at the museum. If the development of the institution was to be properly cared for, it must be through the establishment of a staff of trained artificers and scientific workmen, and fair and full accommodation for such men. It did seem to him that more might be done in that direction, because, when they looked at the specimens that had been collected and placed in these fine buildings, it was not unreasonable that they should ask for a moderate sum to provide for the subsidiary works. That was not much to ask for in respect of institutions which were an honour and a credit to the nation.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) said, he had listened with very great pleasure to the speech of the hon. Baronet. There was one point about which he was not quite correct, however, and that was as to the amount spent on South Kensington. It was a mistake to say that that amount was small, for he (Mr. Collings) recollected that last year there was a Supplementary Vote for it, apart from the regular Vote, of something like £100,000. The administration of the Department was not such as commanded the approval of many provincial Members. If the institution was to gain the favour of the country it must make itself national in a truer sense. He was disappointed with the meagre speech of the Vice President (Mr. Acland), because he could not but contrast it with a speech he made a year or two ago, bringing the late Government to task in the strongest manner on account of the manner in which South Kensington was conducted. The right hon. Gentleman then pointed out the great national importance of South Kensington, and called for more accommodation. How was it they heard nothing about that now? How was it he did not dwell on these points in the speech he had just delivered? He spoke of providing additional accommodation, but of doing it by degrees. What step had he taken in the present Estimates to provide for this? There was an item of £2,850 for works; but that could not go far. The right hon. Gentleman had it now in his power to give effect to the ideas contained in the speech which he delivered on the subject while the late Government was in Office, but he did not attempt to do so. He agreed with him that a penny-wise and pound-foolish policy was not right where a great national work was concerned, and he hoped they would have some more information as to the intentions of the right hon. Gentleman. The late Government spent £100,000—

MR. ACLAND: No.

MR. J. COLLINGS said, at all events, they got the Vote for that amount.

MR. ACLAND was understood to dissent.

MR. J. COLLINGS said, he might be astray as to the amount, though he did not think he was. He would put it to the right hon. Gentleman the late Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) was that not the amount voted?

MR. JACKSON nodded assent.

MR. J. COLLINGS said, that being so, what was the right hon. Gentleman now prepared to do on behalf of the present Government? He noticed that the hon. Member for South Birmingham (Mr. Powell Williams), for the first time while this Vote was under discussion, was not present. That hon. Member used to complain also of the accommodation. Surely they were entitled to further explanation? The Vice President, in speaking of the national character of South Kensington, told them of the large numbers of the working classes who visited the place. Why, more of the working class population visited the museums in Manchester, Glasgow, and Birmingham in one week than visited South Kensington in two months. If the right hon. Gentleman wanted accommodation, let him take some dozens of the objects at South Kensington, and send them to the provinces, where the working classes would see them, and where they would be useful. That would give him, temporarily at any rate, additional space. His opinion was that South Kensington had been carried on, of late years, with a hide-bound officialism. If its collections, or duplicates of them, were sent to the provinces with greater liberality, there would not be so much outcry about want of space in the Museum. Before sitting down, he wished to ask what arrangements had been made to cope with any outbreak of fire at South Kensington. Having in his mind a painful recollection of the great fire in the gallery and library at Birmingham, he was anxious to know that the priceless treasures which the country possessed at South Kensington—and which could never be replaced—were secure from fire as far as science and human ingenuity could provide. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not rest content with an official assurance, but would have the very highest scientific evidence, and a professional assurance, for, like his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. A. C. Morton), he liked the advice and assistance of professional men in matters of such great importance. It was not enough to go to the Chief Librarian and hear from him that all was secure. There was a higher authority somewhere in London, and he wanted to know whether the Government had taken steps to secure the advice of that authority. It would not do to wait, for, as he had said, they could not replace these treasures if they were lost.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, the Government attached great importance to this subject, and they had included in the Estimates a Vote for £2,500 for the construction of a fire-proof roof for the South Kensington Galleries. They would take an early opportunity of asking for power to make an addition to the South Kensington buildings in order to provide the necessary accommodation. In his view, there ought to be a fixed sum taken every year for additional buildings and for repairing the existing buildings. The Government had spent a good deal of money for these purposes in London during this year, and he did not think that they would be justified in spending any more at present.

Mr. J. Collings

MR. JACKSON said, he had heard a good many unsatisfactory answers to questions in that House, and he was sometimes conscious of the unsatisfactory character of the answers that were being given, but he had never listened to an answer which was so unsatisfactory as that which hon. Members had just heard from the right hon. Gentleman on this most important subject. The right hon. Gentleman had said that this Vote ought to be maintained at the same amount each year, but he forgets that the late Government had doubled the amount of the Vote during the last four or five years.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, that the late Government had reduced the amount of the Vote at first.

*MR. JACKSON said, however that might have been, the late Government had eventually doubled the amount of the Vote. It was clear from the language of the right hon. Gentleman that neither he nor the present Government thought that Science teaching was a matter of much importance.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: A matter of great importance.

MR. JACKSON wanted to know was that the reason there was not in the Estimates a Vote for a shilling for the extension of the buildings appropriated to Science teaching at South Kensington?

THE CHAIRMAN: I would remind the right hon. Gentleman of the subject of the Vote.

MR. JACKSON said, he was speaking of the provision made for South Kensington. The buildings at South Kensington were being neglected. What were the facts? It could scarcely be disputed that the provision for Science teaching at South Kensington was inadequate for the requirements of the Department. The Government ought to utilise for the purposes of the Department the land that was bought for the purpose of extending the buildings by the late Government. That Government most reluctantly arrived at the conclusion that it was absolutely necessary to provide additional accommodation for the Department, in view of the fact that the clerks had to discharge their duties in passages instead of in rooms. As Secretary to the Treasury in that Government it was his duty to fight against the demands made on the Treasury. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had no friends in the House of Commons when it came to an expenditure of this kind. The objections were raised from time to time ; a Committee was appointed to see whether by any re-arrangement of the articles in South Kensington it would be possible to find additional space. The Committee was presided over, he thought, by Sir J. Evans, of the Royal Society. An important Report was presented by that Committee, and the conclusion come to was that, unwilling as the Government might be to add to the demands on the Treasury for new buildings, Post Office sites, and other undertakings, still they were bound to go on with the South Kensington extension, or at least that they should make ready to enter upon it when the Report came before them—

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: They did not pass it.

*MR. JACKSON said, they did what might be expected. They arranged for plans for new buildings, and had a substantial sum expended on temporary buildings. So much importance was attached to the matter that the late Mr. William H. Smith (his right hon. Friend the then Chancellor of the Exchequer) and himself went out to South Kensington, and saw the condition of things for themselves, trying to find out in every way whether they could postpone the expenditure. So impressed were they with what they did see that they were compelled to make the provision to which he had referred. Altogether, the late Government expended in two years some £10,000 in connection with the preparation of plans and the provision of temporary buildings. The answer of the right hon. Gentleman was unsatisfactory, because it left it in complete doubt whether the Government proposed to carry out the scheme of the late Government, or intended to allow the whole proposal to fall to the ground. The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner had answered the question that had been put to him according to his brief, but he should like to know what were the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir W. Harcourt) with regard to it? Surely the Government ought to tell the Committee whether they were prepared to carry the intention of the late Government into effect or not, and, if so, it would be done in accordance with their plan. He did not wish to blame the right hon. Gentleman, but he would say that if ever there was a time when it was necessary to give increased accommodation to the Science Department at South Kensington, this was the proper time. Throughout the country enormous sums of money were being spent upon technical education. South Kensington had been expected to keep pace with the growing requirements of the country, and a representation had been made to the Treasury by the Professors and others engaged in the teaching of Science at South Kensington. He knew something of the standard of the Professors there. There were amongst them some of the best teachers in the country—two of them had been stolen from the Yorkshire College, Leeds, very much to the disadvantage of that college, although he had been glad to see these men promoted, and to see their abilities recognised by the Government, and to know that they had justified their appointment. These men had spoken to him over and over again as to the insufficiency of the laboratory accommodation, declaring that in some cases, owing to this cause, students were only able to take half their course at South Kensington. The late Government had spent between £2,000 and £3,000 in providing additional accommodation on the west side of Exhibition Road. This, however, was only intended to meet the pressing requirements at the time, and was really looked upon as a temporary expedient. He remembered being struck with the fact that these men proved to the Treasury at that time that the fees paid by the students more than covered the interest upon the additional expenditure, and that these students could not have been accommodated at South Kensington at that time. He had mentioned these facts to show that the question was not a new one. It was a question which was thoroughly investigated by the late Government, who came to the conclusion that it should be faced ; and he confessed that in looking through the Estimates nothing had surprised him as much as to find the entire absence of any provision for the extension of the buildings connected with Science teaching. He hoped that the Government would be able to assure the Committee that they had not dropped the scheme which was decided upon, and that they intended to proceed with the work. If they got that assurance the Committee would probably have to rest satisfied. If they did not get that assurance the Committee ought to show its strong sense of disapprobation at the policy and proceedings of Her Majesty's Government.

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: The right hon. Gentleman could hardly have been in the House when I replied to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin.

MR. JACKSON: I have not been out of the House.

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: From the right hon. Gentleman's speech one would have been led to suppose that he had not been present when I answered the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin. At any rate he could hardly have listened to what I said. I said that, personally, I agreed with all that had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. JACKSON: That is exactly my complaint. I said I did not blame the right hon. Gentleman, but I wanted to know from the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether this scheme is to go on or not?

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: I gathered that though he did not blame me, yet he wished to hear from me a more explicit account of what was intended. I stated to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin that I agreed with him; that he had given an accurate account of what had taken place on the point, and that the decision that the Government had come to was, that they would not during the coming year vote any sum of money for the purpose of carrying out this work. I pointed out the heavy expenditure the Government had undertaken in the matter of public works, and that, with this in view, it was not possible for them to face the large expenditure of £400,000. I ended by saying that I could not state whether the Government would undertake the expenditure next year, but that, personally, I was strongly in favour of it. Until the Estimates next year come on I can say no more. I think that the right hon. Gentleman hardly distinguished between the two questions —buildings for scientific purposes, and additions opposite to Brompton Road, but I fully recognise the importance of both. During the present year some of the public buildings we have in hand will be completed, therefore I have great hopes that next year we shall be able to advance one or both of these works to some extent. But when once a portion is begun it will be wise to complete it as soon as possible. It would hardly be wise to commence a building which will ultimately cost £400,000 by spending £10,000 or £15,000 on it, as was proposed by the former Vice-President of the Education Department (Sir W. Hart-Dyke). I do not think it would be a wise policy to spread the expenditure over a number of years. I do not think the statement of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Jackson) that the late Government faced this question is a correct one. No doubt they spent something on preliminary arrangements and temporary buildings, but it would have been just as possible for them to commence the work they are urging us to undertake as it is for us.

MR. JACKSON: The right hon. Gentleman must know that it was impossible for us to commence the work before settling the preliminaries.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: My point is that the late Government cannot be said to have faced the question. I have full sympathy with the right hon. Gentleman as to the importance of the work, and, as far as I am concerned, I shall use my influence with the Treasury to get them to sanction the commencement of these works.

MR. PLUNKET: We are not finding fault with the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works. The fault is that apparently, with all his good intentions and sympathy, he has been placed by his Colleagues under such terms that he is only allowed to say that no decision has yet been arrived at by the Government. A decision was arrived at by the late Government, and unless the present Government are prepared to carry out that decision in the sense desired by the English public we shall be justified in concluding that the scheme which the late Government determined upon has been abandoned. The time has come when the Representative of the Science and Art Department ought to move in this matter, and if he will not, pressure must be brought to bear by the public upon the Government, as it was brought to bear upon the late Government, to strengthen the hands of the Science and Art Department and the Office of Works, and compel the Treasury to give effect to the will of the public. Unless that is done there will be more delay and more money wasted. The right hon Gentleman opposite says there is a large increase in the expenditure on buildings. Well, I have been looking over the Estimates, and I find that the total increase in the Estimates for buildings is £40,000, of which £25,000 is for postal and telegraph buildings, which are always reproductive. Expenditure of that kind is a way of earning money for the public, therefore I cannot attach much importance to the right hon. Gentleman's plea. The late Government obtained plans and spent £5,400 one year and £5,000 the year following. It would have been impossible to spend more on building operations during the last financial year. I agree that it would be unwise to spend £10,000 or £15,000 this year on a building which is to cost £400,000; but that is no reason for saying that the scheme should be dropped altogether, or dropped for some years. I say the necessity for these buildings has been demonstrated and proved again and again, and the good intentions and the sympathy expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works are altogether insufficient and unsatisfactory. Unless the public take the matter up nothing will be done.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT was understood to say that the works contemplated by the late Government had not been abandoned.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS: I rise to Order. May I point out to the right hon. Member that there are others besides those on the Front Bench and who sit immediately opposite who want to hear what he has to say on this question?

MR. J. COLLINGS: We cannot hear a word.

THE CHAIRMAN: Sir John Hibbert is in possession of the Committee.

SIR J. HIBBERT: I beg pardon. I have been asked whether these works have been abandoned or not. I naturally cannot say whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer will consent to the works being carried on next year; but I can say that, owing to financial pressure, the Treasury have consented to the works being postponed, but not abandoned. My own feeling in the matter is strongly in favour of the continuation of the works at South Kensington, when we are in a position to spend money upon them. The present Government are in a very different position from that in which the late Government were in when they sanctioned these buildings. Nearly every year the late Government were fortunate enough to have a considerable surplus, but this year there is a large deficiency; and I feel sure that the Committee, and even the strongest friends of the South Kensington Museum, will agree that this is not a year when we should incur a large expenditure on new buildings. My own opinion is that the portion of the scheme which we should push on with first is that with reference to the Science-teaching Department. I know there is great pressure on that Department owing to the want of buildings; and I trust that next year, presuming we are in a more fortunate position, provision will be made for carrying out that portion of the scheme. With respect to the larger scheme and the expenditure of £400,000, I am not in a position to commit the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the question. I can only say that I look upon the proposal as postponed, not abandoned. I do not doubt the bona fides of right hon. Gentlemen opposite; but, had they been in Office, I do not think they would have been able to carry out these works this year. Next year I trust we may be in a more fortunate position, when something may be done to carry out the scheme elaborated and prepared by the late Government.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS thought it very unfortunate that the Government had come to the conclusion to postpone this important matter. If they had the experience which some hon. Members had of the immense advantages, in the point of view of technical education, which were derived by local communities from exhibitions of this kind, they would consider it one of their first obligations and duties to see that the splendid collection in South Kensington was exhibited in a building fit to contain it, and that every opportunity was afforded to working men for studying design and construction which they saw exemplified in so many forms in that building. The right hon. Gentleman said the Vote was postponed, and he thought they had a right to ask how long was it to be postponed? That was a matter closely affecting the prosperity of the nation. It affected trade, which depended on design, and the skill of working men. He wished, further, to call attention to the security of this building. He would ask a simple question which would test the question of security. Did the Government insure the collection, or did they not? Had they any difficulty in getting the requisite amount of insurance from the great Insurance Companies, or were the great Insurance Companies unwilling to take the risk at the ordinary rates? If they did not insure, he thought it would be because the Insurance Companies would not accept the risk of insuring such a collection in buildings of so dangerous a character. There was another question he wished to ask. He saw there was an item of £3,500 for rent for certain parts of the existing buildings; and it appeared to him a fair question to ask whether this sum had reference to buildings erected on land which was not the property of the Crown? He was told that some years ago a certain portion of the buildings stood on land that did not belong to the nation. Was that so, or was it the fact that, though the land belonged to the Crown, the buildings did not? This touched the question of whether the buildings were properly fitted to contain this collection. As to the character of the buildings as they stood, he quite concurred with what had been said by the right hon. Member for Dublin University. Anything more disgraceful than those buildings it would be impossible to find in any capital in Europe. He never saw such a thing in his life as the entrance to the South Kensington Museum. He agreed with all that had been said as to these buildings, both in point of security and in point of architectural design.

MR. CHAPLIN: I am sure I have no desire unnecessarily to prolong this discussion; but I am bound to say that nothing can be more unsatisfactory than the statement of the Secretary to the Treasury and the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works in reply to the speeches which have been made from this Bench. The Committee will observe that the importance of these works is not denied for a moment by either of these right hon. Gentlemen. On the contrary, they have admitted the force of everything that has fallen from my right hon. Friends. A question was put from this side of the House as to whether or not the work is to be abandoned, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite, in reply, said—"It is not to be abandoned; but I cannot say whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer will consent to go on with the work next year, or whether he will not." He says—"All I can say is that this work is to be postponed." Postponed, but for how long? Are we to understand that it is postponed sine die? If not, will the Government give us a distinct undertaking as to when they intend to go on with it, and when progress will be made with it? Frequent allusion has been made to the wishes or intentions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on this subject, and it appears that no answer is possible from the right hon. Gentleman opposite unless the Chancellor of the Exchequer is consulted. Well, where is the Chancellor of the Exchequer? Is it not possible for the right hon. Gentleman to ask for his attendance, and for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to come into the House to listen to the Debate upon a subject which the Government themselves admit to be very important. We are driven to the conclusion, by the attitude of right hon. Gentlemen opposite, that they intend to postpone sine die the work to which the late Government were committed. We cannot allow the matter to remain in this position. We must have some more explicit statement from the Government; therefore, in order that the First Commissioner of Works may have an opportunity of consulting the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and in order to enable the Committee to advance the business, I beg leave to move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

MR. JACKSON: I do not know whether my right hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin) contemplated the possibility of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer not being at hand. If it is not possible to consult him, the alternative would be to postpone the consideration of the Vote until such time as the right hon. Gentleman is in his place.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: I think the proposal to postpone the Vote is hardly reasonable. We have been discussing this matter not in regard to what is in the Vote, but in regard to what is not in it. The importance of commencing this work next year has been pressed on the Government, and that is a matter which we shall have to consider when next year's Estimates are before us. Even if the Chancellor of the Exchequer were here, he might not be in a position to pledge himself to commence the work at a certain date. All he would be able to do would be to say that he would take into consideration the views that have been expressed in many quarters, and would consider the question on the Estimates of the coming year. It has been already pointed out that the Government have not abandoned the work, and that the only decision they have arrived at is that they will not insert an item in the Votes of the present year. I am not sorry there has been a strong expression of opinion from many sides of the House on the subject. I hope, however, the right hon. Gentleman opposite and other hon. Members will rest satisfied with the assurance that I will do my best, when the Estimates are under consideration in a future year, to induce the Government to insert an item to enable the work mentioned to be commenced.

MR. J. COLLINGS said, the right hon. Gentleman, in speaking on the adjournment, had thrown more light on this question than he had done all the evening. The reason this Motion was warranted was because there were other points beside the one to which the right hon. Gentleman had alluded to which no reply had been given. There was the question of security from fire, for instance.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: I dealt with that subject in answer to a question put to me earlier in the evening. I should have been glad to enter into the subject again if this Motion for reporting Progress had not been moved.

MR. J. COLLINGS said, they had been listening in vain to hear the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council; therefore, if the Motion were withdrawn, it would be on the understanding that the information asked for should be given in a way that would satisfy the Committee, and in a way commensurate with the importance of the subject. The Committee should not be treated like a lot of children, to whom any kind of answer might be given.

MR. CHAPLIN: I gather from the reply of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works that the services of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer are not at the present moment available—that, in fact, the right hon. Gentleman is more pleasantly engaged. I do not propose to put the Committee to the trouble of dividing; but I would suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should confer with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that on the Report he should make a more definite statement.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

*MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea) endorsed the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bordesley Division as to the necessity of taking precautions for the prevention of fire and for recouping the Government in the event of fire. There were several large items in the Vote for the repairs of official residences. It was obvious, therefore, that there were officials in residence in these buildings; and his observation upon that was that if they were to have their public buildings protected as much as they could, humanly speaking, protect them, there was only one thing to do with official residences, and that was to do away with them altogether. When there were officials in residence their children were, as a rule, allowed much greater freedom in the buildings than adults by the firemen and policemen, and thus there was always danger from fire. Besides, the space occupied by these residences would be much better utilised for technical instruction and laboratories, and, at the same time, the money spent on them might be saved. He in no sense agreed with the Radical Vandalism of the hon. Member for Northampton. If Radicalism meant ugliness in public buildings and Vandalism in Art he was against it. The hon. Gentleman said there was plenty of room at South Kensington; but, as a frequent visitor, he (Mr. Burns) was unable to endorse that opinion. There was no space to spare either in the rooms or the galleries, and if the hon. Member were present he would ask him where the vacant space was. In the picture gallery the pictures were crowded together for want of space, and the engineering section resembled more a scrap-iron heap than an engineering museum. In the china department and in other parts of the Museum where general objects were exhibited it was impossible to get a clear view of some of the most beautiful exhibits in consequence of the limited accommodation. He could not concur in the criticism that had been indulged in as to what was called the extravagance of the proposition that the front portion of the Museum, facing the Brompton Road, should be completed. At present the front of the building looked like a cross between a blank factory wall after a fire and a disused racquet court. When he remembered that this blank wall was next to one of the most beautiful cathedrals now in course of being finished—namely, the Oratory—he thought it was a shame that it remained in such a condition. What was £400,000 to a nation as rich as England? It was only half the price of an ironclad, which would go to the bottom either through some lack of knowledge on the part of the captain or some fault in the compass. If the country could spend £800,000 on an ironclad, the guns of which could only be fired 10 or 15 times, he really did not see why it should not spend half that amount in instalments spread over four or five years on the completion of the South Kensington Museum. He must, however, express a hope that no encouragement would be given to the over-centralisation in all things which, he believed, took place at South Kensington. But even if decentralisation took place there was a necessity for increased accommodation for all purposes.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) said, the Trustees of the British Museum had always been most anxious to take every possible precaution against danger from fire, because they realised what a misfortune to the whole civilised world it would be if the British Museum were destroyed. Captain Simonds, the present chief of the London Fire Brigade, was their adviser with respect to danger against fire, and every precaution which experience could suggest was taken. Humanly speaking, he believed nothing more could be done in order to protect the Museum against fire. The official residences were not in the Museum, but adjoined it. The Trustees had always been of opinion that it was a very great security to have one of the officials close at hand in case any misfortune should happen; in fact, one of the regulations was that one of the keepers should always be in his official residence for the purpose. As regarded the question of saving money, it was necessary to have gentlemen of the highest possible acquirements in their respective departments, and as the salaries were only from £500 to £700 a year he did not think the officials were overpaid. The official residences had always been regarded as moderate additions to the salaries, and if the officials were deprived of their residences the loss must be made up in some other way.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): I may just say in reply to the hon. Member opposite and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings) that, as far as fire is concerned, great precautions are taken at South Kensington.

MR. J. COLLINGS said, that the authorities in Birmingham believed every possible precaution was taken against fire, and yet they lost their collection. He wanted the right hon. Gentleman to state on what scientific authority, if he had any, he based his opinion that the best precautions were taken.

MR. ACLAND: We have there military men of the greatest possible experience in a matter of this sort, engineers of great skill, who are in constant training, fire-alarms which are frequently set in motion, and admirable appliances of the most modern description. Policemen and engineers are there all night, and I believe the very best precautions are taken.

*MR. JACKSON said, there was a great difference of opinion as to whether official residences in some cases were not rather a source of danger than a source of protection. At South Kensington the official residences were in close contact with two important buildings. One of the plans proposed by the Treasury was that the official residences should be used for an extension of the Science Teaching Department. He was under the impression that this was rather a favourable time to consider the question, as he understood that one of the gentlemen connected with South Kensington was about to retire. If that was the case, the Vice President had an excellent opportunity for pressing the Treasury for additional accommodation for the Science Department. He thought it would be found that the Chief of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade had reported that the official residences were a source rather of danger than of safety.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES observed that no sum appeared this year in the Estimates for the insurance of the galleries at South Kensington. Was he to understand that the galleries were no longer insured?

MR. A. C. MORTON had been rather surprised to hear that military officers were employed in connection with the prevention of fire at South Kensington. It is a most extraordinary thing in the government of this country that military officers were so frequently employed to do work which had nothing of a military character about it. He was anxious not to have everything put in the West End of London, and would suggest that if the Government had money to spend on these purposes some of it should go to other parts of London. He would remind the Committee that before long a large building in the neighbourhood of the South Kensington Museum would be vacant—namely, the Imperial Institute. He wished to know how it was that £750 was put down for the rent of a gallery in the Imperial Institute building? Did it mean that an attempt was being made to smuggle into the Vote some sort of subsidy to the Imperial Institute?

MR. JAMES LOWTHER said, he did not wish in any way to endorse the idea that officials whose duties necessitated their constant presence on the premises should not have official residences; but, at the same time, he thought that such residences ought not to be in dangerous proximity to buildings in which priceless treasures were housed. There was no reason why the officials should not be provided with residences reasonably near their work, but disconnected with the public buildings. He did not wish to have more money spent at South Kensington, because he had a strong opinion that the less money we spent, except upon the Army and Navy, the better.

Sir John Hibbert rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question, "That the Question be now put," put, and agreed to.

Original Question put accordingly, and agreed to.

MR. HANBURY: We challenged the Vote, Mr. Mellor.

THE CHAIRMAN: I can only say the challenge was inaudible to the Chair.

3. £25,201, to complete the sum for Diplomatic and Consular Buildings.

MR. HANBURY: On a point of Order, Sir, I distinctly challenged the Vote, and several others around me.

THE CHAIRMAN: I declared the "Ayes have it," and I heard no challenge.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, he wished to ask a few questions with regard to this Vote. On page 26, he found a sum of £190 for Municipal and State Taxes. As was well known in this country, Consuls were not charged any local or Imperial taxes, and two years ago, when he raised a similar question, he was promised the matter should be looked into. He wished, therefore, to know why the Prussian or German Government should be the one Government to make this charge for local taxes? The next point he wished to raise was why we were going to spend at Constantinople £500 more than last year? The same remark would apply with regard to Lisbon, where they were spending this year £500, as against £100 last year, and he wished to know why there should be an increase of £400 in this item? On page 28, he found there was an increased charge for Siam of £430 more than last year. At Tangier also there was an increase of more than £200 over last year. On page 29, he found the Vote asked for Zanzibar was increased by very nearly £700. A little while ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister said that efforts would be made to reduce the expenditure of some of these Consuls, but he found that in many of these items, instead of being reduced, or of the Chancellor of the Exchequer insisting upon a reduction, they were increased and no reason given for it. He should, therefore, like to hear from the right hon. Gentleman some explanation in regard to the charge for taxes in Berlin, and the increase in the other cases he had mentioned.

*MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD said, there were one or two questions he wished to ask with regard to Berlin. He found that the charge for maintenance and repairs of the Embassy House, furniture of State Room, and Architect's fees came to a total of £75, and out of that sum the Architect's fees were £25. The ordinary fee to an architect was 5 per cent., whereas here it was 50 per cent., and that seemed to him an altogether immoderate and excessive charge, and inasmuch as we had a travelling surveyor, who looked after these buildings, it seemed to be a very heavy demand to make. There was a matter he also wished to call attention to on page 28, which was a charge that appeared for the first time, namely—

"Purchase of site for new hospital to British seamen, and preliminary building expenses, total estimated cost £8,000."

The charge for this year was £2,000, and this was a matter on which he thought the Committee ought to have some information before voting the money. Then there was a sum of £300 set down for the maintenance and repairs of furniture, gardens, and other things at the Legation House at Tangier, and on this item either a great many items were charged which would not be provided, or else the whole thing was perfectly unintelligible.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he should like some explanation as to two items under the head of Constantinople. First, he saw that two Embassies were charged for, the Embassy at the capital and the Embassy at Therapia. He could not understand why they should provide a country house on the Bosphorus for the Ambassador as well as a residence in the capital. His next complaint was in reference to the provision of a prison. Sir Henry Drummond Wolff had reported that the Capitulations involving ex-territorial prisons were most objectionable, and rendered the government of the country where they exist impossible, and he therefore objected to this charge. When a man went to Turkey he should be content to abide by the laws of the country, and he thought that no Foreign Power should attempt to maintain a prison in a foreign country.

*SIR R. TEMPLE wished to enumerate various points with regard to this Vote, because these consular buildings greatly concerned the welfare of this country; they were buildings constructed in the face of nationalities not always friendly to us, and were regarded as a symbol of the British influence and sovereignty in various parts of the world. When one came to think of it, there was no doubt these items were entered upon by the recommendation of the Foreign Department, and the right hon. Gentleman would surely have Reports on the subject from this Department. The Reports ought to be familiar to the right hon. Gentleman, and doubtless he had brought them with him, therefore it ought not to be difficult for him to answer these various questions, which ought to be answered if the Committee was to go over this branch of the expenditure satisfactorily. The points he wished to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to were items under heading "B" relating to China and Japan, "H" relating to Egypt, "L" relating to Persia, "O" relating to Siam, and matters relating to Zanzibar, and various other Missions. The items were all in the Votes, and in reality they were bound to look at each one, as they were matters actually before the Committee at this moment. With regard to the China and Japan item, he wished to draw attention to this fact: that there was a large sum for new works, alterations, and additions to the Consular building, and at the same time there was another item of £3,000 odd for the maintenance and repair of the buildings. He had no doubt the Reports which the right hon. Gentleman had from the Foreign Department would explain how these two items stood. He supposed the one was for maintaining the buildings which already existed and the other was for building new ones. One would not think the two things would go parallel; either buildings already existed and were in use—and if so he could not see why they should want a new building—or they were occupying some old building while a new one was being erected. It required some explanation, as it was not usual to see two items, one for new construction and the other for maintenance and repair. The next point related to Egypt, and notwithstanding the presence of his hon. Friend the Member for Lynn (Mr. Gibson Bowles) he must say he imagined the large expenditure for the residence at Cairo was very much needed. He understood his hon. Friend to object, but considering the position of our official there, he thought that the expenditure was necessary for the upholding of the dignity of this country. Whether we occupied Egypt or not we should always have an officer there of the first class to represent this country in a manner worthy of the nation, and in that case he must have a proper house to live in. Either he would be in full British residence and real Governor under the control of England under the suzerainty of the Sultan, or if we evacuated the country he would be Consul General, and in either case they would require a residence of proper dignity and decent architectural style. But the other building at Alexandria seemed to be maintained at an extraordinarily cheap rate. They found under all the other Consulates in Asia and Africa several hundreds a year charged for maintenance and repairs, but in the case of Alexandria it amounted to only £90. That seemed to be so unaccountably cheap that it required some explanation as to whether this £90 could really cover all the cost attending this Consulate, and if the Consulate received some other sum besides this they ought to know it. [An hon. MEMBER: The £90 is for rent.] His hon. Friend pointed out that sum was for rent, and in that case he supposed the tenant would do the repairs, but perhaps the right hon. Gentleman, with the aid of the Report from the Foreign Department, would be able to tell them that. Then, with regard to Siam, the items were certainly moderate. In another place the Government adopted the plan of building new structures outright, and the question naturally arose as to whether it was better to have these buildings constructed at once at capital cost or to rent them. At Smyrna there was this large item of a site for the new hospital that had been referred to by his hon. Friend (Mr. Freeman-Mitford). That was certainly a large expenditure, but the institution was of considerable interest. He was not sure it had been before the House as yet, and if this was the first time it appeared, he thought the right hon. Gentleman should give them some information regarding it, and why there should be a hospital for British seamen at Smyrna of all places, though, no doubt, there was a good reason for it. At Tangier there was an item of £300 for maintenance and repairs. Considering the rapid developments of our interests and the importance of our position there, it would be well for the right hon. Gentleman to inform them as to whether our Consular buildings there were in a proper condition and capable of meeting the growing requirements of this country in that part of the British sphere of influence. Then they came to Zanzibar. ["Oh, oh!"] A year ago the Committee would remember these hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway urged similar criticism he was now doing. On that occasion the Committee patiently listened to them, and now that he was offering what might be called skilled criticism they objected. As regarded Zanzibar our interests there were rapidly spreading. What was a Consulate had become an Agency, and would soon become a Residency and seat of government, and they should be informed whether the buildings were in a proper condition for an officer upon whom so much depended. With regard to the West Coast of Africa, he noticed this peculiarity: that, whereas certain items were put down last year for the old Calabar Consulate and various other Consulates, nothing whatever was put down this year, and he wished to know whether they were to infer these Consulates had been removed? On the East Coast of Africa, at Delagoa Bay, there was an item of £1,700 put down for the completion of the erection of a Consulate there. The total cost was £4,100, and by the 31st March last there had been expended the sum of £2,400. Apparently the work was being done at the rate of about £2,000 a year, and it would be satisfactory to know when the work would be completed. Lastly, he came to the cemeteries. £360 was put down for repairs to a cemetery on the Bosphorus, and he wished to ask what cemetery there was on the Bosphorus? There was a well-known cemetery at Scutari that contained the remains of many of our officers and men who fell during the Crimean War, and he would ask if that was the cemetery indicated, or whether the Bosphorus cemetery was some other; and, if so, could the right hon. Gentleman tell them whether the cemetery at Scutari—which was certainly a British one, containing the bones of many of our best officers and men, and one that was held in veneration by all nations—was being kept in proper repair by the British Government or not? There were other cemeteries about which remark might be made, but, out of regard to the feelings of hon. Gentlemen, he would not pursue the question further. He would conclude his list of questions by submitting, with all respect, that the points he had raised were worthy of consideration, and if the Committee was to proceed with proper knowledge they ought to have information regarding the condition of our consular buildings, as it constituted a matter of national importance.

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had gone from China to Zanzibar, and he had certainly amused the Committee if he had not enlightened them. The hon. Gentleman asked him various questions, and he would take the last one first, as to the cemetery on the Bosphorus. The hon. Gentleman was quite right in supposing that was the cemetery at Scutari, though he believed there were other smaller cemeteries that came under the same item. Then his hon. Friend reverted to the expenditure incurred upon various Consulates in China. He need hardly point out that it had been absolutely necessary to provide for these. The charge with regard to Tangier is to defray the expense of providing gardens to the Consular buildings. With regard to our Ambassador at Constantinople having two residences, it must be remembered that it is impossible for him to reside in that city during the summer months, and, therefore, it is absolutely necessary that he should have an additional residence at Pera. With regard to the payment of taxes for the Ambassador's residence at Berlin, that is due to the fact that the Municipal Authorities of the city exact the payment.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, that as the Local Authorities of Berlin insisted on charging rates and taxes on our Ambassador's house at Berlin, the right hon. Gentleman ought to direct the Local Authorities of the parish in London in which the Berlin Embassy resided to charge that Embassy rates and taxes, so that there might be equal dealing on both sides.

MR. MACARTNEY (Aultrim, S.) said, our Embassy House at St. Petersburg seemed to be held on different terms from the Embassy Houses in other capitals, because rent was paid for it; while in the other cities the residences of the Ambassadors were acquired by Great Britain. It appeared to him that the country would save a considerable sum of money by purchasing the Embassy House at St. Petersburg. He also noticed that the rent of the house varied considerably from year to year. In 1891 the rent was £1,875; last year it was £1,500; and this year it was £1,600. Perhaps the First Commissioner would give an explanation why the rent varied in such considerable amounts in three years? He also noticed that there was a sum of £1,700 on the Estimates for the completion of the Consular buildings on the East Coast of Africa. The total estimated cost of the building was given at £4,100, but going back on the Estimates for previous years, he found that in 1891-2, £1,000 was voted for the works; in 1892-3, £2,000; and now this year £1,700, making a total of £4,700, which was £600 above the total estimated cost.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: The estimated cost of these buildings is £4,100. The sums to which the hon. Gentleman has called attention have not all been spent, and we expect to keep within the estimated cost. With regard to the Embassy House at St. Petersburg, it is true that we pay rent for it; but I cannot say why, three years ago, the rent was higher than it is now.

SIR FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan) said, that there was a sum of £7,000 down for the new Agency House at Cairo, and he wished to know whether that amount would really complete the buildings?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES asked whether it was the fact that rent had to be paid for the Embassy House at St. Petersburg because the Russian Government would not allow us to buy land there? He saw that a rent of £430 was charged for the Consular House at Alexandria. He knew the house; it was a twelve-roomed house, such as a prosperous tradesman would retire to in Bloomsbury, and how anyone could charge £430 for it he could not imagine.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, he noticed that there was a number of items for allowances to Ministers for petty repairs. For instance, in Brussels there was an allowance of £33, which he did not consider a large amount. But he thought it was hardly consistent with the dignity of Ministers to be allowed a small salary—for the payments seemed to be made regularly every year—for these petty repairs. The cost of these repairs should be defrayed when the work was done. He also noticed that the Ministers at Athens and Copenhagen were each allowed £100 a year in lieu of furniture. It would be better to furnish these houses than to pay a large sum annually for furniture in that fashion.

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: It has been found that these annual allowances for repairs are the most economical arrangement; and if we were to furnish the houses at Athens and Copenhagen as the hon. Member suggests, our expenditure would be very much greater than it is now. The cost of the new Consular buildings at Cairo will be fully covered by the Estimate; and, with regard to the sum charged for rent of the Consular House at Alexandria, it must be borne in mind that rents are very high there.

MR. HANBURY thought they should have a more satisfactory answer in regard to the Embassy House at St. Petersburg. It seemed strange that we should pay rent for the Embassy House at St. Petersburg, while the Embassy Houses in all the other capitals were our private property. The Embassy House at Constantinople was a present from the Sultan. He believed the real reason why we had to pay rent at St. Petersburg was because the Russian Government would not allow us to acquire land there. He noticed that there were certain Consular Buildings in China to which the Indian Government contributed, and others to which they contributed nothing. He would like to know the principle on which the Indian Government made these contributions?

MR. LABOUCHERE congratulated hon. Gentlemen opposite on their skilled criticism of the Estimates. It seemed to him they had reversed the usual order of things with regard to the Estimates, for nearly all of them had absolutely complained that the Estimates were too low. The hon. Baronet the Member for Kingston was in a perfect state of despair because the expenditure at some of the Consulates was lower than the expenditure at others, and he urged that they should level up rather than down. The reason why the Embassy House at St. Petersburg was hired, rather than, as in other cities, purchased or built, was because it was easy to hire a house sufficiently large for our purpose at St. Petersburg, while there was a great difficulty in obtaining houses of the proper kind on hire in other capitals. He hoped the Government would continue to hire the house in St. Petersburg so long as it was possible to do so, rather than build or purchase one.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he had pointed out that the rent for the house at St. Petersburg fluctuated year by year in the most extraordinary manner; and surely, if they had to rent a house there, it would be wise to secure that they should not be at the mercy of the landlord of the house.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, it was more economical to hire the house than to build or buy one. He was unable at present to give the hon. Member for Preston the arrangements under which the Indian Government contributed towards the Consular Houses in China.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £283,923, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1894, for the Customs, Inland Revenue, Post Office, and Post Office Telegraph Buildings in Great Britain, including Furniture, Fuel, and sundry Miscellaneous Services."

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk) said, he was aware that any criticism on the Estimates which came from his side of the House was liable to be received with adverse criticism by hon. Gentlemen opposite and their organs in the Press. But he was willing to take the risk, because he believed that the practice of criticising the Estimates was wholesome and good, and in the interest of good government and administration as well as of the taxpayers. On this Vote for Revenue Buildings a most important principle arose, on which he wished to make a few comments, but not at all of a Party character. His observations would be directed to the question of the framing of the Estimates. In order that the Committee might properly understand the proposals of the Government, it was necessary, in the first place, that the Estimates should be reliable and intelligible. But the present Estimates were not intelligible. He had no doubt that hon. Members, when they took the Paper which had been circulated by the Government in their hands, they imagined that the heading of the Paper really indicated the money they were asked to vote, and the circumstances and particulars of previous Votes. That was far from being the state of affairs in this case. On page 35 of the Estimates, which professed to give particulars of the proposed outlay on different Post Office Buildings, it would be seen that in the first column they had the name of the post office on which the money was to be expended and its location; then the next two columns gave them the Estimate of the costs; then they were told what had been the expenditure of the Vote up to the 31st March last, and then they were told what Vote was required for 1893-4, the balance required to complete the Vote, and, finally, what the Vote was last year. Now, if that were all that was in the Estimates, it would be a clear, and simple, and intelligible statement. There were no details given of the works to be carried out. When these figures were arrived at they had evidently in their minds distinct and individual works, for they actually said £47,709 with regard to the Post Office, and £14,161 with regard to Telegraphs. Therefore, he was afraid all the information that appeared on that Table as to the amount required was illusory and altogether unreliable, and they might just as well have had placed before them the Vote for £1,096,000 without any particulars whatever as to have had the Vote placed before them in the form in which it appeared. In former years there was a column in this Vote which gave the amount of Re-Votes; but that was now omitted. The Secretary to the Treasury explained he omitted it because it might mislead. Therefore he concluded that all the items which might mislead the House in connection with this Vote had been eliminated, and that they might take the Vote as drawn up as clearly and distinctly showing what money was wanted for each and every purpose. On that hypothesis, where opposite different items the word "Re-Vote" appeared, he must assume it meant that on a previous occasion the House voted that sum of money for the particular purpose for which the Vote was required; that the money had not been expended; and that, therefore, the House was asked in the coming year to provide the sum over again. Let him take one of these items and test it. Here was an item that was typical of them all — "South-Western District, New Sorting Office." On that there was a Re-Vote of £9,000. Take the history of this transaction. The cost of the building was estimated in 1891-2 to be £54,000; £15,000 was voted for it, and there was spent in that year only £1,760. In 1892-3 £25,000 was estimated, including a Re-Vote of £13,940. But out of that £25,000 there was only spent £7,510 in the year and £8,490, making a total of £16,000 out of the £25,000 voted. This year it was proposed to ask for £25,000, and there still remained £13,000 to complete that work in the following year, so that they would positively have been asked to vote £78,000 for a building that was only to cost, at the outside, £54,300. That was a system of estimating and charging upon the taxpayers of this country that was eminently and highly unsatisfactory. His right hon. Friend opposite said it was not spent. No; but the cost of the building was £54,000, whereas with Re-Votes the taxpayers had had to provide £78,000. [Sir W. HARCOURT dissented.] It had been explained by the Secretary to the Treasury that these Re-Votes were to replace money voted in a previous year.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Not spent.

MR. FORWOOD: But the money not spent had to be surrendered, and, as far as the taxpayers were concerned, they had had to provide £78,000 instead of £54,000.

SIR W. HARCOURT: That is a fallacy.

MR. FORWOOD: If it was, it was a fallacy deducible from the Estimates and the mode in which they were prepared. The amount of Re-Votes amounted to £50,000 added to the Votes of this year; therefore there was £50,000 short, spent in the last year, if this statement was worth anything. He could not understand how such a statement as that could be approved by the Treasury, or passed by the Controller and Auditor General. If he understood Public Accounts, the system of the Exchequer and Audit Act, and the course of procedure laid down by the Treasury, he gathered, in the first place, that any money voted and not expended became an amount that had to be surrendered to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and was available with the surplus of the year for the reduction of the National Debt. And, secondly, he understood that the Controller and Auditor General, in auditing these accounts, ought to ascertain whether or not the money voted had been expended in the course of the year upon the item for which it was so voted. He noticed the Secretary to the Treasury accepted that position; and, that being so, how was it possible for the Controller and Auditor General to take this statement which professed to give the Vote of the year on a specified building and then at the end deduct a lump sum without saying from which Vote that lump sum was deducted? This matter was not raised for the first time. A former Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Childers, in criticising the Votes, attacked the then Postmaster General. On that occasion he complained of the extraordinary way in which the Estimates were prepared for post offices in and around London. He pointed out that on the proposed Post Office at Finsbury Park the total expenditure was to be £2,500; but £5,000 had already been spent. In the case of another post office, the Estimate for which was £1,000, a sum of £2,000 had already been spent; and for the London Bridge Post Office the original Estimate was for £12,000, and £22,000 had been expended. Another hon. Gentleman, the Member for East Donegal, who was thoroughly acquainted with Public Accounts, said the whole method of preparing the Post Office Estimates was a farce, and that the Post Office officials never paid any attention to the statement of detailed expenditure in the Estimates. These elaborate statements, said the hon. Member, were quite untrustworthy as guides to the manner in which the money granted to the Post Office would be spent. Since that time no change whatever had been made in the manner in which these documents were placed before them, and he thought they were absolutely misleading and completely unintelligible. He could not understand the Controller and Auditor General giving a certificate for such Estimates on such a statement as was then before the House; but perhaps he did so because the aggregate sum mentioned in the Estimate was not exceeded, and he took no notice whatever of the amount spent on individual buildings. If that were so let it be distinctly stated. He pointed to the fact that in a Treasury Minute issued on the 19th February, 1890, on matters analogous to this, allusion was made to the inclination of Departments to find some other object on which to spend money which had not been used for the purpose voted rather than surrender it to the Exchequer; and the Auditor General stated that instead of having been so used such money ought to have gone to increase the Sinking Fund for the reduction of the National Debt, and if any Department had a surplus at its disposal resulting from one Vote for the service of the year, it had no right to spend the saving for any other purpose, not even for effecting a saving in the succeeding year. If there were Re-Votes to the extent of £50,000, clearly £50,000 was not expended last year; but it was either surrendered to the Treasury, or it was spent for other purposes of which Parliament had no knowledge. He was sorry that the First Commissioner of Works had not asked from the Chancellor of the Exchequer enough money for the work of the coming year. He thought it would be admitted that in the great commercial wants of the country the Post Office played a most important part, and that to starve the Post Office was to starve the Revenue and inconvenience the traders and people of the country. He called it starving the Post Office and levying increased cost of charges on the public if, when they once undertook a large work, they did not provide sufficient money to push that work on to completion. If anyone would take the Votes, it would be seen they had on hand works for the Post Office estimated to cost £1,096,000. To put aside £200,000 or £300,000 towards providing works which were going to cost £2,000,000 meant that it would take five years to complete the work. It was really a waste of money to start a work unless they had enough money to push on quickly with it. That sum of £1,096,000 did not include sites which were lying dormant and idle, and which would mean another £1,000,000, so that positively there were £2,000,000 the work for which required to be finished in order to be utilised for the benefit of the Revenue and the public. He thought there was a change required in that system, especially regarding the Post Office. He would take a particular case in his own knowledge. Nearly three years ago a new site for a Post Office was required at Liverpool at a cost of no less than £180,000, and that site was lying idle. The present Post Office had been condemned as unsanitary by the Medical Officer of Health, and as an unfit place for the clerks of the Post Office to reside in. In consequence of that, the late Mr. Raikes was induced to favour the purchase of this large site for the erection of a Post Office; and, therefore, not only had they a site lying idle and a consequent loss of interest on money, but it was positively injurious to the health of the postal officials who have to remain in the old Post Office which had been condemned. What did they find? After three years, on a building which was to cost £180,000 this year, the small sum of £6,000 was asked to go on with the work. The plans had been passed, the contract made, and there was a splendid opportunity for the work to be gone on with. The defence of the First Commissioner of Works in regard to the Science and Art Department building was, that it would be idle to commence a building which would cost £400,000 if they could only have £10,000 or £15,000. What would be his defence in regard to a building which was to cost £180,000, the contract for which had been made, and in regard to which he only proposed to spend £6,000? In Leeds, a new Post Office was commenced in 1890 or 1891, which was to cost £76,000; but so little money had been taken for that undertaking, that at the end of this year there would yet remain 50 per cent. of the work unexecuted, although four years would have elapsed since its commencement. In Sheffield, in 1890, a new Post Office was commenced at a cost of £14,500, and it would have taken four years when the work was completed. In Glasgow, Post Office Buildings which were to cost £30,000 were commenced in 1889, and they would not be completed by March 1894.

SIR W. HARCOURT: That is not our fault.

MR. FORWOOD: He endeavoured, at the opening of his remarks, to show that this was not a Party question. It was the fault of the system on which they proceeded. There was no doubt that hon. Members of that House came to the Postmaster General, or the Secretary to the Treasury, and said that the most important post office that could be built was in the particular Member's constituency; and then it was a very satisfactory thing—especially if it was near an Election—for that hon. Member to go down to his constituents and tell them he had got this new post office from the Tory or the Radical Government, as the case might be. Thus it came about that, instead of having 20 or 30 works on which £200,000 could be spent, and the works completed, they undertook no fewer than 64, and dribbled and frittered away their resources over them. The Post Office was a revenue-producing undertaking, and ought not to be subjected to the exigencies of the Exchequer. They ought to have such financial arrangements come to that, when a post office was really wanted, the work should be commenced and carried through without delay. They should treat this as any public undertaking should be treated. It was capital expenditure, and ought to be spread over a reasonable number of years. If barracks and fortifications could be provided and paid for by the money being spread over a series of years, surely they could spread the payment for the post offices over a period of years, and so insure such necessary works being completed within a reasonable period of time. He disclaimed having brought this matter forward in any way as a personal attack on his right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury or the present Government; but the fault was with all Governments, for it was in the system. The way the Estimates were prepared and laid before them was such as to make them misleading and unintelligible, and he was surprised they were allowed to pass the Public Accounts Committee and Controller and Auditor General. He hoped this matter would receive attention, and that they would not allow these sites to remain waste after having cost such an enormous sum of public money.

SIR W. HARCOURT (who rose a minute or two before midnight) said, the right hon. Gentleman had not left him time to reply. It was no doubt a question of capital expenditure, and as such deserved consideration.

Mr. T. M. Healy rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put"; but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. TOMLINSON called attention to the post office at Preston, where the accommodation was totally inadequate for the requirements of the town.

It being Midnight, the Chairman proceeded to interrupt the Business.

Whereupon Mr. T. M. Healy rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put"; but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

And the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

LABOUR DISPUTES (ARBITRATION)

BILL.—(No. 308.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Mundella.)

MR. GIBSON BOWLES objected.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside) mentioned that there were three other Bills on this subject, and it had been agreed that afterwards they should all be referred to a Committee and be considered together. He hoped, therefore, no objection would be taken to the Bill being now read a second time.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES considered it was extremely doubtful whether the House should pass the Bill at all; but, if they did, it should only be after they had had a full explanation of its objects.

*SIR JOHN LUBBOCK appealed to hon. Members to allow the Second Reading to be taken, and then this, together with the other Bills on the same subject, could go before a Select Committee.

MR. BARTLEY observed that one of the Labour Members had got a Motion down to the effect that the Bill be read that day six months.

MR. MUNDELLA: No, Sir; he has withdrawn it.

MR. BARTLEY: It is on the Paper for to-day, and he spoke to me about it himself; therefore, I must take it that the Labour Members are strongly opposed to it.

MR. MUNDELLA said the notice of objection was put down to secure that the three Bills should go with this Bill to a Select Committee, and on that understanding the objection had been withdrawn.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: Will all the Bills be referred to a Select Committee?

MR. MUNDELLA: Yes.

MR. HANBURY objected to the present stage of the Bill being taken at that hour.

SIR W. HARCOURT pointed out that it had been agreed that all the Bills on this subject should be sent to be considered by a Select Committee. Legislation on this subject was of great importance, and what conceivable argument could there be against the adoption of the course which was suggested? Surely it would not be justifiable to obstruct a measure of this kind.

MR. HANBURY must point out that this was not obstruction. The real obstruction came from the Government themselves, who, having taken the whole time of the House and sacrificed everything to the Home Rule Bill, refused to allow 10 minutes of public time for the discussion of other Bills. It was because they objected to the way the important business of the country was being obstructed by the Government—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! If the Bill is objected to, of course it will have to stand over.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask whether it is not possible to consider the advisability of abrogating the Twelve o'Clock Rule, seeing that hon. Members object to Bills night after night without any regard to what the business is?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am afraid, Sir, we are approaching a point when it will be necessary to consider it.

Second Reading deferred till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES (IRELAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 242.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT objected.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT would ask the hon. Member to allow this Bill to go through. There was a manifest feeling in the House the previous night that the Bill should be allowed to pass, because the English Bill had been helped by Irish Members. He would point out that this Bill was merely to assimilate the law of the two countries, and if they wanted to keep them united they ought to allow them to have the same laws.

MR. MARJORIBANKS said, he would ask the hon. Member to put off the Bill for a few days, as the Irish Office had some Amendments to put down.

Third Reading deferred till Tuesday, 6th June.

MR. BARTLEY said, he would draw attention to the fact that this Bill in its present stage was really opposed by Her Majesty's Government.

MR. T. M. HEALY: No, no!

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 19th May 1893.

The House met at Two of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

PROMOTIONS OF NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, with reference to the promotion of Quartermaster Sergeants and Colour Sergeants, would he consider the possibility of extending the limit imposed by the last paragraph of Article 638 of 1892 from 1st January 1889 to 1st January 1890?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): No, Sir; I am afraid that I cannot hold out any hope of this relaxation.

MAJOR RASCH: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the case of men with over 18 years' service?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: If the hon. and gallant Member will communicate with me I shall be glad to discuss the matter with him.

ALIEN IMMIGRATION.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he has received any Reports from the Commissioners he sent some months ago on an Alien Inquiry to the United States; and if they will justify him in introducing, before the Session is too far advanced, some legislative regulation of indiscriminate alien immigration into Great Britain, having regard to the large number of our fellow-countrymen reported to be out of employment by the Trades Union correspondence with the Board of Trade?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): The Reports are in preparation and are expected next month. It is not possible yet to make any statement as to legislation.

QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY AND THE DEVON ESTATE.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that he has been misinformed as to the circumstances connected with the purchase by the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty of the estate at Newton Abbot now belonging to them; whether he will make inquiries from persons on the spot who know the facts, and are unconnected with the Governors or the Devon Estate, and state the result; whether he is aware that there are no sea views on the estate, that the estate which belonged to the Earl of Devon was announced for sale by auction, that nearly three-fourths of the leaseholders were willing and anxious to purchase the freeholds, that many of them applied to the Earl of Devon's agents as to prices, and were informed that no sale would be made before the auction, that a few days before the date announced for the auction the Earl of Devon privately sold the estate to the Governors behind the backs of the leaseholders, and that three-fourths of them are now willing to buy the freeholds at a fair price from the Governors; and whether, if he finds that the facts stated in this question are substantially correct, he will suggest to the Governors the desirability of ascertaining how many of the leaseholders are still willing to purchase the freeholds at fair prices, and of selling to them if their number is considerable?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): In answering my hon. Friend's question, I must remind him that I have no authority whatever to interfere with the powers that the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty possess of purchasing in the open market estates on the conditions prescribed by the owners thereof, or of subsequently disposing of such estates under their statutory powers. I am under no Departmental responsibility for the action of the Governors, and I have neither the duty nor the right to make suggestions to them. The answer which I gave the other day was that supplied to me by the Governors. I have, in consequence of my hon. Friend's question and of information privately given to me by my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General, asked the Governors for further information. They tell me that it was originally intended to offer for sale the Earl of Devon's Estate at Newton Abbot, on which there were 439 leases and 300 tenants, in 35 lots, so that no individual tenant could have secured his own holding. However, it was subsequently arranged to sell the whole estate in one lot to the Governors, and about 20 leaseholders have applied to the Governors to purchase their holdings. My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General tells me that it is now the fact that a large majority of the leaseholders wish to purchase, and the Governors state that if a memorial from the leaseholder is presented to them it will receive careful consideration.

BONUS PAYMENTS IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. FISHER (Fulham): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will explain on what grounds those Civil Service writers who have been promoted to the permanent ranks of the Civil Service have been refused payment of a part of the bonus to which they appear to be entitled under the Treasury Minute of December, 1886; and whether those writers were in any way notified of the pecuniary loss which they would sustain if they accepted promotion between the dates upon which the instalments of bonus were payable?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): No copyist can receive bonus in respect of a broken period of less than half-a-year's copyists' service immediately preceding his appointing to a permanent post, half-a-year's service being the necessary condition, under the Treasury Minute, for the payment of such bonus. In reply to the second part of the question, I should explain that the Treasury have expressed themselves willing to allow to any copyist appointed to a permanent post the option of waiting for the next accruing bonus before taking up the new appointment.

SEWER GAS AT HAMPSTEAD.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that complaints of an excessive upflow of sewer air at Hampstead have been made before, and since, 1886; that an expert, Mr. Mansergh, advising the Vestry, condemned the system then, and still, in use at Hampstead; whether the recommendations of Mr. Mansergh or other experts were adopted; if not, on what grounds; and whether the Local Government Board will cause an inquiry to be held, and receive evidence on the subject?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): I have been in communication with the Vestry of St. John, Hampstead, and am informed that there have been a few, but only a few, complaints during the last 10 years of the rising of sewer air from the lower to the higher parts of the parish; that Mr. Mansergh, in advising the Vestry, did not condemn the system in use at Hampstead, but, on the contrary, expressed his agreement with it, and recommended its further development. In accordance with this recommendation the Vestry have been increasing the means of ventilating and cleansing the sewers. If it is considered that there is any ground for complaint as regards particular sewers, and I am informed precisely of the facts, I will bring the matter under the attention of the Vestry; but I do not see that there is any sufficient ground for directing a local inquiry as suggested.

RULES OF THE HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

MR. GREENE (Shrewsbury): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Her Majesty's Government will publicly notify that printed drafts of the fresh Orders in Council or Rules of Court now under consideration for regulating the practice and procedure of the High Court of Justice may be obtained by purchase or otherwise, and will specify a reasonable time within which representations and suggestions relating thereto may be made by the Bar Committee, the Incorporated Law Society, Chambers of Commerce, and other societies and bodies appearing to be interested, and will arrange that such representations and suggestions shall be taken into consideration by the authority preparing such Orders and Rules before the same are finally settled and published or laid before Parliament?

MR. ASQUITH: The Government have no power to issue the suggested notification. The recent Report of the Council of Judges was laid on the Table of this House many months ago, and widely published. It was also specially communicated to such of the bodies referred to in the question as were likely to make observations on its contents. The hon. Member is, no doubt, aware that very full discussion by those bodies has taken place, and their views have been communicated to the Statutory Authorities. I am in a position to state that all such communications have been carefully considered; and, as the House is aware, any Rules that may be made have to be laid on the Table 40 days.

MR. GREENE: My question was directed to the Rules of Court now under consideration, and not to those which have already been laid on the Table.

MR. ASQUITH: So far as I am aware, those Rules are only Rules founded on the Report of the Judges.

RAILWAY RATES FOR IRISH BUTTER.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Great Southern and Western Railway Company are charging 4d. per firkin more than last year for single firkins sent from Ennis to Cork and intervening stations; and whether he will make any representation to the Company on the subject?

MR. MUNDELLA: I am still in communication with the Waterford and Limerick and Great Southern and Western Railway Companies with regard to the increase in the rates for butter to which my hon. Friend refers. The rate from Ennis to Cork is a through rate, and the Waterford and Limerick Company admit an increase of 3d. per firkin. We have not succeeded in getting a definite answer; but I will inquire further, and communicate with my hon. Friend later on.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Have the Irish railways accepted the principle that at least the old rates should be reverted to?

MR. MUNDELLA: I cannot say that. There is evidently a conflict between the Companies. The whole matter is now before the Committee, and it had better be left to them to inquire into it.

~~THE~~ BURGLARIES AT SOUTH KENSINGTON.

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any steps have been taken for the protection of the inhabitants of Cornwall Gardens, South Kensington, where many burglaries have recently taken place?

MR. ASQUITH: I am informed by the police that there have recently been two cases of larceny by entering an attic window left open, access to which was obtained through an unoccupied house adjoining. The second of these offences was committed on the 26th of last month, and since then special measures have been taken to prevent crimes of this kind. The police are not aware of any other cases of the kind, and I may point out that for the prevention of this class of crime the police are specially dependent on the vigilance and care exercised by householders themselves.

ROSCOMMON POSTAL SERVICE.

MR. HAYDEN (Roscommon, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what has been the result of the inquiries made regarding the application of the people of the Four Mile House (County Roscommon) district for additional postal accommodation?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): I am glad to be able to say that arrangements are in progress for improving the post in question, so that it shall work six days a week instead of four only. An interval for reply will also be provided for.

THE NORTH SEA LIQUOR TRAFFIC CONVENTION.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can state why the Correspondence relative to the signature of the Protocol of 13th February, 1893, modifying the North Sea Liquor Traffic Convention of 16th November, 1887, was not laid before this House earlier than this present week; why three months were allowed to elapse after the date of the latest document in the Correspondence—namely, 14th February, 1893—before it was presented to Parliament; why this Correspondence was not presented to Parliament before Her Majesty's Government introduced the Bill ordered to be printed on 13th March, 1893, for carrying into effect the Convention to which the Correspondence relates; and whether, in view of the continued refusal of France to join in the Convention, Her Majesty's Government have seen any, and, if so, what, reason to depart from the conclusion expressed by Lord Salisbury, in his Despatch of 2nd July, 1891, that, if no security is obtained with respect to French vessels in the repression of the abuses which it is the object of the Convention to stop, "coopers" in the North Sea would no doubt hoist the French flag?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): The delay in issuing the Correspondence was due to the fact that the printer was occupied with other and more urgent work, especially that connected with the Behring Sea Arbitration. As regards the last paragraph, I have to say that the French interest in the "cooper" trade is comparatively small; but if the result apprehended should take place, it is provided in the Protocol that the Convention can be terminated in one year or three months respectively, instead of in five years and one year.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Do the Government adhere to the conclusions of Lord Salisbury as set forth in the last paragraph of the question?

SIR E. GREY: The object of the Protocol is to guard against the apprehensions expressed by Lord Salisbury, or any which might possibly arise.

ABBEY FIELD, COLCHESTER.

CAPTAIN NAYLOR-LEYLAND (Colchester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will explain on what grounds the Colchester and District Trades and Labour Council were refused permission to hold a demonstration on the Abbey Field at Colchester upon Sunday, 14th May, while the Primitive Methodists were allowed to use the ground for a similar purpose some few weeks since; and is there any good reason why the ground should not be available for all public demonstrations, irrespective of both party and creed, upon those days when it is not required for military purposes?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Abbey Field at Colchester lies between the huts and the permanent barracks, and is the drill ground of the troops. I think that there are very obvious objections to a field so situated being used for demonstrations on political and controversial subjects. The meeting held by the Primitive Methodists was simply a religious service.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION AT SOUTH CLIFF, SCARBOROUGH.

SIR GEORGE SITWELL (Scarborough): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether there is any reasonable hope of telegraphic communication being restored with the South Cliff at Scarborough; and whether, as a period of six months or more has passed since the telegraph office there was closed, he will ascertain who is responsible for the long delay and great inconvenience which have resulted?

MR. A. MORLEY: The Department is prepared to restore the telegraphic communication with the South Cliff, and I regret to say that the Corporation of Scarborough is responsible for the delay to which the hon. Member refers. They seek to compel the Department to extend telegraphic communication to the new office in a way which would be about four times as costly as that which the Department proposes to adopt, and I am not prepared to incur this expense. I trust the hon. Baronet will use his influence with the Corporation to induce them to co-operate with the Department in carrying out work which is needed by the inhabitants.

SIR G. SITWELL: When was the Corporation informed that the Post Office objected to the laying of the wire as they required?

MR. A. MORLEY: I cannot give the exact date. Communications have been passing for some time.

ARTIZANS' DWELLINGS FOR LONDON.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): In the absence of the hon. Member for Wandsworth, I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if his attention has been drawn to the fact that the London County Council have resolved to erect artisans' dwellings and cottages at a cost of £33,250, besides cost of foundations, on the basis of estimates at a net return of 2½ per cent. on part and 2 per cent. on the larger part, excluding the cost of foundations; and whether, this return being less than the money costs the ratepayers to raise, he proposes to make any representation to the London County Council or to take any steps on the subject?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I have no information as to the proposals referred to, and I have no jurisdiction in the matter.

DOMINICA.

SIR HENRY HUSSEY VIVIAN (Swansea, District): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can give the House any further information in regard to the position of affairs in Dominica?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): From a Despatch received yesterday it appears that the state of affairs is less serious than it was, though the island has not as yet entirely quieted down. We hope to hear further by telegram immediately. Mr. Jarvis, Government Officer of the District, and Mr. James, Inspector of Police, have left the island. Mr. Roper, who was altogether unconnected with the previous occurrences, has been appointed Resident Magistrate in the disturbed district. When we have received the further information called for, both in regard to the lamentable occurrences at La Plaine and in regard to the alleged grievances of the people in different parts of the island, we shall further carefully consider what course it may be right to adopt.

THE CASE OF JOHN CARRON.

MR. DANE (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether His Excellency has received a Memorial, signed by representative persons of all creeds and classes in the locality, respecting the sentence of one month's imprisonment without the option of a fine, recently inflicted by the County Monaghan Justices at Cloves upon John Carron, aged 74, for an assault, and praying for its remission; and has such Memorial been considered; and, if so, with what result?

MR. ASQUITH (in the absence of Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne) said: The Memorial in the case referred to has been before the Lord Lieutenant, together with a Report which shows that the assault was of a wanton nature and committed on a quiet, inoffensive man, who was obliged to get another person bound to the peace lately. Having regard to the circumstances of the case, the Lord Lieutenant decided that the law must take its course.

OUTRAGE IN COUNTY WICKLOW.

MR. DANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the house of a farmer named John Conran, at Trocken, County Wicklow, was attacked by armed men early upon Tuesday morning last, and his wife and servant woman both shot dead; whether any arrests have been made; and has Conran himself been afforded protection?

MR. ASQUITH: It is unfortunately the case that the two women referred to were shot dead on the night of the 15th instant. The police cannot find any confirmation of the suggestion that the house was attacked by a body of armed men. They do not consider it advisable in this stage of the case to discuss the matter, a course which might tend to interfere with their investigation.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): May I ask whether this was an agrarian crime, or whether it belongs to the class of outrages specially reported?

MR. ASQUITH: As far as I know, there is nothing whatever to show that it was an agrarian crime.

IRISH LAND ASSESSMENTS.

MR. LOGAN (Leicester, Harborough): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can explain how it is that if owners of land in Ireland are assessed on Griffith's Valuation, the statistical abstracts show that the assessments which in 1862 were close upon £9,000,000 sterling had increased in 1877 to close upon £10,000,000, although Griffiths' Valuation had been completed long before the former year?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I believe that the increase referred to is mainly apparent and not real, being largely due to a change of classification which was made in 1877, by which farmhouses and buildings were transferred from the head of houses to that of land.

DEMURRAGE AT RIO DE JANEIRO.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any reply has yet been received from the Brazilian Government to the representations of Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in the matter of the claims of the owner of the steamship Fulwood for demurrage at Rio de Janeiro ?

SIR E. GREY : Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Rio de Janeiro has made several representations both in writing and verbally to the Brazilian Government; but up to the date of his last Despatch on the subject, March 17, had not received a satisfactory reply. The case continues to occupy his attention.

THE NORTH SEA FISHERIES.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he was aware when, on 13th March, 1893, he introduced the North Sea Fisheries Bill, to carry into effect the Convention of 1887, that the French Chamber had refused to pass a similar law, on the ground that the Convention gave the right to foreign cruisers to search and seize French vessels in time of peace; that it would prevent fishermen from obtaining assistance from other vessels when at sea; that it would lead to different punishments being inflicted for the same offence; that no compensation was provided for vessels wrongfully detained; and that it was unnecessary, inasmuch as each country could prohibit the offences aimed at by municipal regulations; and whether, in view of the fact that the Correspondence disclosing these objections has only been presented to Parliament during the present week, he will give the House time to consider how far these objections are applicable to the case of England before proceeding further with the North Sea Fisheries Bill ?

MR. MUNDELLA : The fact that the French Government has refused to ratify the North Sea Liquor Traffic Convention of 1887 has long been known to everyone interested in the removal of the evils which have prevailed in that traffic, and it was on this account that the late Government entered into a new Convention. The objections cited by the hon. Member would apply equally to the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883, and to the Convention of 1882, which has worked admirably. It is of the utmost importance, for the honour of this country and in the interests of the fishing industry, that the Convention should come into force immediately.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES : Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say he was aware at the time he introduced the Bill of the facts disclosed in the Correspondence, which was for the first time placed in the hands of Members this week ?

MR. MUNDELLA : I thought everybody was aware of the fact that for six years past the Government have been negotiating the ratification of the Convention, and that, for reasons which I need not enter into, the French Government declined, with the result that Lord Salisbury entered into a new Convention which excluded France.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES : But had the right hon. Gentleman seen the Correspondence when he introduced the Bill, although it has only just been issued ?

MR. MUNDELLA : I had not actually seen the Correspondence; but I was aware of the facts, and thought everybody else was.

SIR THOMAS BRADY'S PENSION.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Cork) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any decision has yet been arrived at in reference to the pension of Sir Thomas Brady ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : As I stated yesterday, the Treasury have made a proposal which they hope shortly to be able to communicate to the House.

MR. DANE : Have the Treasury communicated its proposal to Sir Thomas Brady ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : Yes, Sir.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD AUDITORS.

MR. WEIR : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it is a fact that there are now two district auditors in the employment of the Local Government Board who have attained the respective ages of 71 and 66; whether under the provision of the 10th clause of the Order in Council of 15th August, 1890, and the letter of the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, these officers should be compulsorily retired; and who is responsible for these gentlemen continuing in office?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The circumstances are completely set out in the Report of the Comptroller and Auditor General on the Appropriation Accounts for 1891-2 and the Correspondence appended thereto, and no observation from me is called for, especially as the matter has already come before the Public Accounts Committee.

THE LEE-METFORD RIFLE.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether all the Lee-Metford Magazine Rifles, Mark II. pattern now in store, are fitted with the Penn-Deeley patent bolt head?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes, Sir.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): Arising out of that question, may I ask what the Penn-Deeley bolt is?

MR. WEIR (taking a bolt out of his pocket): To satisfy the hon. Gentleman, here it is, Sir.

THE CUSTOMS HOUSE AND PATTERNS.

MR. HOLLAND (Salford, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware that great inconvenience is often caused to British merchants and manufacturers by the detention at the Custom Houses of patterns bearing their names, such patterns having previously been sent to their correspondents abroad, and returned for the execution of orders; and if, in view of the worthlessness of such patterns except for business purposes, and the necessity of their being promptly forwarded, the Regulations under the Merchandise Marks Act can be altered so as to prevent such detention?

MR. MUNDELLA: I have received complaints such as are indicated in the question, and I am most anxious to remove all impediments to the transaction of business. If the hon. Member will bring under my notice a specific case, I will inquire into it, and communicate with the Customs with a view to a practical remedy.

LABOUR IN THE ROYAL PARKS.

MR. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works what steps he has taken to assimilate the conditions of labour as to hours and wages of the employés in the Royal Parks to those of the employés in the parks under the control of the London County Council?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): Although the labourers in the Royal Parks are not paid at the very high level recently adopted by the London Council for the labourers in their parks, yet it appears, as the result of a recent inquiry, that the terms of employment are better than those given by other employers in London of similar labour. The question whether, under these circumstances, we should raise the minimum rate of wages for ordinary labourers to that of the London Council, is one involving many other Departments of the Government, such as the War Office and the Admiralty, and opens a very wide subject of policy. It is now being considered by a Committee of the Government, in accordance with the statement made by the Secretary of State for War on the Motion raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge.

ROAD GRANTS IN SCOTLAND.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate why the grant for roads was not given to County Caithness as to other counties?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR, Clackmannan, &c.): The grant in aid of roads in the Highlands and Islands was not given in reduction of the road rate, but for the express purpose of constructing roads and footpaths within the specially congested districts. It was a condition of all these grants that the money was to be allocated to those districts which from poverty, remoteness, and other causes, most required roads; and the wants of the districts where the access of the children to school was difficult and even dangerous was specially to be kept in mind. I may add that urgent applications have, from time to time, been made to the Scottish Office from the Highlands and Islands for such a grant ; but, until the recent grant was expended, no applications had been received from the County Council of Caithness. I regret that there is no more money available.

THE WASTE OF PUBLIC TIME ON QUESTIONS.

MR. WEIR : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, having regard to the time of the House now taken up in answering questions, an arrangement could be made for the questions to be answered in a printed form, instead of orally, as at present ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) : I am very glad that my hon. Friend has just become alive to the fact that a great deal of time is spent in answering questions. I think it is an evil of which the House has long been conscious; but the remedy that my hon. Friend proposes has been often considered, and I am afraid it would only aggravate the evil, as it would add to waste of time, waste of paper, and waste of print. There is one remedy which I would suggest to the consideration of the House, and that is that if we had a strict rule against subsidiary questions, we might save one-third of the time expended. The putting of these questions is a recent practice, and, as far as I know, there is no authority whatever for it in this House. The practice of hon. Members getting up and saying, "Sir, arising out of that answer," practically trebles the questions on the Paper. This is a matter well deserving the consideration of the House, and I am quite sure that if the House should express an opinion to the effect I have stated, you, Sir, would be glad to enforce it.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) : Would the right hon. Gentleman also consider the advisability of Ministers abstaining from argumentative replies ?

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk) : And of keeping close to the questions put ?

SIR W. HARCOURT : I can only promise for myself.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) : In connection with this matter, I venture to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether you will not again consider the advisability of revising the practice of going through the Question Paper a second time, in order to save the time of the House ; and whether it cannot be ruled that any Member who is not in his place to ask his question when it is called shall forfeit his right for the day ?

MR. SPEAKER : One result of that Rule might be that questions which were passed over one day would be put down on the next day, and so swell the number of questions again.

MR. SNAPE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood) : May I ask whether a remedy would not be found if the questions were edited before they are put on the Paper, and if such as are suitable could be sent direct to the Departments, and answered from the Departments, instead of being brought before the House ?

MR. SPEAKER : That would be a very responsible duty to undertake.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.) : Arising out of all these questions, I should like to ask whether it would not be possible to limit the number of questions asked by any one particular Member ? Some Members only ask one or two questions during the Session, while others ask scores.

MR. SPEAKER : It is quite possible that a Member might have a legitimate curiosity which would necessitate the asking of many questions.

THE BUSINESS AFTER THE RECESS.

MR. W. REDMOND : Is it a fact that the Vote on Account will be taken on the first day after the holidays ?

SIR W. HARCOURT : Yes.

MR. W. REDMOND : Then, as the hon. Member for South Antrim has given notice that he will raise the question of the condition of Clare, I beg to say that I will be there.

MOTION.

PROHIBITED PERSONS (DRINK) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to prohibit the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors to persons of drunken habits."—(Mr. Bill.)

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) : May I ask what is the nature of the Bill ? It seems to have a good object ; but I would suggest that it might be improved by being made to apply to persons of sober habits before they get drunk.

MR. BILL (Staffordshire, Leek): I hope the hon. Baronet will allow the Bill to be printed before he expresses any opinion on it. It is a very small affair. It simply provides that persons who have been convicted a certain number of times within a given period will be under disabilities, and unable to go to a public-house to buy drink. It will be for the House, when it has the Bill in print, to say whether, as I think it will, it commands universal satisfaction.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered to be brought in by Mr. Bill, Captain Bowles, and Mr. Hanbury.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 372.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

NORTH SEA FISHERIES BILL.

(No. 259.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 10th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3.

Question proposed, "That Clause 3 stand part of the Bill."

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he objected to this and to every other clause in the Bill, because the provisions could only be enforced by adopting in times of peace methods that ought only to be resorted to in times of war—namely, search and seizure. Under this Bill foreign cruisers would be enabled to search a British vessel, examine her papers, and if the commander of the vessel were not satisfied with them to seize her, and take her into port. This was a most dangerous power to give. He had no objection to the enactment of laws against the exit from our ports of vessels likely to be engaged in this noxious and harmful traffic; but he did object to giving this power to foreign vessels over English vessels. A certain amount of spirituous liquor was necessary at times for sailors, and what they ought to provide against was the abuse of it. The Bill had been introduced into that House under circumstances which were extremely discreditable to Her Majesty's Government, who had tried to smuggle it through the House after 12 o'clock without giving the slightest information as to its object. The French Government had refused to accept it on good and substantial grounds. Her Majesty's Government had been in possession of the Correspondence that had taken place with regard to the Convention for the last three months, and yet it was only when they had succeeded in smuggling the Bill through its Second Reading that they had condescended to lay that Correspondence upon the Table of the House. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had told them he knew nothing of the Correspondence when he introduced the Bill.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): Oh, no! What I said was that I had not the full Correspondence before me in printed form; but I knew its purport was indeed generally known.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he had not understood that; but he would, of course, accept the statement. Still, he thought they had good cause for complaint, inasmuch as endeavours had been made to push forward the Bill after 12 o'clock when there could be no discussion. The French Government had refused to ratify the Convention on grounds which were extremely valid. Lord Salisbury was of opinion—as he himself was—that if France stood out the traffic would not be stopped, but would be carried on under the French flag.

THE CHAIRMAN: This more properly arises on Clause 1. Clause 3 simply creates penalties for infringements of the Act, and has nothing to do with policy.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES admitted that, but thought he should have some latitude in view of the attempts to smuggle the Bill through without discussion. He held that the Government ought to move that Progress should be reported, in order to give hon. Members an opportunity of reading the important Correspondence just issued before they were called upon to consider this most silly and mischievous Bill in Committee.

MR. MUNDELLA : I could not have believed that any hon. Member in this House would have delivered such a speech as that to which we have just listened. As has been pointed out, by Clause 1 the House has confirmed the Convention, and by Clause 2 has imposed penalties for exchanging or selling spirits. The other clauses are subsidiary. The circumstances of the Bill are simple. In 1886, after the greatest evils had prevailed in the North Sea Fishery, a Convention, including France, was entered into for the purpose of putting down the abominable system of "cooperage." That Convention was confirmed in 1887, and an Act was passed, promoted by my Predecessor, of which the present Bill is an exact copy, with the exception that it leaves out France, who, for reasons set forth in the Correspondence, practically because we are in Egypt, decline to join us in the Convention.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES : I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. France objected to the Convention on the ground that this was an attempt on the part of England to dominate the North Sea.

MR. MUNDELLA : Exactly. But France has agreed to a similar Convention, which is now actually in force, and the Convention of 1886 extends over exactly the same area as this. When I came back to the Board of Trade last year, I found that Lord Salisbury had agreed to set up a separate Convention leaving out France ; and as a result a Convention was entered into, and it required a new enactment, giving France the option of coming into the Convention. What was said by France herself on this subject ? A French Commission sat upon it, and reported that the trade in alcohol had been carried on by persons devoid of any sense of morality on board vessels flying the German flag ; that shameful advantage was taken of all the vices of fishermen, who were detained by prostitutes, and when their reason had been destroyed by intoxication the men were stripped and robbed. There were most scandalous orgies, succeeded often by scenes of robbery and murder. A more terrible statement has never been placed on paper.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) : The same thing goes on among English sailors.

Mr. Gibson Bowles

MR. MUNDELLA : Yes ; under the influence of this system of floating brothels. This Bill is intended to put down these evils ; and, in the face of what promises to be sheer obstruction, I say that no Bill ever had such claims upon this House, and that in the interests of our fishermen, and by reason of our pledges to other Governments, we are bound to place this enactment on our Statute Book as soon as possible.

*MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, there appeared to be a great deal of misconception in regard to the Bill. The International Convention of 1887, to devise means to suppress the floating grog-shops in the North Seas, was the result of negotiations between the British Foreign Office and the Maritime Powers of Europe. His right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham was the first to induce the Foreign Office to take up the question, and Lord Salisbury took steps to have the Convention assembled owing to the representations made by Sir Edward Birkbeck—a name that would be always held in respect by fishermen—and himself in 1887. That Convention was signed by all the Plenipotentiaries, and a Bill, ratifying that Convention, was passed by the House in five minutes in 1888. France alone refused to pass the necessary legislation ; hence the new Convention in February last, which all the other Powers had signed and ratified, and which the Committee were now asked to ratify by passing the Bill before it. Therefore, France would now either have to come into the arrangement, or bear the responsibility of the "floating hells" carrying on their illegal traffic under her flag—a traffic the consequences of which to the moral and commercial welfare of the fishermen few hon. Members could fully realise. As to Clause 3 under discussion, it was entirely subsidiary to Clauses 1 and 2, which had been passed. His hon. Friend opposite objected to Clause 3. But they could not amend the Bill. They must now either take the Bill as it was, or nullify the proceedings of the Convention of February last. The House of Commons, in 1888, passed an Act ratifying the previous Convention, and Clause 3 of the present Bill was word for word in exactly the same terms as Clause 3 of the Act of 1888.

England was the first to ask the Maritime Powers to enter into an engagement to deal with the evils complained of, and it was a matter of honour that we should do what was necessary on our part to carry it out. England, of all the Powers who had signed the first Convention, had not yet ratified the second Convention, and she was bound in honour to ratify it. It was believed, too, that France would come in as soon as the other Powers had ratified the Convention. That France thought it was necessary something should be done to protect the fishermen was proved by the fact that a Commission appointed by the French Government in 1889 to inquire into the subject fully recognised the evils of the existing system, and agreed that it was necessary something should be done to abolish it. He would read an extract from the Report of the Commission—

"After an inquiry ordered by the Government of Great Britain, the Commissioner charged with the Mission declared that the presence of 'floating grog-shops' at the fishing grounds constituted a permanent source of disorder among the fishermen, and that the most detestable evils ran riot in these establishments; theft, abuse of confidence, threats, violence, brigandage, obscenity and fraud; drunkenness, pushed to its most extreme limits, produced as a necessary consequence outbreaks and indiscipline among the crews. To satisfy their passions the fishermen spent not only the resources destined for the maintenance of themselves and their families, but bartered away for beer and bad liquor the fish and fishing gear belonging to their masters. The Commissioner added that violent deaths had resulted from the scenes which took place on board this new kind of public-house."

The statement that the men often bartered away the fish in order to obtain drink on board these floating grog-shops was perfectly true. Two skippers were brought before him, as Chairman of Quarter Sessions, for bartering away their employers' fish, and he was sorry to say he had to sentence them to hard labour. They had been respectable men, and were reduced to that condition by the evil influences of these grog-shops. If the Committee desired to keep up the morality of the fishermen, and earn the gratitude of the fishermen, and especially the gratitude of the wives of the fishermen, they would pass the Bill at once.

MR. HANBURY said, there were two distinct parts in the Bill. They were all agreed as to the terrible effects of the spirit traffic in connection with the North Sea Fisheries, and that those evils should be stopped, or mitigated, if possible. But hon. Gentlemen should not try to rush through the Bill on pleas of that kind. It was not because a Bill was well-intentioned that it would be an effective Bill. He confessed he should like to have the present discussion postponed till a later clause of the Bill, because Clause 3, which they were discussing, limited the effect of the measure solely to British sailors. He thought the House should do everything it could to limit the traffic as far as British sailors were concerned. He was sorry to say that it was the conduct of British sailors mainly that had led to such legislation; and in the face of the extreme objection which France had taken to any Convention of the kind he thought the Bill should apply to British seamen alone, both in respect to selling intoxicating liquors and purchasing them from other ships. Therefore he had no objection to Clause 3, but he thought it was useless to go further, and pass a Bill which would be inoperative. The Bill was not limited to grog-shops alone. It might fall heavily on innocent British sailors. It did not apply only to fishermen who wanted spirits, but it might be applied to fishermen who, after a storm, wanted fresh rigging or an anchor. Another great objection to the Bill was that France did not come into the arrangement. It was all very well to say that a similar Bill was passed by the late Government; but things had altered very much since then. France was then a party to the arrangement. France refused to ratify the Convention now. The fact that France would be a party to the arrangement made the arrangement inoperative. Let them do everything, so far as they could, to legislate for British sailors; but it was idle to go further and pass an Act which would be inoperative, and which would possibly make them a laughing-stock. The mere fact that France refused to join in the Convention made it possible for the traffic to be carried on in the future just as in the past.

MR. MUNDELLA: No, no!

MR. HANBURY said, he did not see how the traffic could be prevented under the circumstances. At all events, the operation of the Bill should be confined to our own sailors or fishermen, with whom alone we had power to deal.

Mr. Mundella rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question, "That the Question be now put," put, and agreed to.

Question, "That Clause 3 stand part of the Bill," put accordingly, and agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

Clause 5.

Question proposed, "That Clause 5 stand part of the Bill."

MR. HANBURY said, he would like to hear some explanation from the President of the Board of Trade on the points he had raised. He would like to know whether the Government had taken into serious consideration the objections which the French Government had offered to the Convention? An attempt had been made to pass the Bill without discussion after 12 o'clock, before some Members of the Government and Members generally knew anything of the serious objections raised to the Convention by France. Their action in objecting to the Bill being passed after 12 o'clock was, therefore, justified. He did not think the Bill should be discussed at any length that day; but he thought they should have some statement from the Government as to whether they had really satisfied themselves that in legislating without the concurrence of France we were not leaving out a very important factor in the problem; and whether, by passing this Bill, we should be able to stop this abominable traffic if it were possible for French vessels to carry it as heretofore? He believed the Act would prevent British people from indulging in the traffic, but did not think much good would follow, as France would still be free to carry it on.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would explain, by reference to the Correspondence, in what way he had come across the information that France was opposing the Convention in connection with some question of her claims in Egypt.

MR. MUNDELLA: My reference to that subject was based upon the statement in the Correspondence that France had complained that the English were dominating the seas, and that we had not been sufficiently considerate to her in dealing with the Egyptian Question. I may add, in reply to the hon. Member for Preston, that France has always been an innocent party in this matter, because she has never supplied bad spirits to the fishermen. It is chiefly Belgians, Scandinavians, and sometimes Germans, who supply these vile and injurious spirits. France is alive to this great evil, and I hope, by-and-bye, France will come to a better understanding and join us. It was not the French Government that objected to the Convention. They did their best to get it carried, but the obstruction to this legislation came from the Members of the Committee of the French Chamber. This clause is simply a repetition of a corresponding clause in the previous Act. The House has already passed the enacting clauses, and, really, as there is nothing left to discuss, I hope we will go through with the Bill.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said, he agreed that very little time ought to be consumed in discussing the Bill; but he was bound to say that, in his experience, he had never known tactics less calculated to advance the end in view than the tactics of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman had charged those who had brought forward Amendments to the Bill with obstruction.

MR. MUNDELLA: No; it was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby.

*MR. JAMES LOWTHER said, that the right hon. Gentleman, instead of narrowing the range of discussion, had introduced a subject which, if followed up, might have led to an interesting Debate on Egypt and the foreign policy of this country. It was an extraordinary thing to find a Minister, who was in charge of a Fishery Convention Bill, going beyond the province of the Bill, and charging a Committee of the French Chamber, which represented every section of the Chamber, with obstructive tactics. He did not wish to be drawn into a discussion on the Constitutional arrangements of the French Chamber, or on the foreign policy of this country; but no thanks were due to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill that such topics did not now make a large demand on the time of the Committee. With respect to the action of France, he was afraid the right hon. Gentleman, from his observations, was scarcely a Minister calculated to approach France on this subject with the necessary conciliatory spirit; but he wished to know whether any steps had been taken by the Government to obtain from the Government of France some assurance that, while standing outside the Convention, they would, as a matter of French Municipal Law, endeavour on their part to put down what was universally admitted to be a grave scandal and reproach? If the Government had taken steps to obtain from the French Government some expression that they would assist to abolish this infamous traffic, it would have been far more satisfactory to the Committee than for the Minister in charge of the Bill to indulge in vain denunciations and strictures upon the Committee of the French Chamber.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, one little fact had escaped the notice of the President of the Board of Trade. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that there was no danger of French vessels engaging in the liquor traffic in the North Seas. Perhaps that was because the French had not hitherto engaged in the fishing. The fishermen were mostly Englishmen, Dutchmen, and some Norwegians. But it was stated in the Correspondence that the French people, and especially the inhabitants of Boulogne, were now beginning to fit out vessels for the North Sea Fisheries; and as the French would be the only persons allowed to engage in this traffic in the future they would be very much tempted to engage in the traffic on a large scale. He would also call the attention of the Committee to the fact that when the former Act was passed, in 1888, France had taken part in the Convention. But the situation was now entirely changed. France had taken no part in the present Convention, but not because, as the right hon. Gentleman had indiscreetly stated, she was jealous of our position in Egypt. There was no mention of Egypt in the Correspondence. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby had quoted from the Correspondence of 1891, but he ought to have also quoted from the Correspondence of 1892. In the French Correspondence he found it stated—"England has tried to usurp the dominion of the seas."

MR. MUNDELLA; Hear, hear!

MR. GIBSON BOWLES maintained that England had usurped nothing. What England sought to retain was her own dominion over the seas; but France stated that we had usurped the dominion of the seas, and had refused to join in the Convention in order to prevent English cruisers roaming about as the police of the seas. His objection to the Bill was that it would give power to any vessel of the five nations in the Convention to overhaul any merchant ship whatever in the North Seas.

Captain Norton rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put"; but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES repeated that his objection to the Bill was that under it any English merchant ship going to the North Seas was liable to be seized by a naval officer of any of those five nations, and its papers searched and overhauled, and the vessel seized and taken into port. He denied the imputation that had been made broadcast upon our fishermen—that they were drunkards, and that they desired to be protected by foreign cruisers. He knew them well; he had sailed for many years with them, and he undertook to say that there were no honester men in the country, and that a larger number of them were temperance men than of any other class.

MR. SNAPE (Lancashire, S. E., Heywood): I rise to Order, Mr. Mellor. I desire to ask, are the observations of the hon. Member in Order on this clause?

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think the hon. Member is out of Order.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, the Bill would place the English fishermen, who, as he had said, were a temperate body of men, under the dominion of foreign cruisers. They occasionally required an anchor, or cable, or something of the kind after a storm; but the effect of this Convention would be that vessels would be indisposed to supply them with any of these things for fear of falling under the suspicion of being engaged in the "coopering trade." He contended that the Convention was unnecessary. The English fishermen were not drunkards, and did not need this legislation. Foreign cruisers, he contended, should not have the right to capture English vessels in the North Sea.

Mr. Mundella rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put"; but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

Mr. HENEAGE said, hon. Members had asked how were we to hope that France would come in? He would give them the answer in the words of the Commission to which the investigation of this question was deputed. On page 21 it was stated—

"The results of our not adhering to the Convention must be considered. It would none the less exist among the five other signatory Powers, who have decided to forbid absolutely the liquor traffic among the fishermen of their respective nations. What would be the consequence? Being hampered in their contraband trade, the floating grog-shops would not hesitate to fly the French flag under the pretext that France had not adhered to the Convention, and that, consequently, her flag would be protected against the pursuit of cruisers. Is it our interest to displease the neighbouring Powers by not lending them our moral and effective support in this work of improvement? Should we be right in sheltering under our honoured flag an immoral, shameful, and disgusting trade?"

With reference to the suggestion that English vessels would be put at the mercy of foreign cruisers, he pointed out that the moment a cruiser discovered a floating grog-shop its duty would be to call in the cruiser of the nation to which the vessel belonged, and ask them to take care of the case.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) said that, as one who had more fishermen in his constituency probably than any other hon. Member, with the exception of the right hon. Member for Great Grimsby and the hon. Member for Lynn, he hoped hon. Gentlemen on that side would not impede that clause, but would allow the Bill to pass. It was perfectly true, as the hon. Member for Preston had said, that they had not been allowed to discuss the Bill; but the Government had not allowed them to discuss anything except the Irish Home Rule Bill, and when they discussed that they were closed. However, on the principle that half a loaf was better than no bread, he hoped the Bill would be allowed to pass.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6.

Mr. HANBURY said, that the ground France took for not joining the Convention was that five other important nations refused to join. Were the Government, in order to make this Bill effective if passed into law, prepared to negotiate with Norway and Russia with the view to joining in a fresh Convention, for France, Russia, and Norway were all concerned in these fisheries, and had had no share in this Convention?

Mr. MUNDELLA stated that the Norwegian boats did not remain at the fishing ground, but simply ran out and home again, whilst Russian boats did not fish in this part of the North Sea. The discussion on the Bill had already occupied more than three times the amount of time his right hon. Friend (Mr. Marjoribanks) had placed at his disposal, and he felt that he must carry out his engagement. Not a single Amendment had been put on the Paper in reference to any clause, and unless the Bill was at once passed through he should move to report Progress.

Mr. HANBURY would tell the right hon. Gentleman that it was his own conduct of this Bill which had led to the opposition. If the right hon. Gentleman had not been constantly bringing charges of obstruction against the Opposition and against the French Government, who questioned his proceedings, and had done what he had done that day—namely, put down the Bill in Government time at an earlier period, very little objection would have been raised. He did not think it right this clause should be claimed to be taken now because they had not put down Amendments. The reason they had not put down Amendments was because they wanted the Bill to go through. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would adopt his suggestion, and enter into negotiations with Norway and Russia.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL expressed the hope that the Government would recognise the importance of applying to those Powers that had not joined the Convention for support, as a vessel could, by hoisting the flag of one of these Powers, prevent search by a cruiser.

MR. MUNDELLA replied that if they found a vessel hoisted the flag of one of these Powers in order to sell grog they should feel it their duty to approach the Government of that Power on the subject. He expressed the opinion that the French people had not done anything in this direction—they had been perfectly innocent of such proceedings.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that very serious International considerations, and also the interests of the fishermen themselves, had made him feel it to be his duty to make a few remarks on the Bill. They did not wish to obstruct it, and never had justified any charge of obstruction, and they were now disposed to let the right hon. Gentleman have his Bill if he would behave nicely to them in future, and take what steps he could to avoid what might become an abusive practice of search, seizure, and capture of English vessels by foreign enemies.

MR. HENEAGE said, in reply to the hon. Member, he might point out that the Report from which he had already quoted stated that—

“The Convention of the 6th of May, 1882, relative to the police of the fisheries in the North Sea was signed by the same Powers. Its object was much more important than that of the Liquor Traffic Convention, without presenting greater features of interest for our country. We accepted it, but it has not given rise to any incident concerning us. There is still less reason to fear the present stipulations, which, while protecting the morality and sobriety of the fishermen, will prove to be absolutely inoffensive.”

Clause agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

Bill reported, without Amendment.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the House to consent to the Bill being read a third time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read the third time.”—(Mr. Mundella.)

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, they had allowed the Bill to pass through Committee in spite of grave doubts; and he hoped, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman would allow the Third Reading to stand over. They had shown by their conduct that they were not disposed to do anything but what was generous; and, for his part, he should very much like time to enable him to communicate with his fishing constituents as to the Bill.

MR. HENEAGE hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press his objection, because, at the present moment, all the fleets were in the North Sea, and it was therefore important that the provisions of the Bill should be put into force at once.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS, 1893-4.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS I.

1. £283,923, to complete the sum for Revenue Department Buildings, Great Britain.

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk) said, the previous evening he ventured to put to the Secretary to the Treasury one or two questions, to one only of which he had up to the present received an answer. He at once said that the question which was answered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was replied to in the most satisfactory manner. The right hon. Gentleman undertook to consider the suggestion that, instead of charging the cost of Post Office buildings on the Votes for the year, it should be spread over a number of years, the same as was done with the expenditure for barracks and fortifications. But there were two other points to which he had not yet received a reply. One was as to the form of the Estimates, and the other was as to Re-Votes. The right hon. Gentleman told him that the items opposite which “Re-Votes” were marked indicated sums of money voted in the previous year, but which had not been spent, and which, therefore, had to be re-voted this year. These Re-Votes amounted, in the case of the Post Office, to no less than £46,000, and on Customs and Inland Revenue buildings to £5,500, making a total of £51,500 apparently at the disposal of the First Commissioner of Works on these items. That amount, if this Estimate was accurate, must have been either surrendered or spent. Clearly it had not been surrendered, because from the Return with which he had been favoured by the First Commissioner of Works he found that the total sum at his disposal for 1892-3 for Revenue Department buildings was £237,000, of which he expended no less than £231,000. Either, therefore, the Return must be erroneous, or he had spent for works not indicated in the Estimates of last year over £50,000. He should like to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether, in the expenditure of money not required for one item, he could apply it to another without Treasury control? He knew that in other Departments the Treasury had to be consulted before money saved from one item could be expended on another. That Treasury control very often led to great delay and inconvenience, and his experience was that such control was not of advantage to the Service. Another question in reference to the Treasury control was this: Did that control extend to the stoppage of the commencement of any work in the financial year until the whole Vote had been passed by that House? because, if it did, the summer season, which was best for building purposes, was often lost, and the work not commenced till the autumn, so that the amount of money which the First Commissioner might have expected was not expended.

*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central) said, the right hon. Gentleman had yesterday made an attack on his Department, although that attack in reality was more on the Colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman than it was on him (Mr. Shaw Lefevre). He thought the right hon. Gentleman, before making his observations, should have consulted his Colleagues who sat beside him, for they would have removed some of the misconceptions into which he had fallen. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Treasury had starved the Post Office Vote; that great delays took place in the completion of these works after they had been agreed upon; that the money which had been voted and not been expended on these works had been surrendered to the Treasury, and that the Votes, as presented, were entirely misleading. To the first of these charges—namely, that the Treasury starved the Post Office Vote, he had no complaint to make of the Treasury, and he did not think there was any ground for the suggestion that had been made under the late Government. There was equally no ground for the other complaints made by the right hon. Gentleman. The facts of the case were shortly these: The Department had under construction at the present moment no fewer than 64 Post Offices in different parts of the Kingdom. These works were at different stages of progress. At the commencement of every financial year the Office of Works made out an estimate of what could be spent upon each of these works, and that estimate formed the basis of the aggregate Estimate laid before the Treasury, and finally before Parliament. Experience had shown that in the course of the year where so many works were undertaken, accidents and unexpected events occurred which prevented the full expenditure taking place on some of these works. In other cases disputes occurred with the contractors, or strikes took place, or questions arose regarding light and air, and the result was that in a certain number of these works delays occurred, and it was found impossible to expend in the financial year all that was expected at the commencement of it. In order to meet these cases and prevent the voting of unnecessary money for any financial year, the practice had been for the Treasury to make a reduction on the aggregate Vote of about one-fourth from the aggregate Estimate. In other words, when the total amount was to be added up, the Treasury had been in the habit of making a reduction of one-fourth, which in practice had been proved to be exactly the amount to deduct from the aggregate Vote. He had before him a statement showing the actual Vote in each of the four or five years, and the actual expenditure, and it was very curious how nearly the two coincided. In 1889-90 the aggregate Vote for the Revenue Department buildings was £125,900; and the actual amount expended £126,800, a difference of less than £1,000. In the year 1890-91, the amount voted was £215,000, and the amount expended £213,600, a difference of only £1,400. In 1891-92 the amount voted was £214,000, and the amount expended £227,000, an excess of £13,000, which had to be met by a Supplemental Vote. In 1892-93, the amount voted was £237,000, and the amount expended £231,000, showing an expenditure of within £5,000 or £6,000 of the aggregate Vote. He thought that entirely disposed of the complaint of the right hon. Gentleman. He quite agreed that when once they began a work they should push on with it.

MR. FORWOOD asked, what about the Re-Votes, amounting to £50,000?

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he had explained that from the aggregate Vote there was deducted by the Treasury one-fourth. In the course of the year, from accidents of various kinds, it was impossible to spend the whole of the sums anticipated in respect of particular post offices, and a Re-Vote was necessary. It was not a Re-Vote of the aggregate amount, but in respect of that particular item. The Treasury sanction was obtained for the transfer from one item to another without difficulty, and no inconvenience was found in practice to that expenditure. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that his experience at the Admiralty must be very different to his, because he had found no difficulty whatever in getting the Treasury to facilitate arrangements of that kind. As he had said, he quite agreed that when once a Post Office was begun the true policy was to complete it as quickly as possible; that was a policy he had always endeavoured to carry out, and he had found no difficulty in the Treasury voting the necessary sums of money to carry out that policy. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that the Return which had been presented showed that the average length of time for the erection of a post office was five years. He had been misled in that respect by the inclusion in the Return of many post offices, of which the total cost was very large; but where a few hundreds only were to be spent in completing them during the current year.

MR. FORWOOD: That is not what I said. What I said was that the amount of money asked for this year, compared with the total expenditure of £1,096,000, showed that it would take five years to complete the works.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: That is precisely what I said. The right hon. Gentleman had been misled by figures which he had not studied. Included in that Return were many post offices which were just on the point of completion, and on which a very small amount would be expended within the year. If they deducted these cases, instead of the average time for the erection of a post office being five years, it would be found to be less than three, which, having regard to the magnitude of the works, was not excessive. The Department was doing its utmost to complete the works when once they were begun, and it would fully recognise that no economy was so bad as to delay works when once commenced. He now came to the Liverpool Post Office, a subject in which the right hon. Gentleman was naturally so much interested. It was a fact that two or three years ago a very large sum of money was voted by the late Government for the purpose of purchasing a site for the Liverpool Post Office. Apparently, it was not anticipated that last year it would be possible to spend any sum to commence building; but in the course of the year it became possible to do so. Tenders were invited for commencing the foundations; the lowest was accepted, and if things had gone on as was expected it would have been possible during the last year to have expended a considerable sum of money upon them. But, unfortunately, as sometimes happened, a dispute arose with the contractor as to the terms of the contract and the conditions imposed upon him under the tender, which led to delay, and only that day they had been apprised by their solicitor that they were justified in treating the contract as at an end, and in accepting the next tender. The result had been that during the last year they had been unable to expend any money on the Liverpool Post Office; but they hoped to be able to do so at once. The work of preparing the foundations in a building of that magnitude was very great, and it was not, therefore, likely that any money would be spent on the building itself during the present year; but the work would be pushed on with the utmost expedition. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that there was much to be said in favour of treating these Post Office buildings as a matter of capital expenditure, instead of voting the money every year, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had undertaken to consider the matter.

MR. FORWOOD said, he understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that his Department submitted to the Treasury the sum of money which they had anticipated they could expend in the coming financial year over each of the different buildings; that the Treasury had a better knowledge of these matters than the expert officers of the Commissioner of Works, and struck off one-fourth from the total, and, as a matter of fact, that after such revision the total left really represented the amount of work that could be done in the course of the year, thus showing the Treasury could make a better estimate than the Office of Works. If it was the fact that the Treasury were better able to estimate the amount of money that could be expended on post offices than the First Commissioner of Works, he would strongly urge that when that right hon. Gentleman put down the amount required for the year opposite each and every work, instead of putting it at the larger sum of £15,000 or £20,000, as the case might be, he should take 25 per cent. off each of these works, and then they should see the amount which, in the judgment of the Treasury, could be expended on the work, and they would thus get rid of that misleading item of Re-Vote. It was not really a Re-Vote, as the right hon. Gentleman admitted, and it was, therefore, misleading to represent it as such. He submitted that he was justified in raising this question, as the Estimates themselves were misleading, and led the House to believe that a large sum of money voted last year had not been spent, when the real fact was that the money had not been voted. He believed that if the First Commissioner of Works had had more money he would have been enabled to complete a greater number of Post Office buildings, and so do the work more efficiently than was done by starving the work from considerations of the Treasury.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE could assure the right hon. Gentleman he was entirely mistaken if he thought there had been any starving of this Vote. There were 64 works in hand. The Office of Works at the commencement of the year brought an Estimate in respect of each of them, and the aggregate amount went to the Treasury. The Treasury, with the full assent of the Office of Works, guided by experience of the past, knocked off one-fourth of the whole amount, which the results showed exactly led to the requirements of the year. It would not be advisable to follow the course suggested by the right hon. Gentleman, and knock off 25 per cent. from these works. There was no difficulty in getting the consent of the Treasury to transfer the Vote from one item to another, as the requirements necessitated; the whole arrangement was a convenient one, and in the aggregate the work was done as anticipated.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) attributed the delay of completing the works in hand and the insufficiency of money for the post offices to the system which compelled the Post Office to satisfy the Treasury as to the requirements in particular places. Naturally the Treasury would not look beyond the immediate present, and they allowed post offices to be designed and built which satisfied the wants of the place at the particular time, but which took no regard whatever for the expansion of the town and the consequent necessity for an increase of accommodation. His own borough of Preston was an instance of this. They had there a post office which was built, he supposed, 40 years ago, when the town was only about half the size it was at the present time. The town had gone on increasing; telegraphs and parcel post had been added, so that additional post office accommodation was urgently needed. Years ago this matter was brought under the notice of Mr. Raikes, who considered various schemes. It happened that the Post Office at Preston was in one of the leading thoroughfares, so that there was no room to enlarge it, and, therefore, what the authorities had to contemplate was the providing of a new site and the building of new buildings. It appeared to him that the system of passing the Estimates for Post Office buildings from the Post Office to the Treasury, and from the Treasury to the Board of Works, entailed an enormous amount of delay and unnecessary work. The condition of the post office at Preston was that about 20 men were working in a place which was not fit for more than 10 at the outside. The conditions under which the officials had to carry on their business was conducive neither to health nor the efficient discharge of duties. He did not want to travel beyond this Vote, but he would like to point to the fact that they had this curious matter connected with the Post Office, that while the buildings and works came on on this particular Vote the acquisition of sites came on in another Vote, and before they began to build they must of course acquire the site. He should like to know at what point the jurisdiction of the First Commissioner came in in reference to the acquisition of the site? It appeared to him that the public interests were not well served by the intervention of that officer when he did come in. The Post Office was really a Commercial Department, which ought to be conducted on commercial lines, and those who were responsible for its management, when they decided that further accommodation was required in a particular place, should not be hampered by having to go to another Department. He should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman could make any statement about the present position of the Preston Post Office, or state what steps it was intended to take towards providing the increased accommodation which was so urgently needed in that town.

*SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University) said, that the right hon. Member for the Ormskirk Division of Liverpool had made an interesting and practical speech, which resolved itself very much into a question of the advisability of Treasury control. As one who had been for many years on the Public Accounts Committee—for some time Chairman—he could bear his testimony that, although the Treasury made mistakes occasionally, like other Departments, yet its control was advantageously exercised, and conducted very much to the economy of the finances of the country. His hon. Friend spoke of the Post Office and Treasury as being two separate concerns, but he rather looked upon them as two Departments of one business carrying on the affairs of the nation. The right hon. Member for Ormskirk questioned very much the present form of keeping accounts, because he said—if he understood him correctly—that the Controller and Auditor General found it practically impossible to give his certificate under the present system.

MR. FORWOOD: My remarks had reference to one special form of Estimate placed before the House which is totally different to the form of Estimate placed before the House by all other Departments, and on that form of Estimate I said that the Controller and Auditor General could not give his certificate with any degree of accuracy. This points out certain expenditure to be allocated to certain buildings; but that expenditure, although set out on the Estimate, is varied by a lump sum deducted in the aggregate.

*SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, with all due deference, he thought there would be no difficulty in giving the certificate under the form of Estimate they now had. Of course, whether it was a desirable form or not was another question. As far as his experience went, he did not anticipate any difficulty on the part of the Controller and Auditor General in giving his certificate under the present form of Estimate. His right hon. Friend suggested they should get out of the difficulty alluded to by using the power of the Treasury to grant transfers from one sub-head to another. That was a useful provision in keeping the national accounts, and was exercised by the Treasury with great judgment. No doubt there was some convenience in allowing money to be transferred from one Vote to another, and, though it would be a mistake to put any great restrictions on the practice, there were objections to it, and it was not desirable that it should be resorted to oftener than could be avoided. He had been under the impression that £180,000 was the total cost of the Liverpool Post Office, but it now appeared that that amount did not include the cost of the site; and to that extent the statement in the Estimates was misleading. In order to have all the facts before them the purchase of sites should be included in the Return. In the case of Landport Post Office nothing was to be spent this year, although there had been an original and a revised Estimate of £6,700, and if there were no idea of spending anything he did not see why it was introduced at all. Great loss in interest was involved in undertaking so many works and expending so little upon them. To acquire sites and to do nothing with them for a long time made a very serious addition to the cost of the buildings. He understood that the First Commissioner was willing to expedite building operations as much as possible, with a view to minimising this source of loss, and, therefore, he did not think it necessary to pursue the subject further. Some of the suggestions of the right hon. Member for Ormskirk would rather complicate our accounts, and the right hon. Gentleman hardly did justice to the valuable supervision exercised by the Treasury.

MR. BARROW (Southwark, Bermondsey) was understood to ask what was the contemplated expenditure on the new post office at Croydon?

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.) inquired what was proposed to be done with the old post office at Birmingham, an ugly building, whose ugliness was rather added to by its present unoccupied condition? The popular idea in relation to the building in Birmingham was that it was absolutely unsuited to any purpose whatsoever. If the right hon. Gentleman could devise some means of disposing of it and getting it occupied he would confer an advantage on the inhabitants of the town. He should also like to ask a question in relation to the incidence of charge for these post offices as between the Telegraph and Postal Services. The first point would arise upon the original cost of the building, and he should be glad to know how that cost was distributed between one Service and the other. He believed the system formerly in operation was that the superficial space of the floors in the building was ascertained, the quantity of that area appropriated to the two branches of the Service ascertained, and the total charge of the building was distributed as between the two Services upon that calculation. He should be glad to know if that system was still in operation or not. A further question arose in relation to maintenance and repairs. Some years ago maintenance and repairs were charged—25 per cent. to the Telegraph Service and 75 per cent. to the Postal Service, and if that was the case now he did not see how it could be justified. If a less charge on the important item of maintenance and repairs was being made upon the Telegraph Service than ought strictly to be made it was very clear that the deficiency on the Telegraph Service was in reality much more considerable than the Estimate showed, and if the deficiency were increasing it was also clear that there might exist a necessity for a change of policy in relation to the Telegraph Service. As he understood from the First Commissioner of Works, the Treasury contemplated trying the adoption of some system of capital expenditure in relation to these buildings. It was a very curious circumstance that if a Municipal or other Local Body wished to erect an expensive building it did not do it out of revenue. Such a process would be absolutely impossible, inasmuch as for a year or two over which the expenditure would extend there would be such an increase of rating as would be intolerable. Therefore a loan was borrowed for the total value of the building and site, and that loan was spread over a series of years, having some relation to the life of the building, probably being 50 or 60 years. That, on the face of it, was a fairly just system, and for this reason: A building lasted far beyond the term of the life of the persons who, under the system pursued by the Crown, had to pay the whole cost of it; and, therefore, by the Municipal system, the cost of the building was really paid for by the generation which had the use of it. It would be a perfectly fair and just system if something of the kind could be applied by the Treasury to buildings of a permanent character, such as those provided for the accommodation of the Post Office, the Customs, and other Services.

Sir John Lubbock

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, it was quite true that nothing was proposed this year as regarded the post office at Landport. He believed they were quite prepared to undertake the building, but it was uncertain whether they would be able to do it this year. If, fortunately, they were able to commence the building, they would be able to do it out of the savings of another Vote. As representing the Treasury, he did not in the least find fault with the right hon. Member for Ormskirk for his criticisms; but, on the contrary, he rather thanked him for usefully drawing attention to many points in the Estimates. He differed from the right hon. Gentleman, who said that the column as to Re-Votes was more misleading than it was. He thought it was clear what was meant by that column, though he quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman in his criticisms with respect to the information given. He quite agreed that the form in which the Re-Votes were given was very misleading. For instance, there was a case in which £6,860 was voted last year and a sum was spent, leaving £2,000 unappropriated. That was put down for this year as a Re-Vote of £2,000, but it was a Re-Vote of less, because last year there was taken off from the total a certain amount which would have the effect of reducing the Re-Vote to a less sum than £2,000. He was going to suggest that the Treasury should consider whether a better form could not be devised for next year, and if his right hon. Friend would wish to make any suggestions on the subject he would be glad to receive them. With regard to the long delay in the building of post offices, and to the suggestion that they should be built out of capital, he did not see why that should be done for post offices unless it were to be done for all other public buildings throughout the country. If it was desirable for one, it was desirable for all. What he would suggest to the First Commissioner was that quite so many post office buildings should not be undertaken at the same time. There were 64 now in some process of construction, and, in his opinion, it would be better to have only one-half that number on hand and to spend a larger sum upon them.

MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.) said, that it would be desirable to give great consideration to the form in which the Estimates should be presented. What the House of Commons wanted was to get more information, instead of less; the present system was not calculated to give them that, and he hoped the matter would have the attention of the Treasury. Another matter to which he wished to draw the attention of the First Commissioner was the Leeds Post Office. This work had been on hand a very long time, and there was not a case in the United Kingdom which was more pressing, in view of the fact that it was in contemplation to make Leeds a still more important centre for forwarding telegraphic communications, and that the present building was entirely inadequate. He noticed that only £20,000 was to be voted this year as compared with £24,000 last year. He could not understand how anyone who had prepared the Estimate could consider himself justified in reducing the amount. Only £18,500 was spent last year, and that might seem some justification for reducing the amount. But last year there were local circumstances which tended to delay. The building was now well advanced, and there was no reason whatever why not only £20,000 but even £40,000 should not be spent upon it during the present year. What he desired to ask the right hon. Gentleman was that, if he had it in his power, he would not allow the work to be limited by the amount of the Vote, but let it make as much progress as it could.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the contract was entered into more than a year ago by his Predecessor—

MR. JACKSON: There was a strike.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that was so; and thus the right hon. Gentleman would see that the amount to be expended depended not upon the Government, but upon the contractor. Nothing, he could assure the Committee, would be done by the Department to delay the work. If, under the contract entered into by his Predecessor, it was possible for the contractor to make greater progress, more money would certainly be expended.

MR. TOMLINSON said, there were other questions to be answered.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, with regard to Croydon he had to say that £5,000 was the total amount which it was intended to spend.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he would like to point out to the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner, and the Committee, the great difference between the amounts of the original and revised Estimates, which might be made still larger next year. For example, the new Sorting Office at Tothill Fields was now put down for more than double the original Estimate. Telegraph factories also showed a large increase. They had in one case, he found, an Estimate of £983,857, and another Estimate of £960,152, and even the revised one, which was the higher, was not final. That was a very serious matter, because the House was asked to vote for the buildings involved on the original Estimate, whereas they were now asked to sanction an expenditure of over £1,000,000 more. Surely that would strike them as a very serious abuse. In another item they had an original Estimate of £137,000, and a revised Estimate of £190,000. Why, the difference would constitute a small fortune! Next year, perhaps, they would have another increase of £20,000. They had still another item, relating to the North-Western District, with an original Estimate of £26,000, and a revised Estimate of £54,000. Was not that a serious condition of affairs? In the matter of the telegraph factories, the increase was from £36,700 to £65,000. Next year he supposed it would be £75,000, and it might even go up to £85,000 the year after that. But perhaps the right hon. Gentleman did not care what happened next year, as he knew he would not be in Office then. At the same time, he would like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman could not do something to place the House in a better position with regard to these Estimates.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS said, that he had received no answer to the question he had put.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: It is a matter of account, and I would prefer that it should be discussed on the Report stage.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS said, it was not a matter of that kind, but a matter of principle, and it should not be treated so lightly.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he would look into the matter referring to the Telegraph Department. The Birmingham Post Office buildings had not been sold because the Government did not think that the offer which they received was good enough. In regard to the increase in the present Estimates, he would point out that the original Estimates had been framed in some cases six or seven years ago. Wages were much higher now than they were then. As to the Tothill Fields Office, it was found that largely increased accommodation was acquired since the original estimate was framed.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) asked for further information with regard to expenditure.

*MR. JAMES LOWTHER said, there was a question of great importance which he would like to press upon the notice of the Government—namely, that of electrical communication with light-houses and lightships. He had often tried to do so before, but he could not get an opportunity, and he doubted whether this was the Vote upon which he should speak regarding the subject.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, this Vote did not cover the subject-matter of the inquiry proposed to be put.

*MR. JAMES LOWTHER said, the right hon. Gentleman was rather premature. He wanted to guard himself, if this were not the proper Vote, against being subsequently precluded from raising the question at a later stage. What he desired to ask was whether there was included in the Estimates any provision for carrying out the unanimous recommendation of the Royal Commission relating to this question? [Cries of Order!]

THE CHAIRMAN: Order!

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, he understood the right hon. Gentleman, and could only answer that he did not know at present. He would now appeal to the Committee to allow the Vote to pass.

MR. PLUNKET (Dublin University) said, he would not delay the Committee, but he was anxious to know what was being done in regard to the buildings at Manchester, the site for which had been acquired?

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, he hoped the matter would be proceeded with in the course of the coming year.

MR. FORWOOD wished to thank the First Commissioner for the courteous way in which he had met the remarks which had been offered.

Vote agreed to.

2. £170,232, to complete the sum for Public Buildings, Great Britain.

*SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said he wished to call attention to the want of accommodation for examinations at the London University. The Government had recognised the fact that the accommodation was deficient, but seemed disposed to put off dealing with the matter almost sine die. If they would only inquire into the subject, he was sure they would satisfy themselves that something should be done at once. The Millbank site was by no means the most convenient that could be selected. His view was that, as additional accommodation was required at South Kensington, arrangements should be made whereby that accommodation, and the additional accommodation for examinations required at the London University, should be given in the same building. This would be much the most economical arrangement. The cost of the University to the National Exchequer was very small; in fact, with the exception of the buildings, the expenditure was more than recouped by increased fees. The government of the University was carried on at no expense to the State. The number of students going up for examination increased nearly 10 per cent. every year, the total number of students doubling itself each decade. At present, the examinations took place in buildings by no means suitable for the purpose, where there was not sufficient means of giving accommodation to successive batches of students. Clearly it was very disadvantageous for a batch of students in chemistry to be obliged to undergo an examination in a room just vacated by another batch, where the atmosphere was laden with the fumes of previous experiments. The late Government had recognised the necessity of something being done, and had proposed to add another storey to the University buildings, but the Royal Academy Authorities had objected on the ground that it would interfere with their light. It had been expected that the late Government would have taken steps to give additional accommodation at South Kensington, but nothing had been done.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The Government have not lost sight of the subject to which the right hon. Baronet refers. I thought we had gone a long way towards meeting the wishes of the right hon. Gentleman by suggesting the Millbank site, not only for the Civil Service Commission Buildings, but for London University examination rooms. Of course, if the London University object to that site their objection will be entertained, and we shall consider what provision can be made elsewhere, but it occurred to me that, on the whole, it would be well to have the examination rooms in combination with other buildings.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): desired to impress on the Government the necessity for something being done at once. The matter had been discussed the other day at the Senate of the University, and the unanimous opinion was that the accommodation was so defective that the students could not do justice to their work. He thought that in the interests of education something should be done. As to the Millbank site, he concurred with what had been said by the right hon. Baronet. The examination rooms ought to be near the University, and he doubted whether the proposed site was at all suitable. Furthermore, it was desirable that there should be no delay; therefore, he hoped that something would be done in the matter as rapidly as possible.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK said, he did not desire to be understood as objecting to the Millbank site. It was only as a matter of economy that he suggested they should go to South Kensington. He would, however, press on the Government the necessity of doing something as soon as possible.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) said, there was an item for the residence of Parliamentary counsel, and he should like to know what explanation the Government had to offer with regard to such a charge? It seemed to him to be as dark and mysterious as any item the hon. Member for Peterborough had ever drawn attention to. He should also like to know how it was that the item for the Public Works Loan Board had increased from £700 to £2,000?

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the increase referred to was due to the fact that the Bank of England, to whom the building belonged, had raised the rent, and the Government were not in a position to raise objection. No doubt the building was worth £2,000 a year. The item for buildings for Parliamentary Counsel was owing to the old quarters having been given up for the purposes of the Admiralty. In a short time those quarters would be pulled down, and this was thought to be a convenient opportunity for removal to Whitehall, where a private house had been obtained. The rent charged was not excessive.

MR. JOHNSON-FERGUSON (Leicester, Loughborough) said, he presumed that when the buildings at the St. Martin's side of the National Gallery were finished that portion of the structure would be complete. No one could say that the buildings at that side were not handsome and suitable for their purpose. But the buildings on the opposite side, near Pall Mall, were not such as they ought to have for national purposes. The approaches were a disgrace to the country. It would be impossible to improve them, and make them like those of the other side, so long as the barracks were maintained in the rear. Besides being inconvenient in this sense, the barracks were a source of danger in the possible event of fire. He had heard it said, and he hoped it was true, that the Government proposed to remove the barracks to the Millbank site.

*MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, he saw a sum of £25 in the Estimates for the Whitehall Banqueting House. He had understood that that building had been given up to an institution of some sort; and he should, therefore, like to know whether it was still to be kept in repair at the expense of the public? On another page he found an item of £1,000 for electric current against £150 last year; and he found that, in spite of this increase, there was no reduction in the charge for gas and oil. He failed to understand how the whole of the charge for the electric lighting could be put down as an extra. Some time ago he had put a question to the Government as to the condition of the water in the Fountains at Trafalgar Square, which was supplied from the Orange Street Waterworks. The tanks were in a disgraceful state, and he should like to know if the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works would give orders to have them cleaned out? Though he (Mr. Morton) had called attention to their state every year for some years past nothing had been done in the matter. As they now had a new First Commissioner of Works, and as there was some fear of cholera coming to this country, he would ask the Government for some explicit statement as to what was to be done in this matter.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the barracks behind the National Gallery would, by arrangement with the War Office, eventually be removed to Millbank, and this would enable the Government at some future time to make a further extension of the National Gallery. The day was not far distant when it would be necessary to do that, in order to find room for all the pictures of the National Collection. He did not agree that the approaches to the Gallery were unworthy of the country. The question of the condition of the water in Trafalgar Square had not been brought under his notice since he had been in Office; but he would make inquiries into the matter. He ventured to hope that the Committee would now pass the Vote.

MR. JOHN BURNS suggested that the Department for which the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner was responsible should follow the example set by the London County Council in other parts of London and the City Corporation, and provide orderly boxes in Trafalgar Square and other open spaces in which pieces of paper, orange peel, and so forth could be thrown.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) urged the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, in connection with Item D, for Caretakers, to remember the case of discharged soldiers, and to give them situations as caretakers when he had the opportunity. He could say a great deal on that subject, but he would not now take up the time of the Committee.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Sir J. T. Hibbert,)—put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday, 29th May.

Committee to sit again upon Monday, 29th May.

ADJOURNMENT (WHITSUNTIDE).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House, at the conclusion of the Morning Sitting this day, do adjourn until Monday, 29th May."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

LORD R. CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): I do not, of course, rise to offer any opposition to the Motion, or raise any question of a personal character; but I want to put a couple of questions to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on matters of first-rate importance. The first question I put to the right hon. Gentleman on account of his authoritative connection with the Treasury. Some 10 days or a fortnight ago I asked the First Lord of the Treasury for a Return setting out the payments which are the first charges on the Irish Exchequer in connection with the demands made by England under certain clauses of the Government of Ireland Bill, and the First Lord of the Treasury gave what I understood to be a promise that the Return should be prepared. I cannot think it is a Return that would take long to prepare. The information ought to be in the Treasury. I would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will undertake to inquire at the Treasury whether the Return is being prepared; and whether he will also undertake that it shall be presented, if not immediately on the recommencement of business, at any rate within a few days, because the matter is one that will require a great deal of study? It is merely a financial Return, yet one which is absolutely necessary for the information of the House. The other subject upon which I would put a question to the right hon. Gentleman is as to Lord Herschell's Indian Currency Committee. It is almost a public scandal that this Committee having been appointed months ago, and having held frequent sittings, that now, when we are getting on towards the middle of summer, we should be without any promise or pledge that the Committee is going to make a Report. Numerous questions have been put to the Government as to when the Committee will report, and we have always been bidden to hope that the Report will not be long delayed. The right hon. Gentleman is perfectly aware that until the Committee reports the Indian Government are absolutely precluded from deciding anything whatever in the preparation of their financial policy. I know that Ministers have no authority over Royal Commissions; but I should imagine that they can exercise the greatest possible influence, and if the Members of Lord Herschell's Committee are entirely unable to agree upon a Report, at least let us have from them the evidence, and any expression of opinion which two or more of them may have agreed upon.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I do not wish to raise any general discussion whatever on this Motion; but it may be convenient to the Government if I follow my noble Friend in submitting two questions to the Government. One of them has been anticipated by my noble Friend. I had intended to press a question as to the Report of Lord Herschell's Committee; but what my noble Friend has said leaves me nothing to add, except to call attention to a paragraph which I noticed yesterday in the public Press. The following was telegraphed from Calcutta:—

"The exchange, after remaining fairly steady for some weeks, has now fallen to a point which is almost the lowest ever reached. Great anxiety is expressed on all sides for the Report of Lord Herschell's Committee. Indeed, the tension has become almost intolerable, and longer delay may have serious results, as the Government of India must speedily decide whether it will be necessary to call a special Session of the Legislature at Calcutta in July for the purpose of imposing fresh taxation."

I presume the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself will not deny that that is a true statement, and that there is no exaggeration in it; and before we separate for the Recess I do hope the right hon. Gentleman will reply to the question of my noble Friend, and will tell us distinctly whether there will be any Report at all; if so, when that Report will most probably be presented, and how long India is to be left in a state of suspense? I pass to the second question I wanted to raise, and on that I shall have to address myself partly to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and partly to the Minister for Agriculture. It arises from an answer given to me yesterday in reply to a question. I asked if the Government had made up their minds as to whether they would give effect to the Departmental Committee which has recently sat upon the question of swine fever? That is a question which, in the agricultural districts, is considered of the greatest importance. It is, moreover, one with regard to which there is now a general consensus of opinion that the time has come when this matter ought to be taken under the control of a Central Body—namely, the Government—like the unfortunate diseases, foot - and - mouth disease and pleuro-pneumonia. At the commencement of the Session I asked the Minister for Agriculture if he was prepared to deal with this question, and he replied to me that he thought it necessary to appoint a Departmental Committee to inquire into all the circumstances before taking that step. I pointed out to him, and urgently pressed upon him, that if he wished to deal with the question economically and effectually he could not do better than deal with it at once—at the beginning of the Session, and for one reason in particular—namely, that at that time he had a most effective staff of Inspectors, who would have been perfectly well able to carry out the work. As pleuro-pneumonia has greatly decreased, a large part of the staff of Inspectors may be dispensed with; and, in all probability, there will not be the present facilities for dealing with swine fever if action is postponed for an indefinite period of time. I must say I have never been able to see the necessity for the appointment of that Departmental Committee. It always appeared to me, I must confess, like a pretext for shelving the question, at all events for the present, and I am confirmed in that by the Report of the Committee, in which there is absolutely no new information. Be that as it may, the Committee reported, as it was a foregone conclusion they would, in favour of the policy which I advocate—namely, that this matter should be taken up and dealt with by Her Majesty's Government without delay. Two paragraphs of the Report, to which I will in a few brief words call attention, bear out what I say. In Section 24 they point to the overwhelming evidence given to the effect that if proper measures were adopted swine fever would be extinguished in a reasonable time, and they go on to say—

“ But we are satisfied from the evidence submitted to us that, owing to the impossibility of securing uniform action under the jurisdiction of the Local Authorities, it cannot be extirpated unless under the direction of a Central Authority.”

Well, the Minister for Agriculture, 10 days or a fortnight ago, was asked whether he was prepared to give effect to the recommendation of the Committee, and he replied that he could give no answer until he had had an opportunity of seeing and studying the evidence. Yesterday he was asked the same question, and he gave the same reply, whereupon I myself ventured to ask him where there was any information whatever contained in the Report of the Committee which was not perfectly well known already, and which he could not have obtained in his own Department; and I venture to say, having read the Report with great care, and having referred to it again since I asked the question yesterday, that the statement I made was absolutely true, and that there is absolutely no information of any sort or kind contained in the Report which could not have been obtained in the Office of the Agricultural Department. The Committee has reported most strongly in favour of this thing being done, and it appears to me that all the Minister for Agriculture and the Government have to consider is two things: first, they have to frame the Estimates, which are necessary; and, secondly, to obtain the consent of the Treasury to the money necessary for giving effect to the Report. It has been whispered to me that the Estimates foreshadowed in the Report are of enormous proportions. I do not know whether it is true, because I have not seen the evidence; but I have heard it stated that the amount required will be £400,000. I cannot understand what necessity there was to go to a Committee for evidence on that point. Estimates for a purpose of this kind ought to be settled in the Department itself, and it seems to me extremely foolish to go to a Committee for such information, however that Committee may be constituted. But I think, on this point, I can offer the Government a word of consolation. If, when I held the position of Minister for Agriculture, I had been deterred by the Estimates first presented to me, we should never have had the Pleuro-Pneumonia Act at all. We had that Act, however, and it has been attended with absolute and complete success. I would, therefore, suggest to the Minister for Agriculture that he should not be deterred by any rumours or any evidence given to the Committee of the enormous sum which is likely to be required for this purpose. I cannot, of course, say what may be the case in Ireland—I should have to refer to the Irish authority before dealing with that country; but I will undertake to say this—that, so far as England is concerned, I believe that the sum sanctioned in the Pleuro-Pneumonia Act would be sufficient to enable the Government to deal successfully with the difficulty. The Government could safely embark on a measure at once. There is not likely to be any controversy or opposition in the House. If they brought in a measure without delay, it might be put into operation by September. Even in the present financial circumstances of the Government, the Chancellor of the Exchequer might stretch a point and make a very useful concession to the agricultural interest. I do hope that the Government will favourably consider this proposal. Surely the present situation of the agricultural interest demands some consideration at the hands of Her Majesty's Government. The position of the agricultural interest never has been worse, I believe, than it is at the present time for many years; but no step has been taken by the Government in its interest, with the exception of the appointment of a roving and general Committee of Inquiry. Even there I should have been ready to go with you, but for the absolute conviction in my mind—a conviction amounting to absolute certainty—that the inquiry would be productive of nothing but delay, and, therefore, would be mischievous rather than useful. Everything for which we have asked with regard to the agricultural interest has been refused. Early in the Session we asked the Government whether it would not be possible to give some further relief from local taxation;

but the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister absolutely put their feet down upon any proposals of that kind. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is aware that I have always been a great advocate of currency reform in the interest of the agricultural portion of the community. I entertain that opinion to-day as strongly as ever I entertained it. It is an opinion which I believe is growing every day, not only in this country, but in foreign countries. You used at one time to treat it with ridicule and sneers, but it is now supported by many men on the Continent and in America of such experience, and such ability, and such knowledge of the subject, that you are no longer entitled or able to treat it in that way. Although you had an opportunity of doing something effectual on this subject when the Conference was held at Brussels, you did everything in your power to bring the proceedings of the Conference to nothing. I know the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer differs from me on that point. I have given as much attention to it, and studied the proceedings as closely, and had as much information upon it as anybody in the country, and I adhere most deliberately to the opinion I expressed in the Debate we had some time ago. At an earlier period of the Session the Government were asked to give effectual guarantees that there should be no possible risk of a return of pleuro-pneumonia to this country, and to pass a short Act which should make the slaughter of all foreign animals landed in this country compulsory. Even there we were met with the opposition of the Minister for Agriculture, on grounds which I thought then, and still think, were inadequate and unreasonable under all the circumstances of the case. Everything almost that we have asked has been refused; and now with regard to this very simple matter, which could be so easily done at comparatively small cost, the Government seem unwilling to make up their minds to act without delay. I do not wish to detain the Committee longer; but, in view of the reply I received from the Minister for Agriculture yesterday, I thought I could not allow this opportunity to pass without endeavouring to impress on the Government the necessity there is for dealing with this question at once.

SIR W. HARCOURT: In reply to the noble Lord opposite, I may say that, as to the Returns he desires of the charges on the Irish Revenue, I will take care that everything is done to accelerate their publication. I agree with the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman with regard to Lord Herschell's Committee, as to the vital importance of an early decision on the Indian Currency question; and, though I have no official information, I believe the final stage has been reached at which an agreement is likely immediately to be arrived at. I hope the House will, with the very shortest delay, be informed of the decision of the Committee, and from reports which have reached me, I do not despair of an agreement among the persons forming the Committee. The House must not, however, take this as an official communication. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken, and most fairly spoken, of the importance of the measures to put down swine fever. Well, Sir, I recognise the importance of that subject. In fact, I hope the result of the Motion I have submitted to the House will be to enable me to go into a part of the country where this question is one of vital importance. I wish to relieve my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture from the greater part of the burden of responsibility for an immediate decision not having been arrived at. I have not had placed before me officially the cost of this work. My unfortunate position is this. As I ventured to point out in my Financial Statement, there are constant demands being made on the Government to undertake new works of every description. Some of these works may be desirable; but it is absolutely necessary, in the position I hold, that I should examine what will be the cost of these new undertakings before they are commenced. I must tell hon. Gentlemen opposite that if demands for such a sum as £400,000 are made, I shall have to ask for more money, and probably I shall have to ask for the repeal of the clause that was put into the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill abolishing the Goschen stamp. The right hon. Gentleman opposite does not seem to think that it would cost £400,000 to stamp out swine fever; but surely we must see how much it would cost before we come to any decision. We will look into the matter, and if we find there is power to carry out the recommendations of the Committee, and we can do it reasonably, it shall be done. The right hon. Gentleman can be assured that we shall approach the subject with every desire to deal with it in a manner that will give some relief to the agricultural interest. I cannot be tempted, even on the present occasion, to follow the right hon. Gentleman into a discussion of bi-metallism.

MR. CHAPLIN: I never mentioned bi-metallism.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Even the original promoters of the Brussels Conference, when the fatal 30th of May was approaching, postponed it until the end of November. I will agree with the right hon. Gentleman that we also should postpone the question and any further discussion on it till the end of November. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to another large subject—that of local taxation. He reproaches us with not having made any further grants in relief of local taxation. I do not propose to argue that question over again; but he knows very well that in the course of the last few years there has been something like £4,000,000 a year chargeable upon the taxpayer for the relief of local taxation. Whether if we had left these £4,000,000 in the hands of the Exchequer we might not have been able to do more for the agricultural interest and for the other interests of the country is a very arguable question. I do not believe that there is such a sense of relief from what has been given in reduction of the rates as at all adequately corresponds to the amount that has been granted. I believe myself that if the £4,000,000 had been devoted to the stamping out of swine fever, and many other objects in connection with the agricultural interest, agriculturists would have obtained more benefit than they have, as a matter of fact, obtained from these grants, which I am afraid, in many cases, are like rivers running through the sand and disappearing in swamps. This is, I think, a matter for very serious consideration before we enter into any further expenditure in that direction. I am glad to learn, from the able Report which my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. H. H. Fowler) has prepared, that there has been a very sensible relief to the rates, and that in the agricultural districts the rates are now very much lower than they were in former times. Remember what this £4,000,000 represents. It means 2d. on the Income Tax. This ought to be borne in mind when complaints are made as to the height of the Income Tax.

*MR. COHEN (Islington, E.) pointed out that the Goschen tax on securities to bearer had been repealed precisely because it had not yielded as much as it had been expected to yield, and the right hon. Gentleman would recollect that the yield for 1892-3 was not, as he stated by a lapsus linguæ, £600,000, but £60,000.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) wished to support what had been said by his right hon. Friend the Member for the Sleaford Division (Mr. Chaplin) on the subject of swine fever, although he had nothing to allege against the Minister for Agriculture (Mr. Gardner). That right hon. Gentleman had acted to the best of his ability, although he had not done the agriculturists very much good. He (Major Rasch) could not understand, as a matter of common sense, why, if the right hon. Gentleman had before him the Report of the Committee with reference to swine fever, he should also want to go into the evidence that had been placed before the Committee. As to the cost of dealing with swine fever, it had only cost £120,000 to stamp out pleuro-pneumonia; and it was, therefore, utterly impossible that the expenditure on swine fever would amount to as much as £400,000. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer had only left on the Estimates the sum that had been allocated to pleuro-pneumonia, there would be no difficulty whatever in the matter. The Minister for Agriculture had now only to harden his heart and ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for an additional sum, and all difficulty would be obviated.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, he must congratulate the Minister for Agriculture on the way in which he had acted up to the present time. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would go on in the course he had hitherto pursued. He was glad the right hon. Gentleman had appointed a Committee with reference to swine fever. It was a new thing to him to learn that swine fever was well known through the country, and that veterinary surgeons were well versed in it. He had been under the impression, until the Committee's Report was presented, that swine fever was a complaint of which veterinary surgeons had little knowledge. He was glad they were now coming to the conclusion that they knew what the disease was. If it was to be stamped out it must be dealt with as a whole, and not approached in a half-hearted manner. It could not be dealt with altogether as pleuro-pneumonia was. Swine fever was a most infectious thing, and it would be necessary to pull down buildings and to use disinfectants on an extensive scale if it was to be destroyed. His own opinion was that money would be absolutely and entirely thrown away if the disease were dealt with in anything like a half-hearted manner.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden): I should not have spoken but for some remarks of my hon. Friend opposite. I cannot imagine that any Government can possibly entertain the proposals that have been made on the subject of swine fever until they have seen the evidence. The foundation for saying that the large sum of £400,000 will be needed, if it exists anywhere, is to be found solely in the evidence of which we are not in possession. Until we have the evidence before us it is quite impossible for us to consider the subject at all. There are various questions that will have to be considered when the subject is dealt with. For instance, swine fever is not confined to a few of the Eastern Counties of England, but extends to Ireland, and it would be necessary to consider the restrictions that would have to be imposed upon those who send pigs from one portion of the United Kingdom to another. We should also have to deal with what I might almost call the sanitation of the dwellings of pigs. There are, in fact, many large questions that will have to be dealt with when the subject is taken in hand.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) asked whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed, after the Motion respecting the holidays was disposed of, to go on with the other Orders of the Day. Some of those Orders were of the most contentious character, and certainly one or two of them ought not to have been put down for discussion on that occasion. He thought it would conduce to the progress of business if the Government would state that they had no intention to take anything after the 5th Order of the Day—(Supply [18th May] Report)

SIR W. HARCOURT: We propose, after this Motion as to the Adjournment, to take only the Conveyance of Mails Bill and Report of Supply.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) said, he wished to know what decision had been come to with reference to the Zulu prisoners? Was it proposed, as had been stated, to restore them to their country in a few months? Considerable apprehension existed, and he should be glad to know what were the intentions of the Government.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar) said, that the reports which had appeared in the papers on this subject, and to which the hon. and gallant Member no doubt referred, might give rise to misunderstanding and unfounded hopes among the Zulu tribes. The report that he had stated to the Secretary of the Aborigines Protection Society that the Zulu exiles would be restored to their country in a few months was not correct. The Government had given the closest attention to these Zulu questions; but they thought that, as the present Administrator was about to retire, it would be better to wait for his Report and for the appointment of his successor before taking any steps. It was admitted by everyone that Dinizulu and the other Chiefs would have to return to their own country before very long, but the question was when and under what conditions. The friends of these Chiefs would do them ill service by creating the impression that they would be allowed to return to their country and occupy the positions which they held before exiled. They would, indeed, go back under very different conditions. The Government would deal with the question at the earliest possible moment in a way which they hoped would be satisfactory to all who were interested in that country. He was glad that the hon. Member had raised this question, as there appeared to have been some misapprehension as to the intentions of Her Majesty's Government with regard to it, and some misrepresentation of what he had said to the Secretary of the Aborigines Protection Society.

MR. CLOUGH (Portsmouth) said, he should be glad to have some assurance from the Government that the question of Greenwich Age Pensions would receive early attention after the Whitsuntide Recess. It had been before a Select Committee, which had favourably reported on the Resolution of the House with regard to it, and he was bound to say that his loyalty to the Government had been severely taxed by the delay in dealing with it. As a Member for Portsmouth, he was well aware that great dissatisfaction prevailed at the continuous delays. He, therefore, hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would assure them that there should be no further delay.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That this House, at the conclusion of the Morning Sitting this day, do adjourn until Monday, 29th May.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 29th May 1893.

QUESTIONS.

FURLOUGH PAY TO OFFICERS FOR INDIA.

SIR SEYMOUR KING (Hull, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the case of Surgeon Lieutenant-Colonel Benjamin Franklin, who entered the Indian Service on the 1st April 1869, under the Military Furlough Rules of 1868, which stated in effect that his furlough pay would be issued to him at the exchange of 2s. for the rupee; whether he has petitioned the Secretary of State to have his name added to the list of those officers who have been declared to be entitled to be paid at par when on furlough, and his petition has been rejected; and why the Secretary of State declines to comply with the terms of the contract under which Surgeon Lieutenant-Colonel Franklin entered the Service?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL, North Beds.): Yes, Sir. The attention of the Secretary of State has been drawn to this case. (2.) In 1886 Surgeon Lieutenant-Colonel Franklin petitioned the Secretary of State to the effect mentioned in the second part of the question. (3.) The Secretary of State was unable to admit that this officer had any claim, under the terms on which he entered the Service, to receive furlough pay at the rate of 2s. the rupee.

SIR SEYMOUR KING: Would the hon. Gentleman mind saying why?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: The Secretary of State has the power, and therefore the duty, to regulate this scale of pay entirely at his own discretion, and there is no compact or bargain in the case.

CRIME IN COUNTY KERRY.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that at the O'Dorney (County Kerry) Presentment Sessions a claim for malicious injury was made by the Rev. Augustine Dillon for £500, on account of the burning of a schoolhouse; that the evidence showed that the books, maps, &c., had all been collected in a heap and fired; and that, on a man being remonstrated with, he declared that they had paid for the school and could do what they liked with it; and if the police have any clue to the perpetrators of this outrage?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): The National schoolhouse at Knockracrohy, County Kerry, which is under Roman Catholic management, was maliciously burnt down on December 22 last. The amount originally claimed as compensation by the manager, the Rev. Mr. Dillon, was £500; but as it subsequently appeared that the damage done to the building was less serious than at first believed, the rev. gentleman at Presentment Sessions, held on the 4th instant, fixed the value of the damage at £275, which sum was awarded. The facts adduced in evidence at these Sessions are correctly stated in the question. I understand that at a religious service held by the Rev. Mr. Dillon after the commission of the outrage he denounced the burning of the school in vigorous language, when some person present remarked that "the people had built the schoolhouse; it was their own to do as they liked with." This incident was mentioned by Mr. Dillon at the Presentment Sessions. No person has yet been made amenable for the outrage, though the police have a very strong suspicion as to the perpetrators.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that six cows belonging to Mr. McMahon, of Castle Farm, County Kerry, were recently mutilated; and whether he is also aware that the farm held by Mr. McMahon is the same as that occupied by the Curtin family previous to the murder of Mr. Curtin some years ago; and if, in view of the serious state of the Counties of Clare, Kerry, and Limerick, he is prepared to take any exceptional steps for the protection of life and property in those counties?

MR. J. MORLEY : It is a fact that three cows, the property of Mr. McMahon, were maliciously cut on the night of the 8th instant; but the cuts were merely skin deep, and the cattle will not, I understand, suffer permanent injury. The farm which McMahon holds is the same as that held by the late Mr. Curtin. This outrage, however, has nothing whatever to do with his connection with the farm, nor is there any agrarian element in the case. Excepting in two bad areas, I should regard the state of the Counties of Clare, Kerry, and Limerick as not any more serious, but as less serious, at the present moment, than it was when the present Government acceded to Office, and the only steps I propose to take are to continue those I have already taken—namely, to rely on the vigilance of the police, which has been attended by a decline of agrarian crime in two out of three of the counties mentioned.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL : Is it not the case that when the present Government acceded to Office Limerick had an absolutely clean bill of health, and have there not been more moonlighting outrages since then than in any previous period of the same extent?

MR. W. REDMOND (Clare, E.) : Certainly not.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL : I have the figures here.

MR. J. MORLEY : I have not the figures with me. But the hon. Member has given notice that he will move for an inquiry into this matter, with penal results to myself. I am quite prepared, when that Motion comes on, to discuss the matter with him.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) : As the right hon. Gentleman has stated that there are only two limited areas exceptionally affected, may I ask him whether those two bad areas affect the three counties, Limerick, Clare, and Kerry?

MR. J. MORLEY : One of the areas is defined by a radius of 10 miles round Ennis. The other area is on the other side of the Shannon, and does affect the three counties, Kerry, Limerick, and Clare.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in how many cases orders were made under the change of venue and special juries' clauses of "The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1889," in cases of crimes committed in the Counties of Clare, Limerick, and Kerry, from the passing of the Act down to the 22nd August, 1892; how many of the said cases proceeded to trial; and in how many of them convictions were obtained?

MR. J. MORLEY : In County Clare the total number of cases in which orders for change of venue and special juries were made in the period mentioned was 30. These cases, which all proceeded to trial, affected 69 accused persons, of whom 32 were convicted. In County Kerry the total number of cases in which orders for change of venue and special juries were made in the period mentioned was 44. These cases, which all proceeded to trial, affected 87 accused persons, of whom 46 were convicted. In the County and City of Limerick the total number of cases in which orders for change of venue and special juries were made in the period mentioned was 41. These cases, which all proceeded to trial, affected 65 accused persons, of whom 28 were convicted.

THE PROPOSED POLYTECHNIC FOR SOUTH-WEST LONDON.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea) : I beg to ask the hon. Member for Merionethshire, as a Charity Commissioner, whether he can state why the plans for the proposed polytechnic for South-West London, which were sent to the Charity Commission in December last, have not yet been approved; and whether he will take steps to prevent any further delay in dealing with this matter?

THE PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER (Mr. T. E. ELLIS, Merionethshire) : The plans mentioned in the question were sent to the Charity Commission, together with proposals involving material modifications of the agreement as to finance upon which the scheme for the regulation of this polytechnic was based. In the result of communications between the Commissioners and the Governors, as to the proposed modifications, it was found to be necessary that an Assistant Commissioner should confer with the Governors and report to the Commissioners. This Report was not received by the Commissioners until the end of April, and on the 18th instant they communicated to the Governors their general approval of their proposals.

THE EAST AFRICA COMPANY AND RUNAWAY SLAVES.

MR. THOMAS BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that the Imperial East Africa Company have stated, in reply to a letter addressed to them by the Rev. C. T. Wakefield, that it is illegal for any private individual within the territories over which the Company exercises sovereignty to harbour or retain runaway slaves; that missions are only in these territories on condition that they comply with this obligation; that it is legal for the police to take such action to uphold and execute the law, and in order to prevent such breaches of the peace as Mr. Ormerod's action was calculated to bring about; and that the Company justifies this view of its sovereign duties upon the instructions sent by the Marquess of Salisbury on 1st February, 1889, to Her Majesty's Consul at Zanzibar; and whether the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs recognises this as the proper meaning of these instructions of his predecessor?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): The Correspondence in question has been submitted to the Secretary of State. Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to assume responsibility for the precise language employed by the Imperial British East Africa Company; but they consider that the position of Missionary Societies in regard to runaway slaves in the territories administered by the Company is correctly laid down in the Despatch of February 1, 1889, referred to. I may add that the Despatch in question, and the Circular issued by Sir C. Euan Smith, will be found in Blue Book Africa No. 1, 1889, and that it will be seen on reference to them that the decision on this subject was taken to prevent the security of the missionaries being imperilled.

RINGSTEAD CHURCHYARD.

MR. PAUL (Edinburgh, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the facts that the churchyard of Ringstead, in Northamptonshire, was closed for burials on the 30th April last by an Order in Council, dated the 28th December, 1892; that the Parochial Sanitary Committee appointed to provide a new burial ground have not done so; and that the population of Ringstead, numbering more than 900 persons, is now without a burial ground; and what steps can be taken to remove this serious danger to the public health?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): I am glad to be able to inform my hon. Friend that a site for a new burial ground has now been selected by the Sanitary Authority and approved of by the Secretary of State.

THE ESSENDON POSTMISTRESS.

MR. VICARY GIBBS (Herts, St. Albans): I beg to ask the Postmaster General, with regard to the dismissal of Agnes Craddock from the position of postmistress at Essendon, near Hatfield, whether the Inspector sent down by the Post Office Authorities reported in her favour?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): I am afraid I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the information he asks for.

REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL INSPECTOR'S STAFF.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether the removal of the staff of the Inspector of Reformatory and Industrial Schools to new and more commodious premises has yet been effected?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): Yes, Sir. The removal of the Inspector of Reformatory and Industrial Schools to new and more commodious premises in Great Scotland Yard took place in August last.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke) said, he wished to call attention to the Report on the Ordnance Survey which was made last year by the Departmental Committee appointed by the Board of Agriculture. He desired to know what had been done in the direction of carrying out of recommendations made by the Committee? Two great defects had been pointed out. In the first place, the Indices were remarkably bad, and the result was that there was great difficulty in picking out any particular map. The Departmental Committee had reported that a great improvement might be effected in this respect if a uniform style of heading were adopted, as at present there were two or three kinds of headings to various maps. Then, again, the Departmental Committee recommended that coloured maps should be allowed to be printed. At present maps in black and white only were issued, but it had been found that coloured maps were necessary in many parts of the country; and surely if the Government could not issue them some of the great map makers might be allowed to. He would be glad to know what was to be done in that matter. There was another recommendation of considerable importance to people in the country, and that was as to the classification of the roads. All the roads on the Ordnance maps were marked in exactly the same way; there was nothing to show the difference between a hard road and a mere green lane, and anyone driving might, if they depended solely on the map, easily find themselves leaving a metalled road for a green track. The Committee recommended that all roads classified as first or second class should be of such a nature as that the public were certain of having free access over them. There was great danger, when private roads were marked on the Ordnance map, of people being led to trespass upon them, thereby causing great inconvenience both to themselves and to the owners. There was a still more important question as to the footpaths. It was a useful and necessary thing that footpaths should be marked on the maps; but what occasionally happened was that cattle tracks were marked as foot-paths. He maintained that when the maps were revised these errors should be rectified, and only real footpaths be indicated. Temporary tracks, such as those made by shepherds going to their folds, ought certainly not to be shown. Finally, he wished to know when the maps were going to be revised, and did the Government intend to advance sufficient money to carry out the revision? Bearing in mind the changes constantly occurring, he thought there should be a regular system of revision.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): I wish to appeal to my hon. Friend not to press the matter further in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture. As this is the first Vote in Supply, a more appropriate time for discussing it will be when the Estimates are taken.

*MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman opposite that it is inconvenient to discuss this subject in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Minister of Agriculture ; but, at the same time, it is only right that the House should be informed when hon. Members will have an opportunity of raising the question. When is it proposed to take the Vote which provides for the Ordnance Survey ? This is a very important matter, for I know from personal experience at the Board of Agriculture it is absolutely essential as a matter of economy that effective steps should be taken during the present Session to carry out the recommendations of the Committee. I am aware that some addition has been made to the Estimates for the present year ; but it is not nearly sufficient to enable the carrying out of even the smaller of the two principal recommendations of the Committee. The first of those recommendations is that the revision of the maps on the one-inch scale shall be proceeded with at a cost of £5,000, or, if the Highlands are included, at a cost of £7,000. But the second and much more important recommendation is that the revision of the maps on the larger scale shall be carried out at a cost of some £500,000 or £600,000, the expenditure of which is to be spread over 10 years. For instance, it is suggested that £16,000 shall be spent this year and £37,000 next year, and that year by year the sum shall be increased until the Ordnance Survey had been placed on a satisfactory footing. I need not press on the Committee the great importance of this matter. It has occupied a great deal of time and attention in past days, and it now requires to be dealt with without delay even on the ground of economy, as the longer it is put off the greater will be the expense in the future. The work must be undertaken sooner or later, and it cannot be abandoned, as that would involve practically the throwing away of the immense sums of money already expended on it. Even if it were postponed for any considerable time, it would become necessary to have a new Survey altogether. I wish now to ask two questions—When shall we have an opportunity of discussing this question in the full manner it deserves ; and has any provision been made for carrying out the recommendations of the Departmental Committee ? If the discussion is to be postponed any considerable length of time we shall do our best to bring it on now.

*MR. MATHER (Lancashire, S.E., Gorton) said, he had to appeal to the hon. Gentleman opposite not to press his question during the absence of the hon. Baronet the Member for the Tewkesbury Division of Gloucestershire, who was Chairman of the Departmental Committee, and who had written expressing regret that he could not be in his place, and who desired that the discussion should be taken when the Vote came on in the ordinary course. The other Members of the Committee (his hon. Friend the Member for Eccles and himself) were anxious to have a full and exhaustive discussion on the subject when the regular Vote for the Ordnance Survey Department was reached.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, he was reluctant to interpose in that discussion, but he felt that attention ought to be directed to a peculiarity connected with the Vote on Account which should have priority over other considerations. It had a bearing on the question raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire, and it was important that the House should know when the discussion upon this subject would be resumed. The present Vote on Account was asked for for two months. That, he ventured to assert, was unprecedented, and he could not at that moment call to mind any occasion on which the second Vote on Account had been for so long a period. The first Vote on Account was always given for two months, but the second Vote on Account was ordinarily given for one month ; and if this Vote was agreed to, it would relieve the Government from the control of the House at large in the matter of Supply for two months instead of one. This would give the Government a degree of freedom which Governments had not usually had accorded to them, and he suggested to Members on both sides of the House that the Vote should not be agreed to without full knowledge and full understanding of what it implied. The late Government once proposed the second Vote on Account for two months ; but so strong was the objection of the then Opposition that the Leader of the House, the late

Mr. Smith, withdrew the proposal, and substituted one month instead. For his part, he saw no reason why they should now depart from what was the ordinary precedent, and from what had been deliberately confirmed; and he therefore earnestly pressed upon the Leader of the House and the Members of the Government that they should recognise the responsibility of their position, and substitute a request of one month for two. He apologised to the Committee for having intruded in this way, but he thought it was a matter of considerable gravity which deserved attention.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University): I was not aware that this question was going to be raised, and it shows the inconvenience of the Vote on Account not having been laid on the Table until hon. Members have left for their holidays. An attempt was made by the late Government to obtain a Vote for two months at this period of the year, and I think it was very properly objected to by hon. Gentlemen now occupying the Government Bench on the ground that it was asking the House to abdicate one of its most important functions. So strong were the representations made that the then Leader of the House thought it right to yield, although he was at that time in possession of a mechanical majority, with which he could have forced it through the House. He, however, thought that the arguments were so strong and the case made out so good that he yielded to the representations which were made most properly and patriotically by the Opposition. I think that, under these circumstances, the Government should at least explain to the House why it is now necessary to deviate not only from the usual practice of the Committee, but from their own representations and arguments made use of two years ago. I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be good enough to repeat to the Committee the arguments which he then used as to the propriety of the suggestion made by my right hon. Friend.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The reason why the Estimate was not issued until after we had separated for the Whitsuntide holidays was because it was impossible to issue the Estimate until we knew how many Votes we should obtain in Supply. We were in Supply on the Friday when the House adjourned up to half-past 5, and it was quite impossible then to issue any notice with respect to the Estimates, but they were issued, I believe, on the following day. Therefore, due notice was given to hon. Members, although we knew many were absent from town. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin was not quite correct in saying that the late Government did not take their Vote on Account for two months. I have a Return here showing that the second Votes have generally been taken for two months. In 1886-7 provision was made for only one, and in 1887-8 for six weeks, but after 1886-7 provision has always been made for two months. We have followed the precedent in taking the Vote for two months. I do not think we deserve the blame which my right hon. Friend threw upon the Government for not having made a proposal for a shorter period.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke) said, that as they did not know what might happen by the end of two months, he had thought that this was the only opportunity he might have of raising the question at all, and that must be his excuse for having intervened. As the Minister for Agriculture was now in his place, he would repeat the questions he had previously asked, as to the recommendations of the Commission with regard to maps, and as to delineating different kinds of roads and footpaths.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden): I am sorry that I had no notice that this subject was to be brought forward. I fully admit the importance of the discussion, but would add my voice to the appeal which has been made for its postponement until the hon. Member for the Stroud Division of Gloucestershire, who was the Chairman of the Committee, is in his place. The Committee was only appointed last year, and I do not think it possible for the Report to be more exhaustive or more thorough. A certain sum of money has been voted for the purpose, and the Treasury have sanctioned the employment of an additional number of engineers in order to carry out the recommendations of the Committee. The other matter referred to requires very serious financial consideration, inasmuch as it involves a total expenditure of something like £600,000.

*MR. CHAPLIN: The sum named in the Report for expenditure on revision this year is £16,000.

MR. GARDNER: It would be wrong for us to spend £16,000 this year unless we were certain that we should be able to complete the scheme and obtain the entire sum which the Committee said would be necessary. All the points which have been raised are of great importance, and are at the present moment under consideration; but I hope it will be seen that, in the absence of Members of the Committee, the matter cannot at this time be discussed so well as on a future occasion. An opportunity for full consideration will be afforded on the first Vote which is reached in Committee of Supply.

SIR W. HARCOURT: We have had very positive didactic statements from two ex-Secretaries to the Treasury, and my right hon. Friend is in the habit of delivering lectures to the Representatives of the Treasury—especially to the Chancellor of the Exchequer—on our submission to the dictation of the Treasury. One condition of this criticism should be that ex-Secretaries of the Treasury should have some knowledge of what has taken place at the Treasury; but unhappily that knowledge is entirely wanting, both in the case of my right hon. Friend and in the case of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The right hon. Gentleman opposite developed from his inner consciousness a theory of what took place in 1891, when a patriotic Opposition resisted an unpatriotic Government who demanded a Vote on Account for two months, and the Government of the day repented of their crimes, acknowledged their sins, and reduced the Vote to one month; and the right hon. Gentleman behind me lectured us for our extraordinary conduct in bringing forward a Vote for two months—a thing which, he said, had been condemned, and which had never been done before of late years. The facts are exactly the opposite of those stated by the two right hon. Gentlemen. In 1891 a patriotic Opposition complained of the conduct of the Government in proposing a Vote for two months; but, so far from yielding to the complaints of the Opposition, the Government used their mechanical majority. I believe all majorities are “mechanical”—at least they are always called so—but why a majority is more mechanical than a minority I do not know, although I observe that during the Recess the minority have been ordered to be a great deal more mechanical. On the occasion referred to the then Secretary to the Treasury, the Member for Leeds (Mr. W. L. Jackson), when invited to point to any precedent for taking at the end of June a Vote on Account for two months, stated that the second Vote on Account had for 15 years been taken to two months at the end of May. This is the Secretary to the Treasury who lectures the Treasury night after night. A proposal made by the hon. Member for Northampton to reduce the Vote to one month was rejected by 119 to 61. I hope these facts will be a lesson to the House to take with a grain of salt the Treasury doctrines of the right hon. Member for the Bodmin Division of Cornwall.

SIR J. GORST: Will the right hon. Gentleman say from what book he has quoted?

SIR W. HARCOURT: A book called Hansard.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, it must be remembered that this was a totally different year from the whole of the 16 preceding, because in none of those 16 years had the Government taken the whole time of the House as early as they had done this year. If the Government would set aside a week or a fortnight for Supply, the Opposition would allow the present Vote to be obtained at once; but they had before them at least two months on the Home Rule Bill; they were to sit from day to day, so that that Bill would take them to the end of July, and they were therefore asked to vote two months' Supply without having any opportunity of considering the Estimates in detail. He also protested at the Vote on Account having been put down at the last moment, so as to allow no opportunity for putting down Amendments. He therefore thought they ought to move the Adjournment of the Debate. He would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer at what period he proposed to put down Effective Supply—June or July?

Mr. H. Gardner

MR. COURTNEY thought the Committee would not regret his rash intervention after having heard the amusing speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. On the evidence submitted he must confess that he was in error in supposing that a second Vote on Account had been uniformly restricted to one month, although he was very clear about the circumstances of the late Government having reduced the period of a Vote on Account in consequence of the remonstrance made by hon. Members of the Opposition. He was a little flattered by the apparent attention and effect which had been produced by his didactic manner in the past, and he supposed it had not always been so entirely in vain as it had that day. If they took Votes on Account for two months, they practically relieved the Administration from the criticism and control of the House of Commons, which ought to be most jealously guarded.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, he gathered from this discussion that all Governments were equally bad in this matter. They all tried to avoid discussion on the Estimates, and were particularly anxious to spend the money before the House of Commons had had an opportunity of considering the expenditure. With regard to the matter of the Ordnance Survey and the question of footpaths, he would ask that the officers responsible should be instructed not to agree to the hon. Member's suggestions that footpaths should not be shown on the map.

MR. JEFFREYS (interposing) said, what he said was that sheep-tracks ought not to be put down as footpaths, but that footpaths ought to be carefully marked.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, if it came to that, then the officers must hold a Court of Inquiry, and decide what were footpaths. If they did, it would save many people from going to the Courts of Law. He was afraid this was a suggestion in the interests of the landowners, who were always endeavouring to close these footpaths. If the footpaths were not marked, then they could bring these Ordnance maps into Court and say there never had been a footpath in the particular place. The Ordnance maps were very useful in deciding where there were footpaths, and he protested against these officers being instructed to keep anything off the maps. It very often happened that what were called sheep-tracks were really footpaths, and he hoped the Government would give instructions that the officers preparing the maps should show all the footpaths.

*MR. CHAPLIN: It is perfectly obvious we shall have no other opportunity of discussing this question, as I gather from the answers that have been given, for many months; and up to now we have failed to elicit any information whatever from the Government as to what they are going to do, except with regard to the first recommendation, and the smaller one, that is contained in the Report of the Committee. That being so, although I am very sorry to do it on this occasion, I really must press the question this afternoon, because a delay of months on this question would be fatal to its being dealt with during the present year, and I can submit most excellent reasons why that course ought to be adopted. I put the question to the President of the Board of Agriculture, and asked him whether they could not tell us, at all events, that they would go on with the work during the present year with regard to the maps on the larger scale; and he said it was impossible to say now that it was a large question and ought to be carefully considered, and that he could not give me any answer on this occasion. Why cannot he give me any answer? When was this Departmental Report published? I find it was published on the 31st December of last year. But surely it has been the duty of the Government to be considering that question from then until now; and if, from the 31st December of last year to the end of May of the present year, they cannot make up their minds as to what they are going to do with regard to the Report of the Committee, I should like to know how long a period they will take to go successfully through that operation. The first excuse that was made was that the Minister for Agriculture was not present, an excuse which happily has been removed, and now I shall have no hesitation on this ground in entering upon this question; and as to the absence of my hon. Friend the hon. Baronet who was Chairman of this Committee (Sir John Dorington), I am quite certain, although no one knows more than he does of this question—and both he and his Colleagues deserve the thanks of the House and the country for the admirable and painstaking and most careful Report they have made on this subject—I am sure no one will be more pleased than the hon. Baronet himself, even although he is unfortunately absent this afternoon, if we can succeed in eliciting some definite statement from the Government in regard to this question. The Committee will, perhaps, recollect what was the origin of this Departmental Committee. My hon. Friend the Member for the Eccles Division made a Motion, which passed the House of Commons, I think, on the first night of last Session, by which it was agreed that a Select Committee should be appointed to examine into this question. I stated to my hon. Friend that, in many respects, I thought it was more desirable that this question should be examined into by gentlemen who were experts, and could be appointed upon a Departmental Committee; and he readily agreed to that suggestion, subject to the understanding—a pledge that I individually gave him—that the Report of that Departmental Committee should be laid upon this Table. The contention which has been held by many people with regard to the unsatisfactory position of the Ordnance Survey is, I think, more than fully borne out by the Report of the Committee. What is that position? I hope the Committee will not think I am unduly delaying them on this occasion, because this is really a matter of great importance, which has occupied public attention for several years. In order to understand the position, I think the Committee ought to be made aware of the work which is being done by the Ordnance Survey Department at present. In the first place, they are making town surveys on the scale of 126 inches to the mile. In the second place, they are making a Cadastral Survey of all cultivated land in the Kingdom on the scale of 25 inches to the mile. In the third place, they are making county maps on a scale of six inches to the mile. In the fourth place, they are making maps on a scale of one inch to the mile of all farms, one in outline with contours, and the other with hill shading. Fifthly, there is an advance edition of unengraved portions of the one-inch map, published by photo-zincography. Sixthly, there are maps of four inches to the mile. Seventhly, there are maps of 10 inches to the mile. I am bound to say that more beautiful work than has been accomplished and turned out by this Department I do not think can be found in any country in the world. But it has naturally cost the country an enormous sum of money. I am not aware of the total sum that has been expended up to the present time; but do know that in the last 10 years no less than £2,300,000 has been spent by the country upon this work. In support of the statement which I make, that no country in the world can produce better work than this, I should like to call the attention of the Committee to a statement which they will find on page 11 of this Report—

“No country at the present time possesses anything as perfect and complete as our Cadastral Survey published by the authority of the Government, and available at a moderate price to every person in the Kingdom, showing every plot of land and every isolated building, and having the new one-inch map founded upon it by the accurate copying power of the photographic lens.”

The great blot upon that work is this. In the first place, there is a great delay in the completion of the maps when the Survey is first made, and the second and worst feature of all in the present position of the Ordnance Survey Department is this: there is no complete system of revision provided for, and if revision is not carried out within a certain time after the maps have first been made a great part of that work naturally and necessarily becomes obsolete, and the advantage of that work to the public and of the money that has been spent upon it is practically thrown away altogether. I remember during last year and the year before there were great numbers of articles in the public Press which appeared constantly upon this subject, and more particularly in The Times, in which there were some most able articles; and public bodies and deputations were constantly waiting upon the Agricultural Department, and Memorials were presented pressing the urgency and importance of the work, and their complaints are more than justified by the Report which is now laid upon the Table of the House of Commons. I should like to call the attention of the Committee to a paragraph upon page 37, where they will find these words—

“The great necessities of the Survey are obviously completion and early revision, and with these necessities not even any suggested improvements should be allowed to interfere.”

They point out two things: that in the case of the large maps, which are most expensive of all, timely revision is of greater importance even than in the case of small ones; and, in the second place, the longer that revision is postponed the more costly it will be to the country in the long run. On the first point they say this—and I am sure the Committee will see the importance of it—

“We find that while the large-scale maps are excellent in quality and fully meet the purposes for which they were designed, the very largeness of the scales necessarily leads to their rapidly getting out of date.”

And they go on to say—

“This defect is most apparent in the 25·344-inch plans surveyed since 1854, and still more so in the town plans on the scale of 5 feet, 10 feet, and 10·56 feet to the mile. Scarcely any of them have been revised.”

I ask the Committee to consider what that means. Scarcely any of these maps have been revised, and that means that if the date of revision is postponed much longer they will become practically obsolete, and the whole sum of money spent on these large maps will be absolutely thrown away, and all the work will have to be gone over again. The Committee say—

“It is urgently necessary that the advantage of so splendid a work as these maps of Great Britain and Ireland undoubtedly are should not be destroyed for want of a regular system of revision.”

On the second point—namely, the increased cost of delay, nothing can be more emphatic than what is pointed out on page 11. They say—

“It has been shown in a previous paragraph that some of the 25-inch plans date from 1855, and have not been revised since. We have received evidence of the great cost entailed if the plans of the Ordnance Survey are allowed to remain for too long a period without revision, necessitating, in some cases, almost re-survey. It is evident that the revision of the 25-inch survey should be commenced without delay. We have the evidence of the Director General that if the revision of Great Britain is begun next year, it can be completed in 10 years at an extra expenditure of £630,000.”

Then comes this very important statement following upon that—

“And that a delay of even a year will materially increase the cost.”

Now, Sir, for the purpose of this very material and important work what is the sum that the Director General estimates is necessary for the next year?—

“The sum required for next year (1893-4) is £16,000, and we strongly recommend that this sum be provided”

Surely, that is not a very large demand to make, and I have felt it my duty to press this question this afternoon in the absence of any definite reply whatever from the Government; because I cannot help thinking that, unless we do press it and get an answer this afternoon, that £16,000 will not be forthcoming, and consequently a very much heavier burden, in the words of the Director General, will inevitably be laid upon the country in the future. That is the present position of affairs in regard to this matter. It is pointed out that, owing to the want of proper revision, a great deal of the work of the Survey is becoming more and more obsolete every day, a large part of the expenditure has already been thrown away and wasted, and the advantage of much of the work has been lost, and is daily being lost, to the public. That being so, we have the proposals of that Committee which is to remedy this state of things, and I am most anxious to ascertain what it is the Government really propose to do to carry out those recommendations. The President of the Board of Agriculture was good enough to tell us, with regard to the recommendation as to the maps on the one-inch scale, that many had been provided, and that he was in possession of the sum necessary to carry out this work. Upon this part of the recommendations I want some further explanation, because in the Estimates of the Surveys of the United Kingdom I find the whole increase is only £1,600. According to the estimate of the Director General contained in the Report of this Committee, the sum required for the purpose, if it is to include the Highlands, is £7,000.

MR. GARDNER (interposing) said, the Treasury had sanctioned a sum of £2,000 spread over savings in other Estimates, and also the addition of a number of engineers at an annual cost of £5,000.

*MR. CHAPLIN: I am glad to find that, so far as that part of the recommendation is concerned, the reply is satisfactory, and that we may look forward to the completion of this work. Now, I have to press him on the other point—namely, the provision of the additional £1,600, in order to start the work of providing for the revision of the maps upon the larger scale. I have already pointed out that if they are begun this year all the necessary provisions for the complete revision of the maps on the larger scale can be completed in the course of 10 years for £630,000. Then you have the evidence of the Director General, and the statement of the opinion of the Members of that Committee, that if the work is postponed even for a single year the cost must inevitably be very materially increased. I should have thought, under these circumstances, that when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had the case officially put before him, even on the ground of economy, he would see he was doing the most wise and prudent thing in sanctioning this comparatively very small expenditure in the present year. The work, sooner or later, is absolutely necessary. It cannot possibly be abandoned unless you mean to throw away all the advantage of these enormous sums of money that have been spent already on the work. The postponement of it for a single year can only add to your ultimate cost; and whether it be a Government composed of right hon. Gentlemen sitting on that Bench, or composed of those who have been and are their opponents, I am perfectly satisfied myself that a sum of money such as that I have named—namely, £16,000, could not possibly be better laid out than by providing it for starting this great work in the present year.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman has made a very interesting speech on a very important subject; but the moral of his speech, as I understand, is that this £16,000 must be provided. Well, I am sorry to say I cannot afford a Supplementary Estimate of £16,000 for this further cost, however necessary it may be; and it will be my duty—and a painful duty it will be—to resist every proposal coming either from this Bench—and more, perhaps, from this Bench than from that, for a Supplementary Estimate on any subject, and I must appeal to the rank and file of the House of Commons to defend the Chancellor of the Exchequer against demands for Supplemental Estimates from this side of the House, and especially from his Colleagues, because I am subject to that pressure every day, and I am quite certain nothing would delight the President of the Board of Agriculture more than to have this £16,000. But he knows perfectly well I am not in a position to grant it. While I entirely admit that this is a subject which might properly occupy the attention of the Government, and might well be carried out when there is an abundance of money for the purpose, I am sorry to say that the present state of finances will not permit of it. My right hon. Friend opposite is a man of great ideas, and he rolled off his tongue the sum of £630,000 as if it was nothing. He said we must begin at once, or, if not, we should have to spend a good deal more than £630,000. He says if we do not begin this year it will cost us a great deal more the year after. He does not say how much more. I am very sure we shall have the same experience as most of us have had before, of our friends coming to us and saying—"If you do not lay this out now you will have to lay out a great deal more hereafter." On the same principle people go to bazaars and other places and buy things they think hereafter will be useful; but to induce you to spend money when you have not got it with a view to saving it hereafter is, in my opinion, not a wise principle. We do not disparage the object, but, on the contrary, are anxious to see this great undertaking carried on in the manner in which it has been carried on in the past—most satisfactorily. My right hon. Friend says—"You will need constant revision." That, of course, is very true as to the large maps; but these large-scale maps are not the maps which are used by the greatest number. They are principally useful to land surveyors and owners of land, and the large town maps are principally useful to Town Councils, &c. Still, I do not desire that this work should be in any way postponed; but if what my right hon. Friend desires is a Supplemental Estimate this year for the Survey, all I can say is, I am very sorry we cannot afford it, and I shall have to oppose any proposal of that kind.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) said, this question was one which was apparently of some importance to the country, because last Session they had an important Departmental Committee to consider the question in all its bearings. That Departmental Committee, having considered the question with great care, made some valuable recommendations from various points of view. The Committee sat no fewer than 18 times; they carefully examined the witnesses, and afterwards drew up an important and exhaustive Report. They had no knowledge of what might occur during the next two months, when they might not have an opportunity of looking into this or any other question; and, therefore, it was necessary that they should discuss the matter now. Speaking as a town Member, he urged that it was very desirable, for the purposes of the County Councils and Local Governing Bodies in London and elsewhere, that they should have a good, thorough, and up-to-date survey of the various towns in the United Kingdom; and the great fault the Committee found with the surveys, especially the 25-inch surveys, was that they were always out of date. It took such a long time to complete the survey, that when they finished in one part of the country, practically the survey was altogether out of date in another part of the country. Among other recommendations of the Committee was one that there should be a descriptive handbook published respecting the signs on these maps; but the object aimed at would probably be better carried out by not having a descriptive handbook, but where practicable, at the foot of each map, a description of the signs on that map. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said the large survey was of no value, except to a very limited class of individuals. Was it not one of the objects of right hon. Gentlemen opposite to simplify the transfer of land in the United Kingdom; and was there any better way of attaining that object than by having adequate maps of the whole of the land in the United Kingdom, by which the buyer and seller could see the property in which they were interested? He did not see how there could be any objection to having these maps prepared with greater celerity. He recommended that steps should be taken to secure that maps of every part of the United Kingdom should be easily purchasable in London. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) had referred to the fact that the maps were well made, and undoubtedly worthy of the country. That might be as to the larger maps, but he would point out, with regard to the smaller maps, that they were not nearly so accurate nor so useful for general purposes as the maps used in Continental countries—as, for example, in France and Germany—and he would urge upon the Government that the latter class of maps ought to be procured. It was for the Government to set the standard in the matter of maps. At the present time the teaching of geography was not satisfactory, since it was conducted without any first-class physical map of the United Kingdom. He also hoped that a change would be made in appointing the heads of the Survey Department, as the existing system of giving promotion to various distinguished officers of Engineers was not to the advantage of the Survey. The consequence of the system was that many of the heads of the Department were changed, and a Survey conducted in this manner could not be as efficient as it ought to be, and he would even say that they could see the difference in the work if they examined the present maps and compared their indications of mountains and rivers with those of earlier maps of the Survey. This might not be a burning question at the present time, but he would nevertheless urge it upon the right hon. Gentleman on the Treasury Bench, whom he would remind that, although the Chancellor of the Exchequer had pointed out that they had not such a good Budget as last year, they were asked to provide £35,000 towards this Survey. He thought they should see that the maps had all clear representation of physical features of the country and that they should be properly shaded. He thought also that the other portions of the improvements suggested by the Committee should be carried out. He had not the honour to be a Member of that Committee, but, no doubt, if this question came up again at a later period of the Session, hon. Gentlemen who were Members would be able to place their views before them. In the meantime, he hoped the Government would provide proper maps, and that they would also provide that the series should be out in a reasonable time, so that the later one might not be altogether new, while the earlier ones were absolutely old. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite might also say, he thought, whether they could not issue the popular maps of the same class as in foreign countries.

*MR. J. G. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) said, he would only trouble the Committee for a moment, to say a word with regard to the footpaths and roads in the Highlands of Scotland.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, he rose to Order. He had a reduction to move regarding lighthouses, and he wanted to know whether this discussion would affect his proposed action?

*MR. WEIR said, this was a very important matter affecting the Highlands of Scotland; and if the hon. Gentleman the Member for King's Lynn understood the question he would not try to prevent him (Mr. Weir) saying a few words on the subject to which he referred. He feared the hon. Member (Mr. Bowles) had not read the Report of the Agricultural Committee, and consequently was quite unacquainted with the question of roads and footpaths in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland. He wished to call attention to the fact that there were many old roads in Scotland which were now covered over with heather as a consequence of the clearances of the people by the Highland landlords for the purpose of creating deer-forests. It was a sad state of matters when macadamised roads, as shown by the Report, were overgrown with heather and almost undistinguishable. The people had been evicted from their homes, and the roads and footpaths had been enclosed by the robber landlords of the North. He desired that these and other old roads and footpaths should be shown on the maps, so that the people might know where they were. Many of these roads were closed by the landlords, and it was only right that the Government should do all they could to have them shown or indexed on any revision that might be made of the maps of this part of the country.

Mr. R. G. Webster

MR. TANKERVILLE CHAMBERLAYNE (Southampton) said, they had heard a good deal that afternoon about maps and survey, and he should now like to say something about what he submitted was at least of equal importance. He desired to call attention to a grievance of which he thought employés in the Ordnance Survey Department very justly complained. He believed there were many people—he was not referring to hon. Members of that House, as they were, of course, well informed on every subject; but he was referring to people in the country—who knew as much about the work done by the Ordnance Survey as they did about the duties of an Archdeacon. Well, he could tell those people that the Ordnance Survey work was in the highest degree valuable, useful, and scientific; and that special, or, he might say, unique, qualifications were necessary to enable the employés satisfactorily to perform this work. There were in the Department what were called Civil Assistants. These were divided into two classes—the Permanent Civil Assistants and the Temporary Civil Assistants. They resembled each other in every particular save one; the rank was the same, the qualifications were the same, the remuneration was the same; they were taken on at the same age—some mere lads, and they were retired at the same age, 60; but there was this all-important difference: that the so-called Permanent Civil Assistants received a retiring pension, whilst the so-called Temporary Civil Assistants were retired without one. There was one rather curious circumstance in connection with this arrangement. The Permanent men—that was, the class entitled to pensions—were being gradually reduced in numbers, and the Temporary—the class not entitled to pensions—was being as gradually, or rather more rapidly, increased in numbers. Figures would prove the truth of this: In 1878 there were in the Department 578 Civil Assistants entitled to pensions and 349 not so entitled; and in 1891 there were 321 entitled to pensions and 1,200 not so entitled. Now, he did not want for a moment to ascribe this arrangement to a desire to evade the liability to grant pensions. He had no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture would presently tell them it was due to a more honourable and generous motive, but they would not be surprised if an impression prevailed somewhat extensively that it was due to some cheese-paring influence. This, he took it, was certain—that if such a system were in vogue in connection with any private firm or public company, many of them would feel disposed to call it a dodge to save the pension money. And such a state of things involved a peculiar hardship so far as the Ordnance Survey servants were concerned. Their work, as he said just now, was sui generis. The qualifications for it, and the experience gained at it, are alike useless when, after devoting the best years of his life to it, a man was compelled to seek employment elsewhere. He was suddenly transferred from a position of competency and comfort to what, in many cases, was one bordering on destitution. He himself had had piteous appeals from persons so situated, and he confessed to a feeling of something like indignation when he found that men who had served the Crown long and faithfully were turned adrift in what seemed to him to be a heartless and ungenerous manner. He hoped it would not be said, in reply, that these men ought to save up while in work, and so provide for the requirements of old age. This would be adding insult to injury, for the remuneration was not sufficient, and in many cases the men were married and had families. Again, it must not be forgotten that the same restrictions applicable to other Civil Service servants were imposed on those men—for instance, they were not allowed to keep a shop or carry on any business during their spare time. This arrangement might be fair enough with those who were provided for by the State in their old age, but it was exceedingly hard on these men who were thus deprived of their only chance of saving a few pounds. Neither, he hoped, should he be told that there was no hardship, inasmuch as the men belonging to this class knew from the first that they would not be entitled to a pension eventually. First, if this were said the country would learn that Her Majesty's Government offered work to men on condition that they would not ask for or expect pensions; and, secondly, it would not be strictly true, as these Temporary Civil Assistants had been told, that some of them would be added to the Pension List, and, though it might be a case of many called and few chosen, yet it was human nature for every man to think he might be one of the lucky ones, and so take his chance. There was a Departmental Committee appointed under the late Government to consider various matters with regard to the Ordnance Survey. It consisted of Colonel Leach, Permanent Secretary to the Board of Agriculture; Mr. Primrose, from the Board of Works; and a gentleman from the Treasury; and a deputation of the Civil Assistants waited on this Committee, and were distinctly told by Colonel Leach—

“That it was probable a certain number of the men with the longest service would be put on the Government List.”

This he (Mr. Chamberlayne) maintained was a direct inducement for the men to accept work. Also, in the Report issued by this Committee on page 14 it was stated—

“The question of superannuation is not one of the points referred to us for consideration, but several protests were made by the witnesses against its exclusion, and we think it right to draw attention to the fact that this question is obviously the one considered of most importance by the Temporary Civil Assistants. In 1891 there were approximately 300 Civil Assistants and 1,350 Temporary Civil Assistants. The former are gradually diminishing in numbers, and, under the present rules, will eventually disappear.”

Now, perhaps the Government might say in self-defence that herein was no hardship—a certain class of workmen had been abolished and another constituted—but he submitted that would be an evasion and not a fair explanation. Really the same class still existed, the difference being that whereas formerly pensions were granted after the qualifying period of service, now and from henceforth no pensions would be given. The Report went on to say—

“As the Survey will require continuous revision and re-publication, it will have to be maintained as a Permanent Department, and in these circumstances it may be expected that, sooner or later, the question of superannuation must arise in respect of these Civil Assistants who may be employed in a permanent capacity.”

There was a certain ambiguity about these words “permanent capacity,” but he submitted that a man who had worked for the same employer from his youth till he had reached the age of 60 was entitled to call himself a "permanent employé." Well, what these men respectfully asked was that the words "Permanent and Temporary" might be obliterated and expunged, and that there should be one class of Civil Assistants, the members of which should be entitled to a pension on retirement. He did not think he should appeal on their behalf in vain, because the Members of Her Majesty's Government had often expressed themselves as favourably disposed towards this question of pensions for aged working men; and the Prime Minister (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) had more than once spoken in approval of it. He was sure that the attitude taken up by right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite with regard to this matter, before and after the last Election—chiefly, by-the-bye, before—gave considerable satisfaction in the country, and all eyes were now turned towards the Government to see if their action would justify their words. He thought more reliance would be placed on their protestations, and more faith in their promises, if they would themselves set a good example and treat their own employés fairly and generously.

MR. FRANCIS H. EVANS (Southampton) said, his experience was that these sympathetic appeals to the Chancellor of the Exchequer never brought much money out of his pocket. He had taken a great interest in the question raised by his Colleague in the representation of Southampton. These men were placed in the Survey in 1871—only to be temporary hands, he believed; but as the work grew heavier, and the demands on the Survey increased in importance, it was found necessary to place them on the permanent staff. They were led to believe that as time went on pensions would be granted; and a deputation waited on the Departmental Committee the delegates pointing out the claims that the men had upon the Government. The then Chairman of the Committee admitted the justice of these claims, and said they would be considered—at least, that was the interpretation put upon what he said, that a certain number of men with the longest terms of service would be placed on the permanent list. The position of these men was very similar to that of the men employed in the Dockyards, and he was of opinion that they had equally valid claims to consideration. What was granted in the one case ought to be granted in the other. If the right hon. Gentleman representing the Government would look into the matter he would see that these men were not receiving the same consideration as the Dockyard employés. As he had said, he had taken these men under his own care, but since his Colleague on the other side of the House had brought the question forward, he had decided to support him, in the hope that he might succeed in getting something done. The matter was in the hands of the Department at the present time; but he would support the hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. Chamberlayne) not on the ground of sympathy, but because the claims of the men to superannuation were just and right.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden) said, he thought he ought to offer a few words in regard to the men of whom the hon. Gentlemen representing Southampton had spoken. A Committee was appointed in June, 1891, to inquire into the status of the employés; that Committee reported, and the recommendations contained in the Report as to pay, promotion, travelling allowances, sick pay, legal holidays, and other matters of importance had been—with some slight qualification in favour of the men of the Survey—carried into effect in September and November of 1892. With regard to superannuation, he would remind hon. Gentlemen that this was a matter which was not referred to the Departmental Committee, as it was contrary to practice so to refer matters of that character, the Treasury being entrusted by Parliament with the control of the Pension Vote. Hon. Gentlemen would therefore see that no decision could have been arrived at on the question of superannuation by the Committee. He might say, however, that representations were made to him on the subject by the Junior Member for Southampton (Mr. F. H. Evans), which he had, as in duty bound, forwarded to the Treasury, and they were under the consideration of the Treasury at the present time. He would like to point out that, as matters stood, the men were not thrown out—turned adrift—in the manner in which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Southampton seemed to fancy. If there was no system of superannuation for certain classes of men there was a system by which gratuities were awarded to those who were not entitled to pensions. The basis on which the gratuity was calculated was never less than £1 for each year's service; and he found that in the past three years a substantial number of claims of this kind—24 one year and 15 the second—had been admitted. He thought hon. Gentlemen would admit that these men, having received various gratuities from the Government, were not so absolutely destitute as the hon. Gentlemen who had spoken would endeavour to make them believe. The representations made to him had been for some time under the consideration of the Treasury, and he hoped soon to be in a position to give further information on the subject.

MR. T. CHAMBERLAYNE said, he was obliged for the reply of the right hon. Gentleman, but, at the same time, he did not see how the gratuities granted could be of any use to an aged workman retiring after 60 years' service. He must, therefore, move the reduction of the Vote by £1,000. He was sorry to have to put the Committee to the trouble of a Division; but this was the first time the question of old-age pensions had been before the House this Session, and the country would desire to know what the attitude of the Government was on the subject.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £35,000, for Surveys of the United Kingdom, be reduced by the sum of £1,000."—(Mr. Tankerville Chamberlayne.)

MR. R. G. WEBSTER said, they had no information from the right hon. Gentleman who had addressed the Committee as to whether the recommendations which had been sent forward would be carried into effect if agreed to by the Treasury. For this reason he would support the Amendment.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 96; Noes 185.—(Division List, No. 96.)

VOL. XII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

Original Question again proposed.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he desired to call attention to a most important subject as affecting the commercial interests of this country, and especially as affecting the Department of the President of the Board of Trade; that was to say, "Harbours and Foreign Lighthouses," or lighthouses abroad. He did not wish to deal with harbours, but as to the lighthouses under the Board of Trade he had a great deal to say. [Ironical cheers.] Yes, he had a great deal to say; but with his usual consideration for the Committee he would make his observations as brief as possible. Lighthouses were everywhere important, but their importance was greatest of all when the lighthouses were in foreign parts and maintained by the Board of Trade of this country. The mere fact that it was considered necessary by this country to keep up lighthouses in the West Indies and on the coast of South America was a proof of the importance attaching to these particular lighthouses. He need not tell the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade how important it was that the lights in these lighthouses should be of adequate force and easily distinguishable from other lights, and kept up in a proper and efficient manner. The right hon. Gentleman knew as well as he (Mr. Bowles) did the stress that was laid on the seaman when, after long hours of watching, he came to a spot in which he ought to be under the rays of a certain light, but failed to find that light. He knew that oftentimes the skipper was obliged to go to the mast-head to find the light his mate was unable to discover, and he was aware how important it was at all times that the lights should be in proper order. There were lights of various kinds; but, broadly speaking, the lights in ordinary use were of two kinds—the catoptric, which was a system of reflection, and the dioptric, which was a system by which the rays were brought together by reflection through convergent glasses. It was of the highest importance that the light suitable to a certain place should be set up in that place. It was equally important that the distinguishing period of the light—that was to say, the interval between the flashes—should be strictly adhered to. The precise duration of the interval was, as a rule, the only means the mariner had of distinguishing whether or not the light he saw was the one he was in search of. On one occasion the regularity and exactitude of a light at sea undoubtedly saved his life, and on another occasion irregularity as certainly very nearly lost it. Once on the coast of Syria, after battling with the breeze three days and three nights, never having been in bed, he came to a light, but, in consequence of its irregularity, could not tell whether it was on Mount Carmel or at Beyrout. The interval between the flashes in the case of the Mount Carmel light was $1\frac{1}{2}$ minutes, and in the case of the Beyrout light 2 minutes; but the interval in the case of the light he saw was $1\frac{1}{2}$ minutes. The point for him to decide had been whether the Mount Carmel light was going too fast, or whether the Beyrout light was not going fast enough—and to show the importance of the question to him the safety not only of himself and of the vessel he commanded, but also that of his children, was at stake. If he had been mistaken in deciding that the light was that of Mount Carmel he would have borne up under it, and they would all, inevitably, have been lost. The Board of Trade in connection with these foreign lights did not do its duty. The first item among these lights was the Inagua, in the Bahamas. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, who was familiar with bankruptcy matters, patents, labour questions, and shipping, of course knew all about this light which was on the Inagua Island. It was a white light revolving at intervals of one minute, and should be visible at a distance of 17 miles. Well, he was credibly informed that it was not visible at 17 miles distance, and that, so far from revolving at its proper interval of one minute, it was extremely irregular, the interval being sometimes over a minute and sometimes under. The light had been reported irregular ever since 1890; but the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had never had it set right to this day. [Laughter.] Yes; the right hon. Gentleman was the responsible person. His was the salary he (Mr. Bowles) would have to reduce, and he was the person to see that this light was set right. There was the testimony of the Admiralty light list to show that this light was irregular. On the Caicos Island there was a white fixed light for which the President of the Board of Trade was responsible. The right hon. Gentleman was only responsible for 13 lights, the Trinity House being responsible for the general system of lights round this country. The Trinity House did its work admirably, because it was composed of trained practical men. What he contended was that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, in this matter of lights, did not do his work thoroughly. The Admiralty light list informed them that this light under the Caicos Island was not to be depended upon. On the Grand Turk Island there was another light which was not to be depended upon. There was an additional light promised in the Bahamas—on Beacon Cay—which had not yet been set up, and he should like to know whether it was really intended to provide this light? He had now done with the Bahamas and he came to the Lower Antilles. There was a light on Sombrero Island—a white reflecting dioptric light of the second order; but he maintained that it should be of the first order. This Sombrero light, which was inadequate under any circumstances, had been reported irregular ever since 1892. What had the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade done to remedy that irregularity? He (Mr. Bowles) had brought before the House four cases of irregularity out of 13 cases altogether, and he had also to make a serious complaint as to the light at Cape Pembroke on the Falkland Islands. This was the only light in that part of the world, and it was of the utmost importance that it should be a good and sufficient light, and of the first order. It was an ordinary reflecting dioptric light, and, no doubt, of the first order of dioptric lights; but his contention was that it should be a catoptric light of the first order. Instead of being visible for only 14 miles, this light should be visible for 20 miles. The lights round the coasts of Great Britain were as good as any lights in the world—possibly the French lights were a shade better; but he believed that our lights were, on the whole, as good as need be. And they had been managed for centuries by practical men. The Trinity House was responsible for them, and the Trinity House took care to see that there was no irregularity or inadequacy about them, and that complete dependence might be placed upon them and the fog signals, and all the other complicated apparatus they had to keep in order. But this could not be said of the lights of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. His lights were always wrong. If they were to have lights abroad it was necessary that they should be under the management of people who knew what lights were, and not of people who did not know the difference between a jibboom and a sextant. Let the lights be attended to by men who had experience and knowledge of such things, and who, if there were defects, would know how to remedy them. Do not let a right hon. Gentleman be responsible for them who already had too much to do for his salary—a landman, who was already a professor of bankruptcy and labour. He (Mr. Bowles) did not mean to labour this question, as there were others who understood it as well as he did, and, no doubt, would want to say something upon it. What he maintained was that the right hon. Gentleman's lights were in many cases inadequate and in many cases irregular, the reason being that in every case they were under the wrong Department. Instead of being under the President of the Board of Trade, they should be under the Trinity House. It was extremely likely that the right hon. Gentleman would agree with him that this was not business which should be carried on under the Board of Trade. If so, it was to be hoped the right hon. Gentleman would agree with him in another matter he intended to bring under notice later on—namely, the treatment of the Trinity House with regard to its funds. The Trinity House could not take charge of these lights, as it had not sufficient revenue. The President of the Board of Trade had £120,000 a year which belonged to the Trinity House. Stimulated by the example of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who put his hand into the Treasury Chest, the right hon. Gentleman put his hand upon the funds of the Trinity House levied from dead sailors' wages and light dues, and paid clerks with that which ought to go towards expenses of lights. The right hon. Gentleman would admit that he did not know much about lights, and, no doubt, he would rather have them managed by the Trinity Board. Let him, then, set his face against what might almost be termed the malversation of these funds levied on shipping, and let him see that the money was handed over to the Trinity Board, not only to maintain those lights already in existence, but to establish others wherever they might be needed. He hoped that he should not be forced to move a reduction in the Vote.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside) said, that the foreign lights under the control of the Board of Trade were very few in number, and the complaint made by the hon. Gentleman was the first he had heard with regard to them. If the hon. Gentleman was so patriotic that he wished to have the lights increased in quality and regularity, why had he not brought the subject before the Board of Trade, either by putting a question on the Paper or in some other way? The matter had been sprung upon the Committee without the slightest notice. All he could, under the circumstances, reply to the hon. Gentleman was that if he had any complaint to make regarding the lights the Board of Trade would be very happy to receive it, and to refer it to scientific authorities who knew more about the subject than he (Mr. Mundella) did.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he had brought the subject forward in the proper way on the Vote which related to it. In his opinion, one of the first duties of Members of Parliament was to attack defective administration, and he thought that when he found a large sum of money was spent on lights that were not adequate he was bound to draw attention to the matter. The right hon. Gentleman practically admitted the whole of his contention; and, therefore, he admitted that he was going on presenting dangerous lights to British and foreign seamen. The right hon. Gentleman said he had had no complaints before; but he ought to have known the state of affairs, whether he had complaints or not. It was not his (Mr. Bowles's) business to go about the world finding out defects in the Board of Trade's lights and reporting them to the right hon. Gentleman. It was the right hon. Gentleman's business to go about seeing that his lights were right. The attitude of the right hon. Gentleman, and his entire want of knowledge on the subject, were so serious to the seamen of the whole world that he felt bound to move the reduction of the Vote by £500.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That the Item of £2,000, for Harbours, &c., under the Board of Trade, and Lighthouses Abroad, be reduced by the sum of £500."—(Mr. Gibson Bowles.)

The Committee divided :—Ayes 95 ; Noes 191.—(Division List, No. 97.)

Original Question again proposed.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall) said, he wished to ask for some explanation of the Vote for Peterhead Harbour. That Vote had appeared now for a considerable number of years. The total Estimate for the work was £750,000, of which £226,000 had been already expended. It would thus be seen that the work, the value of which was extremely problematical, was progressing very slowly. The amount required for next year was £29,800, and £13,183 was put down for this year. [Mr. E. ROBERTSON dissented.] Well, at all events, between £25,000 and £30,000 was apparently being spent upon the work every year. He thought the Committee was, under these circumstances, entitled to some explanation of the way in which the construction of the harbour was proceeding. The work was very costly, and it was going forward at the slowest possible rate. In other words, the work was being proceeded with in a way that was bound to result in the maximum of expenditure with the minimum of advantage. Any gentleman who knew the principle on which works of this kind were constructed would see that for a harbour which was to cost about three-quarters of a million sterling to be built at the rate of £29,000 a year was a practical absurdity. It would be very much wiser for the Government to give up the work and to save the half-million of money which had not yet been expended than to proceed with the undertaking at its present slow rate of progress.

Mr. Gibson Bowles

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee) said, the hon. Gentleman had invited him to deal with two questions. One of these was a question of principle, and the other related to the slow rate of progress at which the work of constructing the harbour was proceeding. It would be hardly fair to call upon him (Mr. Robertson) to explain the principle of the work. The value of the harbour, no doubt, might be problematical ; but the policy and principle of the work was settled nearly 10 years ago. He was not aware that the Vote was to be challenged, and he must respectfully decline to enter into any inquiry at the present moment as to the value of the work. The hon. Gentleman himself was responsible for the Vote during the last six years.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : I have steadily protested against it.

MR. E. ROBERTSON said, if the hon. Member had steadily protested against a Vote he was officially bound to defend, such an extraordinary failure of official duty on his part had certainly escaped his (Mr. Robertson's) notice. The hon. Gentleman also challenged the rate of progress at which the work was proceeding. On this point he had made some mistakes with regard to facts. The £13,000 he had mentioned was entirely wrong. The amount asked for this year for the work was £29,000 ; and in view of the criticisms now indulged in by the hon. Gentleman, it was astounding to learn that £29,000 was the amount which had been asked for every year during all the years in which the hon. Member had been himself responsible for the Vote. The present Government were asking for exactly the same contribution as the late Government had asked for ; and if there was anything wrong in this demand he must ask the hon. Gentleman to settle the question with his former Colleagues in the Admiralty.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he, of course, apologised to the hon. Gentleman for not having given him notice of the question. He had not known that the item was to be brought forward to-day ; but as soon as he found it on the Paper he gave notice to the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Sir J. Hibbert) that he intended to raise the point. The hon. Gentleman who had just spoken was quite mistaken when he said that he (Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett), or any other Member of the late Board of Admiralty, was responsible for this Vote. The Admiralty was only responsible for the execution of the details of work which was settled by the Treasury, and had nothing to do with settling the amount expended year by year. Of course, as long as he was a Member of the late Government he could have no means of protesting in the House against the Vote; but he had on all occasions in his power pointed out the unpractical way in which the work was undertaken, and was being conducted. He should be very happy, when the opportunity offered, of endeavouring to impeach the policy of the Vote. In the meantime, he must ask the supporters of the Government to reflect for a moment upon the admissions made by the hon. Gentleman who had defended the item. The work was decided upon some years ago, and was to cost about £750,000. Up to the present time less than one-third of the work had been completed, and at the present rate the harbour would not be finished for another 20 years. Only £29,000 a year was being expended on the work. If it was to be proceeded with at such a rate he could only say that such a policy involved the maximum of expenditure with the minimum of advantage.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The course which the hon. Member has taken, and the manner in which he has dealt with this Vote, is certainly a matter for surprise. We have observed that for several years he has been continuously silent, and it now appears that all that time he was meditating on the misdeeds of the Government, and particularly of the Department for which he himself was responsible. But now that he is no longer in an official position, he finds himself able to indulge in what Lord Beaconsfield once called "a wild shriek of liberty," and he protests against a policy which was pursued when he sat on the Treasury Bench, but which it now appears he always condemned. The hon. Member's conduct is, in my opinion, absolutely inconsistent with the established usages of administration in this country, and most demoralising to the Administration. If subordinate Members of a Government acquiesce in matters of which they disapprove they should for ever after hold their peace. They cannot enter into matrimonial connections with a Government when in Office, and then, when out of Office, proceed on principles of free love. You cannot have your cake and at the same time eat your cake. A subordinate Member of a Government who keeps silence whilst his Government remain in power ought not, when it ceases to do so, to come forward and condemn the conduct of those who have been his Colleagues. The adoption of tactics of that kind can only destroy the honourable understanding on which business is conducted in this country. This is the first occasion when I have known such a course to be pursued, and I hope it will be the last. During the 25 years I have been a Member of this House I have never before heard a subordinate Member of a past Government protest against and condemn a policy for which that Government was as responsible as its successor. I wish before sitting down to remind the Committee that, in order that the law may be complied with, this Vote must be passed to-night and reported to-morrow; and therefore, with all due submission, I would suggest that the Committee should be allowed to pass on to the discussion of matters more important than some of those which have hitherto occupied our attention. Large payments must be made at the beginning of June in connection with the Education Department, the Prisons Department, and the Irish Constabulary. These payments cannot be made until the Vote has passed through all the necessary stages and the Royal signature obtained. In these circumstances I trust that the limited time at our disposal will not be wasted in discussing comparatively trivial subjects. Let us see how we can best dispose of the time which yet remains to us.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he wondered that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was himself the chief monument of inconsistency, should rate him, seeing that he had changed his policy more often than anybody else, and, after swallowing his former opinions, was now revelling in the very Parnellite juice he had once so strenuously denounced. He was not going to sit still under such a lecture. There was no ground for the ridiculous hectoring which the right hon. Gentleman had indulged in. The right hon. Gentleman was very fond of jumping on someone whenever opportunity offered; but he was not in the least affected by the stigma which the right hon. Gentleman had endeavoured thus to cast upon him. The matter to which he had drawn attention was initiated before the late Government came into Office, and the work must be carried forward under successive Governments. There was nothing improper or unusual in the course which he had taken. Had he time to examine the speeches and votes of the right hon. Gentleman during his chameleon-like career—which Heaven forefend!—he would, he was certain, find instances of inconsistency on the right hon. Gentleman's part which would eclipse altogether the inconsistency which the right hon. Gentleman had attributed to him.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.) said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had reminded them that they only had one night in which to discuss the Vote on Account, and he would at once point out that that was the fault of the Government itself, as the Vote might have been brought forward on the day before the holidays. He was himself very unwilling to raise any question unnecessarily; but there was a matter in which he took considerable interest, and he felt he was obliged to seize this opportunity of bringing it under the notice of the Committee. He wished to draw attention to the question of the employment of soldiers and sailors on the completion of their service in the Civil Departments of the State.

*MR. A. C. MORTON: I rise to Order. I want to raise a question on Class II., which refers to the officers of the House of Lords, which has priority, I think, over the subject to which the right hon. Baronet refers.

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I do not propose to trouble the Committee to go to a Division—

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries): Did not the late Chairman of Committees lay down a Rule that when once a Vote had been discussed it was out of Order to touch on Votes which preceded it?

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): I want to raise a question on Class I. as to rates on Government property. I think that that has priority over the subject referred to by the hon. Member for Peterborough.

Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett

THE CHAIRMAN: If the right hon. Baronet likes to give way there can be no objection to the hon. Member for Peterborough raising the question he wishes to. As to the point of Order, I would remind the hon. Member that no Amendment has been moved.

*MR. A. C. MORTON: Then can we go back to Votes which have been passed over?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I should like to ask your ruling. Are we to have discussions without Amendments being moved, and without limit? If we are, and if hon. Members are to be allowed to go back to Votes already passed over, we shall never get on. We ought, surely, to pass the Votes in their order.

LORD G. HAMILTON (Middlesex, Ealing): If my right hon. Friend makes a speech on the subject to which he is calling attention, and that is followed up by a speech from another hon. Member on the same topic and with an Amendment in connection with it, would not that prevent any discussion on Votes preceding this one?

THE CHAIRMAN: Certainly it would. I certainly agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it is most desirable that the Votes should be taken in their order. The difficulty here is that hon. Members have not given notice of their intention to move Amendments, and it is not easy to see that the subjects are raised in their proper order.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Would it not be proper that each Vote should be taken in its turn?

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS said, he wished to refer to a subject connected with Vote 13 in Class I. (Rates on Government Property). This Vote involved a sum amounting, in the aggregate, to nearly £250,000. As they knew, Government property was not legally liable to rating. This Vote of nearly £250,000 was, therefore, a voluntary contribution by the House in aid of local and municipal rates. If he was correctly informed, a considerable part of this sum was given in aid of rates levied for the purposes of the Church of England. If so, that was a case of the "free love" to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had recently referred. The present Government, with the aid of about 60

Roman Catholic Members from Ireland, were seeking to disestablish two Protestant Churches in this country, and yet they were, apparently, willing to aid one of these Churches out of public moneys. The position of the Government appeared to be anomalous, and he hoped an explanation might be given. He did not see how the Government could accept the principle of Disestablishment, and, at the same time, ask the House to pass Estimates which included voluntary payments on behalf of the State Church. He wished to ask—aye or no—did this Vote contain any sum which would be a voluntary payment to the Established Church?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, that if the hon. Member had given him notice he would have obtained for him all the information that was possible. [Sir J. GORST: Oh, oh!] Well, they could not be expected to be conversant with, and able to give full information on, every matter of detail connected with the Estimates, unless they were informed beforehand that the information was required. Personally, he could not say whether any such voluntary payments were made to the Church of England or not; but the Government paid wherever a private person would be compelled to pay, and as a private person was not compelled to make a voluntary payment, he should, therefore, argue that the probability was that no payment was made. He would obtain the information, and give it to the hon. Member on the Report. That was the only way in which he could answer the question.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University) said, the ejaculation which he interposed in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman had not for its object to suggest that it was unreasonable to ask for notice; but it was to show his surprise that the Government should complain of the absence of notice. The Vote on Account was not delivered until after the House had risen for the Recess, and, therefore, it was impossible for hon. Members to give notice. He protested against the Government, under those circumstances, complaining of want of notice. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet and himself were the only Members who had notices on the Paper, and they were put down on speculation. The extraordinary and unusual course pursued by the Government had made it absolutely impossible to give notice.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, that on general subjects notice was not always necessary; but this matter was really one of detail, which he was not able to answer without notice. He thought that most Members knew that the Vote on Account referred to every Vote which had not been passed; and, consequently, it would not have been difficult for anyone who wished to bring forward any question to put down notice.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said, he had had every intention to give ample notice; but he had found it impossible, in accordance with the Forms of the House, to do so. He had put down two Notices dealing with the Vote on Account, and he found it impossible to indicate, otherwise than in a general way, the points he desired to bring before the Committee.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS said, it was impossible for him to have given the right hon. Gentleman notice, because he had not himself observed that the question of rates was to be dealt with by the Estimates until just before he rose. He could tell the Committee, although the right hon. Gentleman could not, that this Vote contained money which was to be devoted to the ordinary purposes of the Church of England, and that it contained voluntary payments recommended by the Government. He was not now complaining of this payment; but his contention was that such payment was an inconsistent one for the Government to make.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): Who makes the payment?

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS: That is not the point. If I am correctly informed, this Vote contains payments made in certain localities for the purposes of the Church of England.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER said, the hon. Gentleman misunderstood his point. He asserted that the payment was made, and what he desired to know was by whom it was made? An objection had been raised in this House against Government property being exempted from the payment of local rates; and the Government, while not admitting that it should be rated in the same way as any other property, consented to make payments to the various Local Authorities in lieu of rates. The money was handed over to Town Councils and other Local Bodies. This contribution could only be dealt with by the Local Authorities for local purposes, for which rates were levied.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS said, it made no difference who actually made the payment. He thought the Government ought to ascertain the kind of rate to which it was contributing; and if it discovered that it was contributing any money in aid of the Church of England then it should take care to deduct such amount. He would take a hypothetical case. Supposing one authority claimed a grant of £10,000, and it was found that one-tenth of that money would be handed over for the purposes of the Established Church, would it not be the duty of the Government to say—"No; you shall only have £9,000. We will not give you the £1,000 which you propose to pay over to the Church." It surely made no difference who paid the money. If the Government contributed to Church rates then it was acting inconsistently.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he wished to know, with regard to the series of dynamite explosions in Dublin, whether any measures were being taken to protect more efficiently the public buildings in that city; and whether it was proposed to offer any reward for the discovery of the guilty persons, who were supposed to be a very small body probably unconnected with any political organisation? He believed an inquiry had already been held under the Explosives Act, and he wished to know what precautionary measures were to be taken? He also wished to know whether there was any provision in the Estimates for the completion of the roofing of the Carlisle Pier where the mails were landed, and whether the work would be carried out this year? He had now been drawing attention to this question for several years. It took him three Sessions to find out what Department was responsible for the work, and having ascertained that it was the Treasury he had next to convince the Postmaster General that the mails suffered damage by being landed on the unprotected pier in bad weather. The amount required for the completion of the covering was very small indeed.

Mr. H. H. Fowler

The sum required for this very necessary work was not large—about £2,000, he believed.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): More.

MR. MACARTNEY said, it could not be more than £3,000. The Board of Works made preparations to begin, and then left off the work. He thought he might appeal to the right hon. Gentleman's own experience, and he was sure—he was convinced—that the carriage of the mails—and mails were liable to get injured if not destroyed by exposure—would be facilitated by the completion of this work.

MR. J. MORLEY said, in answer to the question put regarding the offering of rewards for the discovery of the perpetrators of explosions, that the subject was fully considered on the occasion of the explosion last Christmas; and that it was also considered by the last Government, when the same conclusion was arrived at. He had read very carefully the arguments which had weighed with successive Home Secretaries in the matter, and the opinion had uniformly been held that the offer of rewards was a system which did not produce good results. More likely than not, the offer of a reward would be accompanied by serious drawbacks. One drawback was that those whose duty it was to investigate crimes might wait till the reward was offered before taking action. Again, it was undoubtedly the fact that in the Colonies, and sometimes in this country, stimulated by the hope of reward, charges had been brought for which there was no foundation. In one or two cases actual wrong had been done to innocent persons in this way. He could assure the hon. Member that the question had been fully considered without any prejudice; and the deliberate conclusion had been come to to adhere to the principles laid down by the Home Office. Unless some strong reason should be shown on some future occasion for departing from that course, the Government would continue in it.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, that it was not possible to find money this year for the better protection of the mails at Carlisle Pier. Some other year he hoped the work would be carried out.

MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.) said, that he heard the reply of the Secretary to the Treasury with surprise. When he was at the Treasury a distinct promise was given that, if the pier were widened to accommodate two steamers, the work mentioned by the hon. Member should be performed. The pier had been widened for some time; and it was urgently necessary to make better provisions for the mails. He hoped they would have a word from the right hon. Gentleman to say that the undertaking of the Treasury would be carried out.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, he' admitted the matter was one of great urgency. It would not be lost sight of.

MR. MACARTNEY merely wished to add to what he had already said, that the improvement was very much required, and he would express a hope that the right hon. Gentleman would have the work forwarded as soon as possible.

*MR. W. KENNY (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green) said, he wished to ask, with reference to the grant of £5,000 for the building of a Lecture Theatre in connection with the Royal Dublin Society, whether the building would belong to the Society or to the Government as one of the Science and Art buildings? He would remind the Financial Secretary that the Society were also subscribing £5,000 towards the erection of this structure, and it would be desirable to know whether, if the Home Rule Bill passed, the Society would be affected in its control of the building.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, that the building would be under the control of the State. But the grant would not alter the present condition of things as between the Royal Dublin Society and the Government.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, he was greatly interested in the development of sea fisheries along the Irish coast, and he would like to put a question in connection with the Vote for Light Railways in Ireland as to whether any alteration had been made in the plan for the Skibbereen and Baltimore Light Railway? He had had a conversation with Father Davis, who had done so much to develop the fishing industry on that part of the coast, and he heard from him that the railway was to be continued to the shore, where a pier was to be built. He hoped that plan would be adhered to; but a rumour had been going the rounds that the plan was to be abandoned. If it was to be abandoned, he could only say it should not be done without very good reason. The industry of fishing in the plan depended upon the carrying out of that plan; and, if it were not carried out, the work of the last two or three years would go for nothing. He, for one, would like to see this industry developed, and he trusted to hear that the rumour was unfounded.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, that there was no grant for building the pier. The money was voted for the purposes of the railway. There was a probability that in two or three years' time the money for the pier would be found from funds devoted to such purposes. He agreed as to the necessity for connecting these light railways with piers, and would gladly do all in his power to have the work carried out at the earliest moment.

*MR. PERCY THORNTON (Clapham) said, he had had some experience in the neighbourhood, having just returned from Skibbereen, and it was felt in the district that the light railway, as it stood, was practically useless. The fishing industry at Baltimore suffered through lack of proper pier accommodation. The pier which he saw there was so high above the boats landing at it that the fish got destroyed by being thrown out upon it. It was far too high, and he should be glad if something were done to improve the method of treating the fish on landing. As he had said, the general opinion was that the railway works, if allowed to remain as they were, were practically useless. He was pleased at being able to place his views before the Committee, having promised the people at Baltimore to ventilate the matter.

SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.) rose—

*MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) also rose, stating that he did so on a point of Order.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Baronet is in possession.

*MR. A. C. MORTON: Can he enter upon the question before me?

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Baronet is in Order. He rose on two occasions, and gave way to other hon.

Members. He is entitled to be heard now.

*MR. A. C. MORTON : I wish to deal with the House of Lords. It is not quite fair. On a point of Order, Sir, will it be competent for me to deal with the question later on?

THE CHAIRMAN : I do not think the hon. Member's rights are affected.

SIR J. FERGUSSON said, he would not stand in the way of the hon. Member for more than a moment or two—provided, of course, he got a satisfactory answer to his inquiry from the Secretary to the Treasury. The question about which he wished to make inquiry was, to his mind, of extreme importance; it was one that, so far as he was individually concerned, he had dealt with while at the Post Office. The question was as to the employment in public offices of soldiers and sailors who had served their time. Very early in the Session he asked the Secretary to the Treasury whether he would lay on the Table the Report of the Treasury Committee on this subject. The right hon. Gentleman replied that the Report had been delayed by the illness of a Member of the Committee, but that when it was presented it would be laid on the Table. In Hansard the words relating to laying on the Table did not appear—they had been dropped out, which was a proof of the advantage of the present system of revision; but he had the right hon. Gentleman duly reported to that effect in The Times. Again, six weeks ago, in answer to another question, the right hon. Gentleman stated that he would consider whether the Report could be laid before Parliament. It was notorious that a great number of places in the public offices, which could be filled by soldiers and sailors, were given away by private patronage. If the right hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary would inform the Committee that the Report would be laid upon the Table he would not press the point, which otherwise he should be compelled to do.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, as to the insinuation that the report of his words in reply on a former occasion had been altered, he could say that, if there had been any alteration, it had not been made by him. He was not sure but that what he said was that he was prepared to consider whether the Report should be laid on the Table. The Treasury were now considering the Report to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred, and until some determination had been arrived at in reference to the matter he could not state positively which of the recommendations contained in the Report would be carried out. The recommendations were strongly in favour of the employment in Government Departments of retired soldiers, and he hoped that those recommendations would receive favourable consideration. With regard to laying the Report upon the Table, he could not give a distinct answer at the present time; but he would see how far he could go towards having this done.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON said, as to the report, he had understood the right hon. Gentleman on a former occasion to promise its production. He could not but regard his present reply as unsatisfactory, dealing with so important a matter as the employment of soldiers—

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : Sailors.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON said, he was most willing to include sailors; but it was to be remembered that sailors served a very long time and got good pensions, so that the smaller places did not attract them. While at the Post Office he opened all outdoor places preferentially to soldiers and sailors. It was for the interest both of the Civil Service and the Army to give them places in the Service of the country. The Reports received from the Ambassadors showed that the employment of retired soldiers was carried out much more largely by the Governments in other countries. In Austria less was done in that way than in Germany, notwithstanding that 59,000 places were held by soldiers. The system seemed to be to induce non-commissioned officers to prolong their term of service as long as possible, and a superior class of posts was reserved for them. This was what was done in Germany, and in France, and in Italy; and the result was that in each of these countries the strongest inducements were held out to good conduct in the ranks. A non-commissioned officer of not less than 12 years' service had thus absolute prospects held out to him for the future. They had 90,000 men so employed after leaving the German Army, and so it was that the Service in that country was popular. He (Sir J. Fergusson) was convinced it was the duty of the Public Departments to encourage a system of this kind; and he would add that it should not be a system founded on haphazard. Nothing would be more satisfactory to the soldier himself, if he behaved well, than that he would have a place open to him when his period of service had concluded. Why should they not give places to a number of such men in and about the Houses of Parliament, at the Foreign Office, at the Home Office, just as well as in the War Office, and at the Admiralty Offices, which, he was aware, did set an example at the present time? If they had a system of this kind in all their Departments, it would no longer be regarded as a reproach to have enlisted, and the advancement to these offices would be regarded as a reward for honourable service.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.) said, the right hon. Gentleman opposite no doubt set a good example while he was at the Post Office; but the right hon. Gentleman had no monopoly of the opinion that retired soldiers and sailors should be employed in the Civil Service, because he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) and the Government were most anxious to provide suitable employment for them. The right hon. Gentleman exaggerated when he spoke of the employment of German retired soldiers in Government Departments. In Germany, they had to bear in mind, the State had control of the railways, and, therefore, situations could always be found in connection with the railways for discharged soldiers. The Government were doing their best to induce private companies and firms to employ retired soldiers and sailors, and they were doing their best themselves to set a good example in the matter. He entirely agreed with his right hon. Friend; but the Treasury Committee had presented a Report, which was now being considered. He hoped that in these circumstances the right hon. Gentleman would have some little patience until a decision could be arrived at with regard to the recommendations in the Report.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, they were always told to have a little patience. He thought too much patience had already been exercised with regard to this question. It was not a Party question; it had been brought forward from both sides. The late Government were as much to blame in connection with it as the present Government were, and he and other hon. Members intended to bring the matter forward on every Vote that allowed of their doing so until justice was done. Both that House and the House of Lords should appoint old soldiers and sailors to be their messengers and attendants, instead of allowing butlers and other private servants to be pitchforked into such berths. The Army would benefit by this system. The Secretary for War could find employment for many men, and it would be even, from a military point of view, an advantage to him to have the men under his eye, so that he could tell whether his Reserve was at home, or whether it was in existence at all. It would be an advantage to non-commissioned officers, too; and the employment need not be confined to messengers, but might be extended to many clerkships. He went further, and said there were many other appointments that could be offered to the non-commissioned officers and men from the Army, for in these days they were as well fitted by education for these posts as many of those who obtained them by competitive examination. If they were to show a good example themselves and employ these men, they would soon find that private firms and large public companies would follow it. If it was done in Germany, where they had a conscript Army, it was much more necessary where it was a volunteer Army, as in England. Unless something were done he could promise that when the ordinary Votes in Supply came forward upon every Vote connected with the Public Departments they would raise this question, and do their best to see that these posts were filled by soldiers and sailors.

*MR. G. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) could not allow the Vote to pass without entering his protest against the suggestion that provision should be made for men because they had served in the Army or Navy. He had no desire to depreciate the fitness of these men for the work, or to do anything that might be calculated to prevent them obtaining a livelihood after they left the Service, but he entered his protest against it being thought they ought to make special provision for these men. To him it seemed that hon. Members spoke more or less in the interest of a military régime. It ought to be known to every man they had hosts of men—competent and able men—who were endeavouring to get positions in various Government Departments, and if they were to reserve posts in connection with the Government Departments for men who had chosen the Army or Navy as a profession, then he said they were entering upon a course which they did not know whither it would lead them. It must be understood that he had no objection to a man who had been in the Army or Navy getting a good position after serving his country, but what he objected to was that to follow the suggestions thrown out by more than one hon. Member might be placing them upon an inclined plane which might land them they knew not where.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) agreed with the hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Howell) that there were many of our fellow-subjects who discharged their duties in their varied walks of life satisfactorily to this country, and he wished them every prosperity during the remainder of their lives; but what the hon. Member failed to see was that those persons to whom he referred had not been engaged in the service of the State, as soldiers and sailors had been, for very small remuneration during the time they served, and it was in the public interest that every inducement should be offered to them to render that service to the State with some prospect that in after life, so far from that fact telling against them in the struggle for existence, it should be remembered to their advantage. The hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Howell) spoke of the difficulty persons had in obtaining positions in Government offices, and he thought that was one of the points that the Government would do well to bear in mind. The jobbery that took place in the endeavour to get persons into Government positions was one of the greatest nuisances with which public men had to deal, and he was not speaking from the point of view of one Party or another; but there was no doubt that a Member of Parliament was expected to get positions of trust for all the relatives of every constituent, and he was reminded not only positions of trust but positions of emolument. Governments were worried out of their existence by applications from their supporters on behalf of this description and manner of persons. If it was understood and clearly laid down that, with certain necessary exceptions, the great mass of the patronage of the State would be exercised in a sense preferential to those who served the State itself, it would put down a vast deal of jobbery, secure Ministers from a great deal of unnecessary worry, and insure the State being faithfully served by good and competent servants. He hoped the Government would not think that the disclaimer of the hon. Gentleman, no doubt in perfect good faith, represented the general sense of the Committee, but would realise that, having to deal with a volunteer Army and Navy, it was most essential that every inducement should be held out to get competent and intelligent men to join the Public Service. They could all recollect that not many years ago it was looked upon rather as a sign of going to the bad when a young man joined the Forces of the Crown; but the present generation viewed the matter in a better light. He hoped the Government would persevere with the resolution they had apparently formed, and thus relieve the Committee from the necessity of having this question again obtruded upon its notice.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, the Secretary of State for War stated that these appointments would be given to soldiers and sailors if competent; but he (Mr. Bowles) thought it should rather be sailors and soldiers if competent.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN explained that, in speaking as he did, he meant nothing disrespectful to the sailor.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES was glad that the right hon. Gentleman intended no reflection upon the sailor, for undoubtedly the sailor was the handier and better man of the two. Another thing he wished to call attention to was the delusion that seemed to prevail in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman the

Mr. G. Howell

Secretary of State for War, and also in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Manchester (Sir James Fergusson)—namely, that because the sailor served for a longer period than the soldier, and got a pension, he was not, therefore, in a position to require or wish for a position under Government. The sailor, as a rule, left the Service at the age of 40; and if he was not fit, on account of his age, for a messenger, right hon. Gentlemen were not fit at 40 for Ministers, and in that case there would be a large disappearance from the Front Bench opposite. For all purposes for which a messenger was employed the sailor was most admirably suited. It was said that the Admiralty and the War Office did all they could to get employment for their sailors and soldiers; but, so far as the Admiralty was concerned, he was afraid that was not the case. He had been to the Admiralty himself more than once to see if he could get an old sailor, and he had found the greatest difficulty to get any knowledge as to any sailor who had retired from the Service. There were an immense number of posts that might be thrown open to these men. Take the Foreign Office. At present the messengers were appointed from the hangers-on, and he thought it would be far better to give these posts, at even reduced salaries, to sailors and soldiers. He was sorry to hear the remarks that fell from the hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Howell), who seemed to set up a rivalry between the working classes and the soldier and sailor. He certainly thought those posts should be given to soldiers and sailors who had given the best years of their life to the State, for, after all, it was really a continuation of the same service. He had referred to the case of the sailor who left the Service at the age of 40; but the case for the Naval Reserve man was particularly strong, because when he left the Service he was dismissed without a pension, and, as a rule, had to live for 10 years before he received a pension. He knew many of these Naval Reserve men, and they were excellently well fitted for the post of messengers, and, furthermore, he thought they had great claims to consideration in the matter.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) was glad that several hon.

Members had been good enough to say a word on behalf of the sailor. He had not heard the speech of the hon. Gentleman who introduced the subject, but he thought it did not require much pressure on any earnest-minded man to support the argument that soldiers and sailors had a strong claim to consideration. The question was not new, for it was raised 20 years ago, when a large meeting was held on the subject at the United Service Institution, and it was then strongly forced on the attention of the various Public Departments. A sailor particularly was a handy man, and he believed it would be an economical arrangement to put sailors into these posts, because it would save them from entering into contracts for whitewashing, papering, and gilding, and these men would do it without extra pay, as they did on board ship, where all the officers found was the paint and the gold. Not only would it be a saving, but these sailors would do the work better than longshoremen; put the tools in their hands, and they would do justice to their employers, and that without asking for extra pay. He did not think it worth while to take up more time in discussing a matter that was obviously to the advantage of the Government, and he should not have spoken at all except for the remarks that had been made. When he heard his hon. Friend get up and speak about the sailor he seemed fired with a similar kind of enthusiasm, and if he had not spoken it might have been thought he had no sympathy with the sailor; and, therefore, he strongly commended the suggestion of the employment of these men to the Government.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck) wished to associate himself with the protest made by the hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Howell) against any preferential advantages being offered to any particular class in finding employment in Government Offices. A soldier or sailor, in selecting his profession in life, was governed very largely by the advantages which that profession held out to him; and when he had made his selection he (Mr. Fenwick) did not think he ought to have any preference offered to him in the shape of finding employment for him when his professional service was ended. He equally protested, with the hon. Member for Preston (Mr, Hanbury), against muddlers and hangers-on, as they had been called, being pitchforked into these positions over the heads of other men. He approved of the principle of free and open competition for Government Offices, and he should strongly protest against any preference being given either to soldiers or sailors to what was shown to ordinary civilians. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet (Mr. James Lowther) advised the Government to close this question at once if they wished to prevent criticism every time the Estimates were considered. On that point he could assure the Treasury that if they accepted the suggestion made by the right hon. Gentleman they would not have obviated their difficulties, because the opposition to such a plan would become keener and more acute every time the Estimates were considered; and he, therefore, joined in strongly protesting against any preference being given to either Army, Navy, or Naval Reserve men.

*MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea) said, that, being sympathetic to both the soldier and the sailor, he trusted the Committee would not be unsympathetic and unjust to the civilian who paid the rates, and who had a right to an equal chance of employment if it could be got. Other things being equal, the soldier and the sailor now had the advantage over the civilian from his training and discipline. He would point out to the hon. Member for Lynn (Mr. Gibson Bowles) that the sailor, though superior to the soldier, was not the man he was formerly; he was not such a good all-round man as he was 15 or 20 years ago; but even supposing he was all that was said of him, that was no reason why a man who had never been in the Service should be handicapped as he would be if facilities were to be found for the soldier and the sailor. He was astonished to hear the hon. Member for Lynn say he was in favour of employment being given to the man with a pension. He trusted the day was not far distant when plurality of offices would be done away with from the highest to the lowest, and that a man receiving a pension would not be allowed to enter into unfair competition with other men in the labour market who had no pensions. A man with a pension of from 5s. to 10s. a week was able to accept a berth at a lower wage than a man who had no such pension. At Olympia and the Fisheries and Colonial Exhibitions they found Superintendents of Police, who were receiving pensions of £3 and £4 a week, doing work for 1s. 6d. a night that a poor man would be glad to do. At the theatres they found quartermasters doing work at 2s. per night that poor board-men, or sandwich-men, would only be too delighted to get at the same price. Take the London County Council, and they found they had 900 firemen, and every one of them had been either in the Mercantile Marine or the Royal Navy. What more favourable means of finding employment did these men want? He protested on behalf of a number of men who did not wish the soldier or sailor to be handicapped, but who asked to be allowed to compete with them on fair terms, and this was the reason he objected to the soldier and sailor having a preferential position offered to him. What did they find at Woolwich? There were 500 pensioners employed there, and these men were responsible for dictating the rate of wages to be paid to 3,400 labourers, and the result was that 2,800 of these labourers received a starvation rate of wages, in consequence of the pensioners taking low wages that, with their pensions, was equal to market rate, below which non-pensioners could not live. The authorities were uncharitable enough to accept the labour of the pensioners at unfair rates. The tendency was to give too many facilities to the soldier and sailor, and what those on whose behalf he spoke asked for was fair competition all round.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD (Warwick, Stratford) said, that he wished to support the views of the right hon. Baronet (Sir James Fergusson). He had not intended to trouble the Committee with any remarks on this subject; but he confessed that he had listened with astonishment and pain to some remarks which fell from the hon. Member for Bethnal Green, which remarks were afterwards emphasised by the hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division and by the hon. Member for Battersea. It had always been held by civilised nations to be their duty to do what they could to make the old age of their soldiers and sailors as happy as possible. Soldiers and sailors had to face various climates. The position of our own soldiers was exceptional in this respect, and contrasted with the position of soldiers in the German and the French Armies, who, for the most part, remained in their own country. Our soldiers had to go to India and other unhealthy countries, where they had to encounter the dangers of climate, as well as the other dangers which were incidental to a soldier's life.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I rise to Order, Sir. This is a Vote for Messengers for the House of Lords. Is it in Order to discuss the question of public offices generally?

THE CHAIRMAN: Strictly speaking, I think the hon. Member should confine himself to the question of the House of Lords' Messengers.

MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD, continuing, said, that the men were entitled to all the more consideration on account of the nature of their service. If any country in the world was more bound towards its soldiers and sailors than another it was this country. There was another reason why they should consider the claims of their soldiers and sailors. These men, having learned habits of discipline, were pre-eminently qualified to fill such posts as were in the gift of the Public Offices of this country. They had before them admirable examples of the fitness of these men for posts in the Public Offices. The men whom they had employed had done their work well. The men included not only ordinary soldiers and sailors, but men who had filled the position of non-commissioned officers in the various orderly rooms, and who were capable of taking up duties that required considerable ability and education, such as, no doubt, was the character of the duties of messengers of the House of Lords. It was his firm conviction that it would be a most unwise thing to adopt any principle by which these men should not, at any rate, have a preferential claim on the Government for such positions as had been described. By considering the claims of these men they could make the Services more attractive than they were at present. No doubt amongst the civilians who applied for these posts were many excellent men; but they had not gone through similar discipline, and they had not similar testimonials of service and character on which reliance could be placed. When the old soldier or sailor came to them with the testimonials of those under whom he had served they knew that they had men on whom they could rely.

*MR. A. C. MORTON: I have to move a reduction of the Vote for the House of Lords Officers—

MR. HANBURY said, he was sorry to interrupt the hon. Member, but he desired first to say a few words as to the remarks which had fallen from the hon. Member for Battersea on the subject of pensions. Although he might differ from that hon. Member in being most anxious that preference should be given to soldiers and sailors over civilians, he agreed with a great deal of what he had said on the subject of pensions. He desired to remove every obstacle to the employment of these men; and he wished, therefore, to say he was quite sure that if this preference were given to soldiers and sailors those for whom he acted would not consider it fair or right that they should receive their pensions in addition to the pay for the work of the office. There might be exceptional cases which would have to be dealt with differently; but he was bound to say he agreed with the hon. Member for Battersea that these pensions for public services ought not to be used to depreciate wages outside. That was the principle on which they should act, and he, for one, would certainly object to pensions being paid in addition to the salaries for work in Public Departments.

*MR. A. C. MORTON said, that no doubt he was stupid, but he could not understand what the employment of soldiers and sailors had to do with this Vote, unless under certain circumstances they were going to send them to the House of Lords. He had always been struck with the immense difference between the cost of the staff of the House of Lords and that of the House of Commons. In the Paper they had presented to them they found the Vote for the House of Lords was £42,000, while that for the House of Commons was £50,000. But £42,000 did not cover the cost of the House of Lords' staff. There was another sum of £60,000, and a further sum of £5,000 or £6,000 out of what was called the "Fee Fund." In looking through the Estimates he found some most extraordinary charges. The Serjeant-at-Arms in attendance on the Lord Chancellor got £1,500, and, in addition, a personal allowance of £96. That was the general policy. These officials got their salary and "something else." Let them take, for instance, the Department of the Chairman of Committees. There was the Counsel to the Chairman, who received £1,500, and a further £250 for taxing costs on Private Bills, that sum being provided under another sub-head. The Senior Clerk received a maximum of £850, but under another head he got a further allowance of £150, making his salary £1,000: how was it that that was described as a maximum of £850? He was aware that some years ago a Committee was appointed to consider this question; but, so far as he could ascertain, the only result was a reduction in the salaries of the housemaids. There were some 11 housemaids in the House of Lords; but he had been unable to find any in the House of Commons—so far as the Estimates were concerned. What was the net result? The House of Lords, which did not do one-tenth of the work which was performed by the House of Commons, cost just about as much money for its staff. That surely was not right? He did not intend to raise any question as to the use of the House of Lords; but he did contend that its officers should not be more highly paid than those of the House of Commons. He did not know what Cabinet Minister had charge of this Vote; but he wished to give notice that whatever the fate of his present Motion he proposed later on to ask the Committee to postpone the remainder of the Vote. His reason was this. Of late they had had most extraordinary threats as to what would be done in the Upper House if a certain thing occurred in the House of Commons. Well, he wanted to know if right hon. Gentlemen, in making those threats, were speaking on their own authority, or were authorised to speak for the Upper House? He intended to move the reduction of the Vote by £1,000, and in so doing he desired to intimate that he blamed the Government for foolishly providing this money for excessive salaries. They had it in their power to refuse to put these sums in the Estimates, and it was their duty to decline to pay.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the item of £7,000 for House of Lords Offices be reduced by the sum of £1,000."—(Mr. A. C. Morton.)

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, his hon. Friend was within his right in bringing forward this Motion, but the House of Commons could not control the expenditure of the amounts to which he had drawn attention. It was only indirectly that pressure could be brought to bear by the Government. Formerly the fees received by the House of Lords were dealt with by the House of Lords themselves, and they were only brought into account on the understanding that a Committee of the House of Lords should deal with these matters. That Committee was desirous of reducing the payments, and, as vacancies arose, many items were reduced. He might particularly mention the Office of Black Rod. When the next vacancy arose there would be a reduction of that item. With regard to the House of Commons staff, that was under the control of Commissioners, among whom was the Speaker, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and one other Member of the Government. The hon. Member complained that the salaries to the House of Lords staff were greater than those paid in the House of Commons. He did not understand that his hon. Friend complained of the salaries of the officials of the House of Commons.

*MR. A. C. MORTON: Certainly not.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: He did not wish to say that the payments in the case of the House of Lords were not extravagant. He thought many of them were. But he did not see what connection there was between that and the action which the Lords might take with regard to a certain Bill, which was to be sent up to them from that House, and he should offer an unqualified opposition to his hon. Friend if he moved the Amendment which he had threatened.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) said, that in consequence of the answer of the Secretary to the Treasury he should support his hon. Friend. That House had the control of the money, and if the House of Lords did not get it, they would not pay it out of their own pockets. As the Secretary to the Treasury had said, these salaries were not only far too high, but they were unduly extravagant. Black Rod received a salary of £2,000, and the Serjeant-at-Arms of the House of Commons, who did 20 times the work of Black Rod, received £1,200. The Serjeant-at-Arms in the House of Lords received £1,500, while the Deputy Serjeant-at-Arms who held a like position in the Commons only got £800. The door-keepers of the House of Commons received £250 and £300 a year, and the door-keepers of the House of Lords £600 a year. That was a flagrant scandal. The Junior Clerk at the Table received about 40 per cent. less than the Clerk of the other House, there being no comparison in the matter of work. He did not agree that the Treasury had no control. He remembered that he had on one occasion to move the reduction of the salary of the Chairman of Committees in the House of Lords (who did scarcely anything) in order to secure the proper remuneration of the Chairman of Committees in the House of Commons, who had to work exceedingly hard; indeed, he could not understand why the House tried to kill its Speaker and its Chairman of Committees, by keeping them on duty such long hours. Some of the House of Commons officials were not paid as they ought to be. They had a lot of men here in the House of Commons who, in many cases, were underpaid, whilst in the other House they had a number of men who, though they had hardly any work at all, were extravagantly paid. The House of Commons had possession of the money out of which these payments were made, and he thought they should show their sense of the inequality of treatment of the two Houses by supporting the hon. Member for Peterborough in his Motion to reduce the Vote.

MR. HANBURY said, that if they went to a Division he should support the Motion, because there could be no doubt of the uselessness of "protests" and "understandings" in these subjects. Protests were not sufficient, but they had the power to act. No one could say that they had not the right to refuse the payment of these salaries, and if it were the case that the salaries paid in the House of Lords were much higher than those paid in the Commons, though the work was less, the system should be put an end to. He could not conceive why the salaries in the House of Lords should be out of all proportion to the work done. The salary of the Chairman of Committees in the Lords was formerly £2,500, whilst that of the Chairman of Committees in the Commons had only been £1,500, though the latter official had 20 times more work to do than the former. The disparity was ridiculous. He should like to go further than an "understanding" in the matter of the salaries of the officials of the House of Lords. Understandings always led to an infinity of trouble. What the particular understanding which had been referred to was he did not know. If it was that the Lords were to hand over all their fees to the House of Commons, he would remind the Secretary to the Treasury that they did nothing of the kind. The House of Lords kept back a large proportion of their fees for pensions which were distributed on a scale of which they had no knowledge in the House of Commons.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Hear, hear!

MR. HANBURY: The right hon. Gentleman apparently agreed with this. They would, therefore, probably hear something from him about it. How was this money spent on pensions in the House of Lords? Was it given on any definite scale?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I do not know.

MR. HANBURY: No; nobody could tell. They did not know when the pensions were earned, and when the men were obliged to retire. So far as he was aware, men might go on serving in the House of Lords until they were 100 years old. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury said the salaries paid to the officials of the House of Lords were too high, and altogether out of proportion to the amount of work done, and when they got an admission like that from a responsible Minister he (Mr. Hanbury), Tory as he was, did not mean to allow himself to be led away by "understandings," or anything of the sort. Until these salaries were placed on a better footing, and the amounts paid were proportionate to the work done, he hoped the House of Commons would refuse to vote the money.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) said, he agreed with all that had been said by the hon. Member for Preston and the hon. Member for Peterborough, but he doubted whether an adverse vote now would have any other effect than bringing the two Houses into collision. The proper way to bring about a reform in the salaries of the officials of the House of the Lords—a reform, to his mind, very much needed—would be by appointing a Joint Committee of the two Houses to go thoroughly into the whole matter of the salaries paid in either House. They would be very unwise if in that House they tried to hector the House of Lords. The House of Lords, as far as he knew, was composed of reasonable men. [Laughter.] Yes, and many of them were very learned; but, be that as it might, the Committee, he was sure, would be disposed to agree that if there were a Joint Committee appointed to inquire into these matters they would be much more likely to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion than they would be by now taking an adverse Division. If the hon. Member for Peterborough pressed his Motion to a Division he (Commander Bethell) should support the Government.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down had given them good reasons why they should support the Motion for the reduction of the Vote. He had suggested that they should not hector the House of Lords. Well, he (Mr. Rowlands) had no desire to do that; but what they wished to do was to express a strong opinion as to the way in which the House of Lords spent the money voted to them. Some years ago a Committee sat and made endeavours to reduce the expenditure in the House of Lords, but the reductions effected were so trifling that no one took notice of them. The only way in which they could really bring about a reduction in this expenditure was by refusing to vote the money to the House of Lords. Whenever this Vote had been before the House no one had attempted to defend the charges the House of Lords made upon the Commons—no one had attempted to defend the salaries the House of Lords paid its officials. They were continually favoured with apologies such as they had just heard from the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite. It was high time that the House of Commons showed, in an emphatic manner, that they were determined to bring about a reduction of expenditure in the House of Lords.

MR. BARTLEY said, they must all agree that the scales of the salaries paid in the two Houses were not right, and that some change was necessary. But they must avoid inflicting injustice upon existing office-holders; therefore, he thought that the best solution of the existing difficulty would be, to appoint a Committee to decide what the salaries should be in future as vacancies occurred. That policy had been pursued, to a certain extent, by the late Government, and the present Government, he thought, should follow in the footsteps of their predecessors. The instances cited, from the door-keepers upwards, showed that salaries had been dealt out to officials in the House of Lords with too lavish a hand. The salaries ought to be liberal both in the House of Lords and in the House of Commons; but they should be according to an approved scale. A pledge ought to be given by the Government that no new appointment would be made until the salaries had been re-adjusted. The whole question required investigating, for he did not think the arrangements in either House were what they should be. The time was coming when all these salaries should be put upon a proper basis, and when a general system of remuneration should be adopted. The fact that the House of Lords received higher fees in connection with private Bills than the House of Commons had nothing to do with the question, the great bulk of those fees being paid into the Exchequer. He should hesitate to vote for the proposed reduction, but desired to hear a distinct assurance from the Treasury that they contemplated considering all new appointments with a view to apportioning the salaries more equally.

Mr. Hanbury

*MR. A. C. MORTON said, he had no doubt the Secretary to the Treasury had told them all he knew about the matter, and he therefore did not quarrel with what the right hon. Gentleman had said. Whether the money which went to pay the salaries of the officials of the House of Lords came from fees or anywhere else, it was all under the charge of the House of Commons, and the House of Commons had a right to see that it was properly expended. The right hon. Gentleman did not think the House of Lords officials were paid too much—

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I said I thought the salaries were very high.

*MR. A. C. MORTON : Then they ought to be reduced—or if they were not reduced the salaries of the officials of the House of Commons ought to be increased. He thought the Committee ought to go to a Division, if it were only as insisting upon this matter being dealt with in a regular system. He wished to say a word with regard to the Refreshment Department. In the House of Commons they supplied their own refreshments, he was told at a loss. In the House of Lords the Refreshment Department was let out to a contractor, whose business it was to sell the workmen about the building as much drink as possible, so that he might realise a profit. The contractor did not require a licence, and he supplied drink to the workpeople about the House throughout the period of the year when Parliament was not sitting, very much to the disadvantage of those workpeople. The policemen on duty could not interfere. He should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury would speak to the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works on this subject.

MR. BARTLEY : I have had no answer to my question.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, he would carefully consider the point raised by the hon. Member. If the House of Lords would agree to the appointment of a Joint Committee to consider the salaries of the officers of both Houses the Treasury would assent to it. Beyond that he could not commit either himself or the Treasury.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER hoped the Government would assent to the suggestion that no new appointments should be made before the whole question of these salaries was taken into consideration.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 66 ; Noes 139.—(Division List, No. 98.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. HANBURY said, he did not rise to move an Amendment, but to give notice of what he intended to do when the ordinary Vote came on. He thought the time had come when the services in the House of Lords and the House of Commons should be put practically on the same footing as other branches of the Civil Service. He knew there were distinctions that might be drawn between the services of officers in the House of Commons, which lasted only six months in the year, and those of officers in other Departments which lasted 12 months. But, granting these exceptions, he failed to see why service in the House of Commons and in the House of Lords should not be put on the same footing as the rest of the Civil Service. These Houses, and some of the Law Offices, were the last holes and corners where patronage had a foothold, and he thought that they ought, at any rate in the House of Commons, to set an example to the rest of the Civil Service. The House was anxious that the Civil Service should be purified from top to bottom, and conducted on lines common to all the Departments, and that there should be a regularised, systematic mode of promotion and appointment, and it was not wise, therefore, that the House of Commons should stand outside that scheme, and that its clerks should be placed on a totally different footing from those of the other Departments, with the exception of the House of Lords. He did not think the Civil Service Commissioners had anything to do with the officials of the Houses of Parliament. A clerk entered the service of the House of Commons without undergoing an examination. There were no definite rules governing his promotion, his salary, or the age at which he was to retire. All through the rest of the Civil Service, according to an Order in Council which had been promulgated, Civil Servants were required to retire at the age of 65. In the House of Commons there was no such rule, and he was told that at present there could be no such rule, as an Act of Parliament stood in the way. But he thought that what was a good rule for the rest of the Civil Service ought to be a good rule for the House of Lords and the House of Commons. He did not think it was right that they should see men of over 70 filling posts in the Houses of Parliament which much younger men considered themselves entitled to. At present the service in the House of Commons was regulated by one of those very large bodies which ought to be obsolete, and which at one time were too common all over the Public Services. The service in the House of Commons was entirely in the hands of a large Committee, consisting of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Speaker, the Master of the Rolls, a half-a-dozen Judges, and half-a-dozen other public officials. It was ridiculous that any service in the world should be controlled by a body of that kind. He did not expect that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury would give a definite answer now; but as they had been doing their best in past years to put the rest of the Civil Service on a proper footing, he trusted that steps would be taken to see that men in the service in the Houses of Parliament rose on a properly defined scale, and were retired and pensioned at a reasonable age. He would not press for a reply now; but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consult the Government with the view of bringing on the ordinary Estimates in about a fortnight. He saw the President of the Local Government Board smiling at the idea; but he hoped the Votes would be brought on in a week or two, because if it was the idea of the Government that, having got the Vote on Account, they need not bring on the real Estimates for some weeks, that was a reason for fighting the Vote to-night and to-morrow. He hoped that no such evil idea lurked in the mind of the Government. He would assume that the Estimates would be brought on again in a fortnight, and he hoped that when they were brought on the Committee would be told that the Government could see their way to bring in a Bill dealing with this question, so that none of those refuges of jobbery and patronage should be left, and that all the services, including the Houses of Parliament and the Legal Offices, should be brought within the powers of the Civil Service Commissioners, and under the same rules. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman to promise that the matter should be considered before the Estimates were again brought on.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I appreciate the hon. Member's courtesy in giving me this notice of his intention to raise this question when the Estimates come on. He has dealt with us in a considerate manner. The subject shall receive consideration, and when the Vote comes on I shall be quite prepared to meet him.

DR. CLARK said that, in consequence of the Leader of the House having refused to give them information, or the means of obtaining information, as to the financial relations between England, Ireland, and Scotland, he was disposed to move to cut English and Irish salaries down to the Scotch level. Every office in England was much better paid than in Scotland, and as for Ireland, she had always been the spoilt child of the Treasury, and every office in that country was more highly paid even than in England. For the Home Office and subordinate Departments the amount voted for England was £102,000, which was a preposterous sum when they bore in mind that Scotland only received £11,000. If England received a proportionate grant to Ireland, the amount paid to her would be only £77,000. He should move to reduce the payment to England down to the Scotch level. The payment to Ireland was £44,000, and he should avail himself of every opportunity, also, of moving to reduce this Vote down to the Scotch level. He should not call attention to this subject at the present moment if he foresaw any other opportunity of discussing it. But in all probability the ordinary Vote would not come before them until August, or perhaps November or December. It was necessary for the Government to sacrifice either their big Bills, their Departmental Bills or Supply, and the late Government had set the example of sacrificing Supply. They had been in the habit of taking two or three large Votes on Account, and then at the end of the Session the Estimates were run through in a lump, as many Votes being run through in one night as ought to occupy the Committee 10 nights. He protested against the refusal of the present Government to re-appoint the Committee appointed by the late Government to inquire into the financial relations between different portions of the United Kingdom. He was convinced that the result of the inquiry of such a Committee would be to show that Scotland was overtaxed, and that everything Scotch was underpaid. The Local Government Board in England received £165,000, in Ireland it received £135,000, and in Scotland only £8,000. They agreed four or five years ago that all these local Votes should pass away, and that in lieu thereof a portion of the Excise should be given. So far as England and Scotland was concerned these charges were taken off; but Ireland was in the happy position of getting a share both of the Probate Duty and the other duty. And that was the state of things in every direction, Scotland being unfairly treated all round. Here was a Liberal Government, forsooth, the great bulk of those who composed it being Scotchmen, and yet they absolutely refused to give a Committee which the late Conservative Government gave, and which sat once. ["No, no!"] Yes, it was three years ago. It sat one night immediately after the passing of the Appropriation Bill. The hon. Member who then represented West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) pressed the Irish case and they had a discussion, and they suspended the Standing Orders, so that the Committee might sit after the House was prorogued. There was one sitting, and one Return was presented, showing how much Ireland was overcharged. Now, however, in spite of the number of Scotch Members in the Government, this Committee was refused. The Committee was essential, in order that light might be thrown on this question of the financial relations between the three countries, and in order that they might discuss it thoroughly. If the Government were going to remain in their present position of refusing this Committee, the proper course would be to discuss the matter in Committee of Supply and press it forward Vote by Vote. He would not divide the Committee on the present occasion, but he merely wished to tell the Government what to expect if they did not assent to the re-appointment of the Select Committee.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) thought some answer ought to be given to the observations of the hon. Member for Caithness. At an earlier period he had put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister asking whether he was prepared to re-appoint the Financial Committee which had been appointed by the late Government, and which had done some work, and the right hon. Gentleman had replied that at this moment he was not prepared to grant a Committee. He (Mr. Hunter), however, had not understood that the right hon. Gentleman took up the position that he refused during the currency of the present Session to appoint the Committee. Of course, so far as Ireland was concerned, she would not care to enter into the financial question at present; but to Scotland it was a question of most vital importance. There could be no question, on the figures that had been produced by the Treasury, that Scotland was overcharged by a very large sum per annum. The precise amount of that sum was, of course, a matter upon which different opinions might be entertained—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I do not see how this question arises on the Home Office Vote. It seems to me it would come more properly on the item for the Office of the Secretary of State for Scotland.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall) said, he had a question to put to the Home Secretary on Vote 4. He had on two occasions asked questions as to the assault made on the Vicar of St. Anne's, Bermondsey, and the replies he had received had been of such an unsatisfactory character that he felt compelled to bring the matter before the Committee. This gentleman—the Rev. F. B. Walsh—attended an anti-Home Rule meeting at Bermondsey as an ordinary citizen on the 24th April.

He took no part whatever in the proceedings; he made no speech, and the greater portion of the meeting no doubt were not even aware of his presence. A very disorderly crowd, composed entirely of supporters of Her Majesty's Government, were gathered outside. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, if they knew something of the electoral proceedings in the South of London during the last election, and since, would realise what a disorderly crowd of that kind meant, because during the election in July there was a scene of unprecedented disorder and violence arranged—deliberately arranged and wire-pulled by the Radical managers in South London. The crowd in question was, undoubtedly, a repetition of what had taken place on a larger scale during the General Election. Gangs of rowdies marched from meeting to meeting and, acting under orders, broke up nearly every political meeting which took place on the Unionist side in the South and South West of London. Well, a most disorderly crowd was gathered outside the meeting attended by Mr. Walsh. They attacked people going into the meeting, throwing life preservers, bags of red ochre, and other dangerous missiles at them. Mr. Walsh left the meeting, and at its close was proceeding quietly in the direction of his home. He was followed by a portion of the crowd, was stoned and probably struck, and received the most serious injuries. He was confined to his room for upwards of a month and suffered extreme pain, whilst it was not too much to say that for a time his life was in danger. When he (Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett) brought the matter to the attention of the Home Secretary (Mr. Asquith), the right hon. Gentleman replied with the easy nonchalance which he affected on these occasions. On neither occasion did he offer the slightest expression of sympathy to the victim of the outrage. The right hon. Gentleman thought he saw an opportunity of scoring off a political opponent, and, amid the cheers of his supporters, he said that the account which he (Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett) had taken from The Times was exaggerated. He had put the question at the request of Mr. Walsh's relations, and after the Home Secretary's reply he received a letter from Mr. Walsh's wife, in consequence of which he put a second question, which embodied a description of the outrage as sent to him by Mrs. Walsh. It appeared that a stone struck the rev. gentleman first, and that on turning round to remonstrate he was struck in the eye with a stone which cut him to the bone. Blinded with blood, he staggered to the railings, when another stone struck him on the back of the head, rendering him unconscious, and he evidently had many blows because he had many bruises. Mr. Walsh said that "the street was filled with a howling mob." One would have thought that upon being asked a question, based upon Mrs. Walsh's letter, the Home Secretary would have moderated his previous tone and expressed some sympathy with the victim of the outrage. Not in the least. Speaking in his usual defiant tone, the right hon. Gentleman said he adhered in every particular to his former answer, which was founded upon a statement made by Mr. Walsh to the Superintendent at the time. The right hon. Gentleman added that some disorderly lads had thrown stones at Mr. Walsh. As a matter of fact, the persons who threw stones were not disorderly lads but full-grown roughs of the most violent and disorderly character. The right hon. Gentleman said it was uncertain whether the stones were thrown at Mr. Walsh or not. There was not the slightest doubt whatever that these ruffians followed Mr. Walsh and deliberately attacked him when they found him alone. The right hon. Gentleman denied that the street was filled with a howling mob. That was, however, the statement made by Mrs. Walsh, and made, without the slightest doubt, with Mr. Walsh's assent and concurrence. The fact was that a disgraceful, brutal, and unprovoked attack had been made by a political mob, consisting of supporters of the present Government, upon one of their opponents. There was not the slightest doubt that if an injury of that kind had been inflicted upon a supporter of the Liberal Party, and that the present Opposition had been in Office, the House and the country would have rung with the case for weeks and perhaps for months. He should not have pressed the matter on the present occasion had it not been for the tone adopted by the Home Secretary. Up to the present moment, in spite of the brutality and cowardice of the attack and the great injuries which had been inflicted upon this unfortunate clergyman, not a single word or suggestion of sympathy had fallen from the representative of the Government. Admitting that the right hon. Gentleman's own description of the occurrence was accurate, it was still insufficient to support the statement that the account of the attack given in the first instance by The Times, and supported subsequently by Mrs. Walsh's letter, was exaggerated. The violence which had been used towards Mr. Walsh was but part of the system of carefully arranged, planned and paid for outrages, which were perpetrated at the last Election throughout the whole of South London. Member after Member, on the Opposition side of the House, would be able to give proof of the fact that it was perfectly impossible for an open Unionist meeting to be held in South and South-West London last July. The leaders of the outrages that took place were perfectly well known, and the gangs marched solidly from place to place. It was a very serious thing when that sort of terrorism and violence was allowed to prevail. This was not the first time that disorderly scenes had occurred in Bermondsey. It was bad enough when political violence took the form of disorder at public meetings; but when it developed into cruel, unprovoked, cowardly and most injurious assaults upon inoffensive individuals, it was certainly time for the Government to express sympathy with the victims of the outrages and to do their best to discover the perpetrators.

MR. BARROW (Southwark, Bermondsey) said, with regard to the speech just delivered, he had to say simply that he never had a ticket meeting at Bermondsey, and never had a disturbance at a meeting—indoors or out of doors. On the occasion referred to a meeting was held in the Town Hall, and the electorate were much excited by a speech delivered by the hon. Member himself—a speech, he was informed, which was calculated to provoke disorder. He had heard that the hon. Member had avowed that he would never appear there again.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he could assure the Committee that every statement the hon. Member had just made was inaccurate. [Cries of "Oh!"] The meeting he addressed in the Town Hall, although a number of Liberals were present, was most orderly, and there was not the slightest disturbance. There was a violent mob outside the Hall before the meeting began. He challenged the hon. Gentleman to prove that there was disturbance in the Hall, or to produce a single sentence from his speech which was calculated to provoke disorder. It was quite possible the hon. Member might not be prepared to do that now; but he challenged him to do it any time in the future. [Cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. Gentleman that the question before the Committee is the conduct of the Home Secretary.

MR. BARROW said, he was glad the hon. Member had acknowledged that at a meeting attended by a number of Liberals there was no disorder, but perfect order, because on a previous occasion it was complained that it was hard to get a Tory meeting in the constituency. That could not be said again, for Liberals were willing the other side should be heard, and, as the hon. Member confessed, they listened to himself and his friends with order. He would ask the hon. Member how he reconciled his present with his previous statement. With respect to the Home Secretary's replies on the question of this attack, he had heard them, and he considered that they conveyed a fair representation of the facts as stated by the authorities of Bermondsey. The street was not crowded by a rabble; there were half-a-dozen boys who followed the rev. gentleman, and the police were unable to capture the boys who threw the stones. He was certain from all he had heard that there was no evil design; nothing but a spirit of mischief prevailed, and that was the infection from the excitement outside the Town Hall. The Home Secretary's answers were clearly adapted to the circumstances of the case, and he thought there was nothing more to be said.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): I think, Sir, the Committee has hardly had a more conspicuous instance of the abuse of an occasion of this kind, on which questions of general policy might fitly be raised, than that which we have just witnessed. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett) has gone into the details of what, after all—though the result is a very lamentable injury, for which I have expressed my regret to the rev. gentleman—was nothing more than a street row. The hon. Gentleman, however, has not told us—and he must have been aware of it—in connection with his remarks, that I was not in Office last year, and was not then responsible for the conduct of the police. The responsibility rests on his Colleagues. There is considerable discrepancy as to the origin of this disturbance, and the hon. Gentleman has displayed much curiosity. Well, I know nothing of that. The information given to me by the police—and upon it I am bound to rely—is that the rev. gentleman was proceeding along the street, that he undoubtedly received two, or perhaps three, blows with stones, and he had in consequence suffered serious injury, and had been in bed for some time. I have intimated to the rev. gentleman, through his wife, my sincere sympathy with him, and my extreme regret that the occurrence should have taken place. It appears there was a meeting held in the Town Hall, at which the rev. gentleman spoke. I was not there, and I do not know. If the hon. Gentleman opposite thinks I should be brought to the Bar of the House he should tell us why. I am only saying what I have been told is the fact, according to the police, who are entitled to know, and who have reported to me. As I have said, a meeting was held in the Town Hall, over which the hon. Gentleman himself presided.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: No.

MR. ASQUITH: Well, the hon. Gentleman was, at any rate, a very prominent figure. We have here the statement, not only of the police but of the rev. gentleman himself. Will the hon. Gentleman say that the statement made by the rev. gentleman to the police is unworthy of credence? That statement was that when he was half-way down the street something struck him on the head, and on his turning round he was struck on the eye, as he believed, by a stone. He did not know that he was followed. There was nothing in the nature of a rescue, and he was not surrounded, nor was any one near him. He had no idea by whom the stone was thrown, and could give no further information. That is the statement of the rev. gentleman. The police state they were not in sight when the missile was thrown, but they came up subsequently, and assisted the rev. gentleman home. A boy was seen running away, and every endeavour was made to discover the offenders. To make assurance doubly sure, I had further inquiries founded on the suggestions made by the hon. Member, with the result that the police were of opinion that the suggestion that the street was filled with a howling mob, which followed the rev. gentleman, could not be true. The rev. gentleman did not know that he was followed until a stone struck him on the head, and the police found him leaning against the railings with no one near him. When the clergyman had gone a short way down the street, after coming out of the meeting, some boys threw stones—whether at him or not appears to be uncertain. The perpetrators ran away when the police arrived. The police assisted him to a doctor's, where the wound was dressed. I would ask the Committee, under these circumstances, what could I or the police do that has not been done in this case, and what possible ground of complaint is there against the authorities? I am very sorry the rev. gentleman has been injured, but I see no reason to believe that the boys who injured him attended the meeting. The suggestion is that they were a body of supporters of the Government, who, being worsted in argument, had taken the only revenge that was open to them by assaulting an unoffending clergyman with stones in the street. This was an ordinary street row; and while it is very much to be regretted that the police did not happen to be present at the exact moment when the stones were thrown—and that sometimes happens, unfortunately—yet, as soon as they came up, they did everything they could to assist the victim of the outrage, and left no stone unturned to secure the offenders. I would, therefore, ask what possible justification there can be for occupying the time of the Committee, delaying the progress of business, and postponing the discussion of important questions of policy by this miserable controversy over the trumpery details of a street row?

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said, he would remind, with reference to his closing observations, the right hon. Gentleman that that House had always been regarded as the grand inquest of the nation, and that injuries to the persons and liberties of Her Majesty's subjects had not been considered beneath its notice. Hon. Members had had during the present Session very few opportunities of bringing grievances forward; and this was the only occasion since the lamentable occurrence took place on which it could be brought to the notice of the House. He was not going to detain the House; but he maintained that when an outrage took place in the Metropolis, and when one of Her Majesty's subjects was seriously injured, any hon. Member who had reason to become acquainted with the circumstances was only discharging his duty in bringing the matter before the knowledge of the House on the first opportunity that presented itself. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see that such an outrage did not take place again.

Mr. Macfarlane rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN (Lambeth, Brixton), on a point of Order, wished to know if he could, on this Vote, call attention to the growing practice of carrying revolvers; or whether he should wait until the Home Office Vote?

THE CHAIRMAN: The question would scarcely come under the heading of the Home Office Vote.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN said, in that case, he would raise the question now. The usual answer of the Government on this question was that something would be done if the House would have patience. Meanwhile, men were being shot in the streets day after day. The Home Office issued a Circular to all Coroners asking for a Return of the fatalities caused by revolvers; but these Returns only included fatal cases; and there were many more where serious, but not mortal, injuries were inflicted. The evil was a great and growing one; and the remedy he would suggest—perhaps he was not in Order, but he would venture to say that a remedy might be applied by prohibiting gunmakers from selling revolvers to any persons except those who could produce a licence to carry them. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department must be aware of the danger of this indiscriminate carrying of revolvers, and he ventured to hope that he would give the suggestion he had made full consideration, with the object, if necessary, of bringing in a practical Bill upon the subject.

MR. ASQUITH said, he recognised that the question was well worthy the consideration of the House; but it would be a dangerous precedent to discuss and criticise in Supply, not only what a Government had done, but also what it ought to have done. He did not, however, make any complaint of that. The question had been engaging his attention for some time. The noble Lord was wrong in supposing that the application for Returns of injuries inflicted by revolvers had been made only to the Coroners. The Home Office made a similar application to all the hospitals in the country. Of course, the information so obtained could not be complete; but it was so large and valuable that he and the Under Secretary (Mr. Herbert Gladstone) saw their way to frame upon it a working measure; and if the state of business would allow of it, and if the House were disposed to treat the Bill as non-contentious and non-controversial, he did not despair of effecting improvements in the law even in the present Session. He was as anxious to see something done as the noble Lord himself was.

*MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea) said, he wished to raise a small but an important point. They in the House of Commons were under many obligations to the 80 or 100 policemen—members of the Metropolitan Force—who were in attendance in and around the Houses of Parliament. The duties of these men practically commenced when the House sat and ended when it rose; and during all that time they had to wear heavy tunics, heavy boots, and heavy helmets. He merely wished to put it to the right hon. Gentleman—

THE CHAIRMAN: I think this point might be raised on the Vote relating to the Metropolitan Police.

*MR. JOHN BURNS said, very well; he would raise it when that Vote was reached.

*MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.), on the Vote relating to the Foreign Office, said, he understood that an application had been made to the Argentine Government for the extradition of Jabez Spencer Balfour, and that the Argentine Government had expressed their willingness to give up Mr. Jabez Balfour provided the Government of this country under similar circumstances and conditions would surrender criminals. He considered that such an arrangement would be an equitable one, and would pave the way to an Extradition Treaty in the future. He felt it would be a disgrace if the Government did not use every effort to bring this man to justice, seeing that he was once a Member of that House, and a man who posed as a religious reformer, and obtained money from all classes. He had no personal interest in the matter, as he had not lost a penny through this man's dishonesty, and he never passed a word with him in his life; but he knew that hundreds and thousands had been reduced to almost absolute starvation by the defalcations of Mr. Jabez Balfour, and he felt it was the bounden duty of the Foreign Office to do everything in its power to see that he was restored to the hands of justice in this country. He was not accusing the Foreign Office of not having done their duty; he only wanted to know if they had taken all the steps possible for the purpose of restoring this man to the bosom of his friends in this country. He was sure there were many besides those who had suffered very severely who would be only too glad to find Jabez Balfour once more on British ground to have justice meted out to him according to his deserts.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL LOCKWOOD asked what had been done with regard to the £100 in respect of International Law promised to Third Secretaries? The hon. Baronet, when last this matter was mentioned, admitted that the Third Secretaries had been hardly treated, and expressed the hope that the question would eventually be arranged. He would like to know whether there was any prospect of these gentlemen being paid the sum to which they were fully entitled?

*SIR E. GREY said, the question raised by the hon. and gallant Gentleman had been the subject of very earnest consideration, and a decision was on the point of being arrived at which, he hoped, would be satisfactory to those concerned. With reference to the question of the extradition of Mr. Jabez Balfour, he could only repeat what he had already stated to the hon. Member for Bethnal Green in reply to questions put by him. When it was known that Mr. Jabez Balfour was in the Argentine Republic, application was made by the Foreign Office to the Argentine Government to surrender him to the Authorities of this country. The Argentine Government replied that in the absence of an Extradition Treaty they could not surrender him, unless Her Majesty's Government would promise to give reciprocity in a like case; but by British law they had no power to surrender foreigners unless they had an Extradition Treaty. The hon. Member had very fairly put the point when he said that the Argentine Government asked for reciprocity, and would Her Majesty's Government give it? He had no hesitation in saying the Government were ready to give reciprocity by the only means by which the English law allowed it to be given. Some years ago an Extradition Treaty with the Argentine Republic was actually signed, but the Argentine Republic were not prepared to ratify it. The Treaty was signed, and was an expression of the desire of this Government for reciprocity in this matter; and as soon as the Argentine Government ratified that Treaty there was no doubt this country would be in a position to say they could guarantee reciprocity in the sense that the British law allowed them to do so. These being the facts, any reticence which occurred in reference to questions on the subject was occasioned solely by anxiety that in the interests of justice no more should be said than was absolutely necessary. He could assure the hon. Member that as far as their present powers allowed, or as far as the extension of future Extradition Treaties would permit them, no effort would be spared to bring to justice people guilty of such crimes as this, in whatever country they might have taken up their abode.

*SIR THOMAS LEA (Londonderry, S.) desired to know whether there had been a considerable increase in the slave trade since this country had given up the right of search of slave dhows at Madagascar? He understood the hon. Baronet had stated that this right had been given up in consequence of the French Treaty with Madagascar, and since that answer had been given there was a strong feeling in some quarters that the Slave Trade was very much increasing in consequence of this right of search having been given up.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs was well aware that the right of search, which was purely a conventional right of search, was not allowed to be exercised over French vessels on the Coast of Madagascar; and, consequently, the Slave Trade on the Coast of Madagascar was at this moment being carried on under the French flag, without any power of interference by this country. That was exactly what would take place with regard to the liquor traffic in the North Sea, and the day would come when this country would bitterly regret having consented to that Convention which gave foreign cruisers the right to search British ships at sea. As to the question of the extradition of a former Member of that House from the Argentine Republic, he was no friend of Extradition Treaties; but if it were right to ask that someone in a foreign country should be given up to us, was it not equally important to inquire whether this country had not persons in their power whom they had no right to have? Take the case of Arabi Pasha. He defied any hon. Member of that House to give him any ground or good authority or any good law under which Arabi Pasha was kept a prisoner by the power of England. Arabi Pasha had been exiled from his native country and had been located in Ceylon. He had again and again given promises of good conduct and asked to be restored to Egypt; but his demands had always been met by an absolute refusal. He invited the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs to say under what rule of either the Law of Nations or the Municipal Laws of England Arabi Pasha was kept prisoner in Ceylon by the power of this country? There was another matter on which he wished for information. He had the honour of drawing the attention of that House some time ago to the Behring Sea question, and he pointed out several matters which were subsequently corroborated in the course of the arbitration proceedings at Paris. In case they came to a permanent and successful issue of the arbitration with the United States with reference to the part of the Behring Sea they claimed, they would have left untouched and undecided the far more serious matter of the remaining one-third of the Behring Sea which was exclusively claimed by Russia. He should like to know what arrangements had been made by this country with the Russian Government with respect to that one-third of the Behring Sea which was not covered by the arbitration proceedings in Paris?

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) said, he noticed by that morning's papers that private letters from Uganda were beginning to arrive, and he desired to ask whether the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs expected any letters from Sir Gerald Portal, and would he promise to lay them on the Table of the House as soon as they arrived?

MR. LEGH (Lancashire, S.W., Newton) wondered that the hon. Member for Lynn could regard Arabi Pasha as a hero and a martyr. He had always looked upon Arabi as a sort of Oriental Boulanger, at once tyrannical, cowardly and fanatical, and stupendously ignorant. What was his history? He started originally as a mutineer——

THE CHAIRMAN (interposing) said, it was not in Order to go into the history of Arabi Pasha. It did not arise in this Vote.

MR. LEGH said, he was anxious to say something against the proposal of his hon. Friend that further indulgence should be extended to Arabi Pasha. His contention was that there was nothing in his history to justify any clemency being shown to him. This was how Arabi Pasha started: He obtained high position——[“Order, order!”]

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think it is in Order to go into the character and history of Arabi Pasha. Anything which affects the Secretary for Foreign Affairs or the Foreign Office with regard to the present position of Arabi Pasha may be material.

MR. LEGH asked, was Arabi Pasha to be regarded as a martyr? It was admitted he was an exile; but the question was, whether he was an ill-treated exile? It appeared it was considered a grievance that this exile was domiciled in Ceylon. He had always been under the impression that the Island of Ceylon was a Mussulman paradise. What hardship, then, was there in a man being exiled to his own paradise? Arabi was in receipt of a pension of £300 a year; and if he had served his time and been a faithful subject and had been retired as a general officer, the question was whether he would have been receiving anything like such a pension? Had Arabi been separated from his relations? On the contrary; he understood Arabi resided in a kind of patriarchal splendour, surrounded by his wives and, for all he knew, by his sisters, his cousins, and his aunts; and here in this dignified seclusion he received the visits of itinerant politicians, who obtained his views probably on subjects such as Parish Councils and the prospects of bimetallism. He hoped that neither this nor any other Government would pay any attention to the appeals of his hon. Friend, and he hoped no consideration would be shown to Arabi Pasha in future.

Mr. Legh

MR. W. REDMOND (Clare, E.) asked whether, in answer to the hon. Member for Northampton, the Prime Minister had not stated that the matter of allowing Arabi Pasha to change his place of exile was under consideration of the Government and in all probability such a change would be allowed?

*SIR E. GREY said, in answer to the hon. Member who had last spoken, he had not referred recently to the answer of the Prime Minister which had been mentioned, and his recollection of its terms was not exactly the same as the hon. Member's. His recollection was that the Prime Minister stated that the question of the domicile of Arabi and his companions was one which depended on large general considerations, and that he could not make any definite promise on the subject. In reply to the hon. and gallant Member for North Galway, he had to say that no news had yet been received from Uganda. Sir Gerald Portal was to arrive in Uganda towards the end of March. He thought it would take three months at least for a Report to arrive from Uganda, so that no Report could have been received yet. As to whether he would lay the communications from Sir Gerald Portal on the Table of the House, he thought in all cases the Government ought to have an opportunity of reading the documents before they were laid on the Table. He had not the least doubt that, as soon as Reports were received from Uganda, the House and the public would be made acquainted with the tenour of them.

COLONEL NOLAN inquired, would the hon. Baronet acquaint the House when the first Reports were received from Sir Gerald Portal?

*SIR E. GREY said, there would be no objection in stating the fact as soon as Sir Gerald Portal had made a Report on Uganda. As regarded the territorial waters of Madagascar, the Protectorate which France exercised over Madagascar was recognised by the late Government some years ago. France signed the greater part of the Brussels Act, and the general purport of that Act was that the countries who signed it undertook in their own territories and in protected territorial waters the charge of suppressing the Slave Trade. With the Protectorate of Madagascar France had undertaken the charge of the Slave Trade in the Protectorate waters of Madagascar, and, with the recognition of the Protectorate exercised by France, had gone the recognition of the obligation by France to take charge of the Slave Trade and suppress it in these territorial waters. As regarded Russia and the Behring Sea, he could assure the hon. Member for King's Lynn that Russia had not put forward any claim to territorial jurisdiction in the open sea. There seemed to be a distinction drawn between jurisdiction over the seals and jurisdiction over the sea. He could only say for the present that a provisional arrangement with Russia would, he hoped, be arrived at by which the seals should be protected on the Russian side of the Behring Sea, and no claim to that part of the sea had been put forward by Russia, so that the question of territorial jurisdiction did not arise, as far as Russia was concerned. A future permanent arrangement would no doubt depend upon the issue of the discussions now proceeding.

DR. CLARK said, the Natal Legislature had passed a Bill for the purpose of giving itself a Government, and he desired to know whether, before the Queen's sanction was given to the Bill, it would come before the House of Commons in the same way as did the Bill for giving responsible Government to Western Australia, or whether it would be dealt with by an Order in Council? If by the latter method, would the Government, before coming to a final decision, consider two classes in Natal who were practically outside the scope of the Bill? There were almost as many of our fellow-subjects from India as there were white men in Natal. These men came originally to work in the sugar plantations, but many had established themselves as merchants; and as they were content with a lower standard of comfort and lower profits than the white merchants, they were gradually cutting out the latter. Attempts were being made to put down this competition. As far as he understood, there was one Bill passed by the Legislative Council of Natal giving itself responsible Government; but as it proposed only one Chamber, it did not meet with the approbation of the late Secretary for the Colonies, who wanted two, and the Colonial Office drafted a Bill which, he believed, was practically the Bill which had now been adopted by the Legislative Council. By this Bill the British Indians and the natives of Natal were not to be given the franchise which was enjoyed by the same classes in Cape Colony. Why was the Colonial Office going to permit Natal to have a more conservative policy regarding British Indians and natives than the Cape Colony? By the Bill it was proposed to maintain the so-called Native Law, and to make the Governor the supreme Chief. He protested against such a policy, which was simply shameful. If they were going to make any change at all, the natives should come under the same conditions as the present Cape Law, and should have the right of representation. He wished to know whether Parliament would have an opportunity of discussing the Bill, or whether the matter was to be decided by the Cabinet? As to the question of Zululand, there were three unfortunate prisoners in Natal—Cetewayo's brothers—and when they made a change, they would have to consider their position. If the Government policy was to be carried out at all, it must be carried out by men who were favourable to it and who were loyal to them, and not, as on a former occasion, by men who were bitterly opposed to it.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) said, he wished to ask a question with reference to quarantine at Malta. The way in which British subjects were treated under Quarantine Law there was a monstrous abuse. When a ship was put into quarantine, the passengers were sent to the quarantine establishment for considerable periods, ranging from a week to a fortnight. They were pitchforked into what might almost be described as a dirty hole, and were treated with the smallest consideration, and had to submit to blackmail. They had to provide their own food in the best way they could; and it was only by paying blackmail that they could obtain any convenience or comfort. The question had been brought before the Colonial Office over and over again. He knew that Malta was under Local Government, and that it was difficult for the Colonial Office to interfere; but no doubt pressure could be brought to bear. He now raised it in Committee, in order that the hands of the Under Secretary might be strengthened in dealing with the matter.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): We have no absolute power to insist upon any definite measure in regard to the quarantine at Malta; but something may be done by calling attention to the question, and in bringing as much pressure to bear on the authorities as we can. Such matters as these often get into a routine, if special attention is not occasionally called to them. I have already communicated with the Governor, and I hope that something may be done, now that public attention has been called to the subject, to improve the condition of the lazaretto at Malta. The Self-Governing Bill of Natal will not come before the House of Commons; it will be assented to by Order in Council. The measure passed is the exact Bill which the late Government insisted should be placed before the electors of Natal; and, being in the nature of a bargain, it can hardly now be altered; but when it comes before the Government, the question as to the natives and the Native Law affecting them will be carefully considered. The British Resident Commissioner in Zululand is about to retire on a pension, and all the questions connected with Zululand are receiving the best attention of the Government. They must necessarily, however, stand over until the successor of Mr. Osborn has been appointed. The successor of Mr. Osborn will not be connected with either of the two Parties in Zululand. He will go there with an open mind, and it is hoped that satisfaction will be felt by all those interested in Zululand when they learn what steps have been taken to arrive at a successor to Mr. Osborn. The Government hope that by the advice they will then receive they will be able to bring to an end the disputes which have brought so much injury on that unhappy country.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, that the prolongation of the difficulties in Zululand had been more due to Mr. Osborn's maladministration and want of tact than to any other cause, and he hoped that the Government would do their best to see that Mr. Osborn's successor was a man who would show more sympathy with the natives.

MR. PIERPOINT (Warrington) asked whether there was any hope that the inhabitants of Cyprus would be relieved of the great burden of the tribute paid not to the Porte, but by agreement to the British and French Governments in connection with the Guaranteed Loan of 1855? He should like to know under what agreement this money was paid over to France, and when the agreement came into existence?

MR. CONYBEARE was glad that this question had been raised, because he had raised it himself a year or two ago. He hoped they would have some explanation as to the arrangement which had been made.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I rather agree with the opinion which has been expressed as to the tribute being part of the terms under which this land of Cyprus was acquired by the English Government. It was agreed that a certain sum should be paid over to Turkey in return for the rights which Turkey had previously exercised over the Island. This was part of the arrangement made at the time of the Anglo-Turkish Convention, which has been in operation for some years, and I do not see any method by which we can interfere with it now.

MR. CONYBEARE thought there was some ground of complaint while this enormous sum was being taken away from the Island. Year after year, in the rainy season, lives were lost through the absence of bridges which ought to be built. He was not saying anything against the Ottoman Government. It was their business to make the best bargain they could. Several proposals had been made, but he thought the Island ought to be handed over to Greece, to which it properly belonged. He entered his protest against this outlandish arrangement being indefinitely continued to the prejudice of the islanders.

SIR W. HARCOURT appealed to the Committee to allow the Vote. The Report of the Vote must be taken to-morrow, and there must be a Royal Order to follow to enable certain payments to be made, which must be made on June 1. He hoped hon. Gentlemen would allow the Vote to be taken.

SIR J. GORST said, the right hon. Gentleman must be aware that there were some very important matters which ought to be discussed on the Vote on Account. On the former occasion when a Vote on Account was asked for, he had given notice that he would call the attention of the Committee to a new expenditure on the part of the Board of Trade in the creation of a Department of Labour. That expenditure was still going on, but it had received no sanction whatever from Parliament. The discussion on the former Vote on Account was closed before that item was reached, and probably, in the course of half-an-hour, the present discussion would be closed. Therefore, they would have an entirely new expenditure embarked upon the Board of Trade on a most important subject, and that expenditure would have gone on till the end of the Session without ever having been sanctioned in Committee of Supply. In these circumstances, he wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he would put down the Report on the Vote on Account as the first Order to-morrow, and thereby give the Committee an opportunity of sanctioning this new expenditure incurred by the Board of Trade? A few years ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer made some remarks which were exactly opposite to the present position of Committee of Supply. He would read them to the House as expressing the sentiments which animated hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House at the present moment. The right hon. Gentleman said—

“What we want before giving this Vote on Account is some assurance that Supply will be properly discussed. The plan of the Government is to get Supply as much out of the way as possible. It is but a mere question of Money Votes. It is a question of the control of administration, and, therefore, the object of the Government is to postpone and compress Supply into as small a space as possible. The most effective course, in my opinion, would be to diminish the Vote on Account by one-half and make it for one month only.”

Those being the sentiments of hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House, as well as of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would do one of two things? Would he diminish the Vote by one-half and take the Vote for a month only—and in that case he did not think there would be any difficulty about getting the Vote—or would he take that night the whole Vote for two months, and promise that to-morrow the Report of the Vote should be taken as the first Order of the Day, so that there might be an opportunity for discussion, and so that the expenditure of the Government might not be withdrawn altogether from Parliamentary control?

SIR W. HARCOURT: The Motion to which the right hon. Gentleman refers was not made by me, but was made by another Member, and it was resisted by the former Government, and resisted by a mechanical majority and defeated. However good the doctrine I then laid down may be, it was resisted by the right hon. Gentleman and his friends; they refused to be bound by it, and they gave up to Supply far less time than has been given to it this year. I must leave it to the Committee to determine whether they will take the course adopted previously. The instances will be found to be numerous in which a Vote on Account has not occupied more than one night. The present Vote has been discussed as if it were a Vote on the Estimates themselves; the discussions have been appropriate to the Estimates and not to a Vote on Account. A discussion on a Vote on Account is usually devoted to matters of urgency; but nobody can say that has been the character of to-night's discussions. Some of the speeches related to topics that arise in later Votes. I do not speak in any language of undue criticism of what has taken place, but I do wish to point out to the Committee that you cannot expect on a Vote on Account to discuss the subjects that are included in the Vote on Account, otherwise you would have what would be a double discussion upon the whole of the Estimates which cannot be so dealt with. It has not been the practice in former Parliaments, and the occasions have been rare on which the Vote on Account occupied more than a single night.

SIR JOHN GORST: After the speech of the right hon. Gentleman I must continue until such time as the Government think fit to close the discussion. I had given notice to move the reduction of an item in respect of the Board of Trade and subordinate Departments by £500, my object being to call the attention of the Committee to the new departure which the Board of Trade have taken. What the Board of Trade have done has not been of a very extensive character. They have a Department in the Board of Trade which was called a branch of the Statistical Department of the Board of Trade which related to the question of labour, and upon this was spent the very meagre sum of £10,000. What the Board of Trade has done is to increase by 50 per cent. the expenditure on this Statistical Department. I always thought the Department very much starved, and, as far as the increase in the staff of the Department and in its functions go, I think everybody will agree that the conduct of the Board of Trade was reasonable and proper. In fact, I should be prepared to go so far as to praise what had been done by the right hon. Gentleman; but I am afraid my vocabulary would not be strong enough to satisfy his ideas of the praise due to this Department. I, therefore, leave him to praise his own Department in his own terms. There are three things I complain of. The first objection I make is of the name the right hon. Gentleman has given to this new Department. He called it a Labour Department. The right hon. Gentleman knows "what's in a name" much better than the inexperienced Juliet. He is rather of the opinion of Mephistopheles that men have a propensity, when they hear a mere name, to believe there must be something of reality behind it. So the right hon. Gentleman paints up "Labour Department of the Board of Trade" in Parliament Street, and he knows very well that nine people out of ten will believe that a Labour Department of the Government has been created, and that they will give him the credit of being the creator of it. To us, who for many years have advocated the creation of a Labour Department of the Board of Trade, this is not altogether satisfactory, because the creation of a sham Department is a real and serious obstacle to the creation of a real Department. What a real Department of Labour requires is certainly Executive power. Now, this Department is nothing but a Statistical Department—a Department of pure inquiry, pure record, and possesses no Executive power whatever. It does not concentrate all the different functions which the Government exercise in reference to the industry of the country under the hands of one Minister in one Department. The responsibility of Parliament is single and undivided. Of course, at this hour of the night, with the Closure imminent in 20 minutes, it is impossible for me to do justice to the position which I wish to take up. I cannot explain in so short a time what a real Labour Department ought to be; therefore I can do little more than say that the Department of the right hon. Gentleman is a sham Department of Labour, and expose myself to his contradictions and his jeers. That is my first objection—that the right hon. Gentleman has given to this Department a name which is a sham and deceptive name, and which is an obstacle to the real thing which we all desire to see established being hereafter established. If he had instituted a real Department of Labour, I would have been the very first to have expressed my admiration of his statesmanship and conduct; but I do think, if there was not time and leisure to create the real thing, it is a great pity he should have taken refuge in the establishment of a mere sham. The second objection I have to what the right hon. Gentleman has done is that he has entirely ignored and has attempted to supplant the operations of the Royal Commission on Labour. The Royal Commission on Labour had the advantage of obtaining the assistance of a very valuable Secretary; and under that Secretary, during the last two years—as the Secretary to the Treasury knows—at very considerable expense there has been created an office, admirably organised, which has collected statistics and evidence respecting labour, not only in this country, but in every part of the world. If anybody wanted an example of the efficiency of this Department they could not do better than see the Blue Book which was issued just before Whitsuntide, giving an account of the conditions of labour all over the world, and of the migration of labour from one country to another. If hon. Members had read that admirable production they would have seen that not only was the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade incorrect when he said that the Labour Commission had only touched the American fringe of the question, but they would see that his own Commission, which he had sent out to do over again the work already admirably done by the Secretary to the Labour Commission, was only touching the fringe itself, because his inquiries are confined to the United States of America, whereas the Blue Book gives information about the migration of labour in every part of the world; and, as giving an exhaustive account of the position of labour, it deserves a somewhat better recognition from the President of the Board of Trade. But that is not all. This new Statistical Department of Labour is feeding itself from the Labour Commission. It is possessing itself of all the information which has been obtained by the Labour Commission; and, more than that, the right hon. Gentleman is tempting the clerks and officials of the Royal Commission on Labour, who have not yet completed their task, to leave the work of the Royal Commission in order to take service in the Labour Department of the Board of Trade, and thereby very seriously crippling work of that description. Of course, any persons who have been employed and trained in the Royal Commission on Labour have a much better prospect of permanency in the service of the Board of Trade than in that of the Labour Commission, and I know the work of that Commission is being crippled, because the right hon. Gentleman is tempting the officials of that Commission to leave their employment and take service under the Board of Trade. The third complaint I have to make as to the action of the Board of Trade in this matter is in respect to the selection of labour correspondents. I am quite willing to give the right hon. Gentleman every credit for having selected his labour correspondents without regard to political considerations. Unfortunately, I should say that a large proportion of the leaders of the working classes of this country are Gladstonians, and I am afraid a great proportion of them prefer the interests of Party to the interests of labour; and therefore I am not surprised—it is natural—that if the right hon. Gentleman selected them without regard to any political considerations he would find the great majority of those who were selected were supporters of his own Party. But that is exactly the mode of selection which is complained of in the Lords Lieutenant of counties; and when the Lords Lieutenant of counties selected without regard to political considerations, and it was found that the great majority they selected were opponents of the present Government, their conduct was denounced and decried, and if you are going to make a proper apportionment in the Magistrates you ought to be equally careful you make a proper apportionment of the correspondents you appoint throughout the country. I go further. I do not know who advises the right hon. Gentleman in the selection of correspondents; but in some instances not only are they supporters of the present Government, but most violent political partisans, and their knowledge—if they have any—of the conditions of labour throughout the districts in which they are appointed is derived from their having gone about agitating and making speeches on behalf of the present Government, and they are really not labour correspondents. They are Radical correspondents in the interests of the Government. Their appointment is really a method of subsidising agitators, and paying them for going about the country, particularly in the rural districts, for the purpose, not of giving reliable information upon the subject of the condition of labour, but of propagating opinions in favour of the present Government. I cannot help expressing my regret that a matter which might have been treated as one of no particular character whatever should have been made by the right hon. Gentleman of so extremely partisan a character, and that he should have in so barefaced a manner attempted to make political capital out of what professed to be, and what ought to have been, a general movement of no political character in favour of the workers of this country. He might have extended his Statistical Department of the Board of Trade with the greatest possible advantage, and everybody would have supported him. Why was it necessary, in the first place, to pretend to establish a Labour Department which the Government are not yet prepared to establish; and why should he have crippled the operations of the Royal Labour Commission, of which he himself is an officer—and which, out of loyalty to the body he belonged, he should have supported—and why in the employment of this Labour Department should he have appointed political agitators in the rural districts instead of men who could have really given him accurate information?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): I shall only occupy the five minutes which have been left to me to reply to the right hon. Gentleman, not on the direct defence of the Labour Department, but by a defence of the appointment of correspondents, because that is the main allegation in the case of the right hon. Gentleman. He says that, with respect to these correspondents throughout the country, I have practically been subsidising agitators. Now, Sir, he complains of the selection of these so-called agitators. The subsidising of the whole of the correspondents amounts to £500 a year. It ranges from no payment whatever—some of them are honorary—then to £10 the lowest to £20 the highest. It is an appointment, not for life but for pleasure, and can be terminated at any moment. These correspondents are appointed solely because of their ability to supply useful information for the benefit of the working classes, and they are not selected by me, although I take upon myself all the responsibility for the appointments. They have been selected in the most careful manner by the Controller, the Labour Commissioner, and Mr. John Burnett, the Chief Labour Correspondent, in conjunction with my hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth.

Sir John Gorst

They have gone through these four hands, and have received the approval of these four gentlemen before they came to me for consideration. I know nothing of the politics of any man of them. There is only one with whose politics I am at all acquainted. In the case of the Chief Correspondents, the second I appointed was a life-long Conservative—the one who is in receipt of £300 a year. His name is well known; but it is a good appointment, and was made solely on the ground of the fitness of this gentleman. With respect to the local correspondents and their small stipends, I say these men will do splendid service for it, and the best evidence of this can be found in The Labour Gazette, the first number of which has been issued and criticised as a most impartial journal by all the Conservative papers, and by none more than the leading Tory papers of London. And yet the right hon. Gentleman comes forward and abuses these appointments and says we are subsidising agitators. I think nothing further need be said on this branch of the subject. As an answer to what the right hon. Gentleman said in disparagement of the Labour Department let me just call his attention to the language of one of his Leaders. Here is a speech delivered to the working men of Liverpool by the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington. This gives an estimate of the work that has been done and is being done by the Labour Department, and the only mistake is that he attributes to a Conservative Minister this Labour Department. Here is what the noble Lord says—

“I would also remind you, in recalling the record of the attitude of the Tory Party towards the labour interest—I think it ought to be remembered—that the connection between Government and the labour interest which now exists was first made close and direct by a Tory Minister.”

SIR JOHN GORST: The noble Lord withdrew that.

MR. MUNDELLA: No; he did not withdraw the statement about the Labour Department, but he withdrew the statement attributing it to the wrong Minister. Let us see what the noble Lord goes on to say—

“It was my right hon. Friend Sir Michael Hicks-Beach—[Cheers!—when he was President of the Board of Trade, who established the Labour Bureau, which undoubtedly at once got the confidence of the Labour Party in England; and he appointed, if you recollect, as good a representative of the Labour Party as could be selected in the person of Mr. Burnett, and he also instituted The Board of Trade Labour Gazette, which is published officially by the Board of Trade, and gives to all labour organisations the most authentic and the most valuable official intelligence as to the state of the demand for labour in various localities, as to the state of the markets, and as to other questions deeply affecting the working man."

I appeal from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University to the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington. I leave it where the noble Lord left it, and when we come to discuss these Estimates in Supply I shall be able to give a full and complete answer to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he would put the Motion in the interests of the Public Service.

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

MR. BARTLEY, sitting and with his hat on, said: I think you ruled, Sir, that you would put the Closure on account of the exigencies of the Public Service.

THE CHAIRMAN: I did not rule at all upon the matter. I simply stated my reason for putting the Motion.

MR. BARTLEY: Do I understand, Sir—[Cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

The Committee divided:—Ayes 192; Noes 124.—(Division List, No. 99.)

Original Question put accordingly, and agreed to.

It being after Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

LAND TAX COMMISSIONERS' NAMES BILL.—(No. 164.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. BARTLEY: I object.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham) said, he would appeal to the hon. Member to allow progress to be made with this Bill.

MR. BARTLEY: Not after what has happened—not after the application of the Closure in that way.

MR. HANBURY: The right hon. Gentleman need not expect to get Bills pushed through in this way.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday.

STATUTORY RULES PROCEDURE BILL. (No. 162.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. GIBSON BOWLES objected.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, the measure had passed the House last Session, and he hoped it would now be allowed to go into Committee.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he really must object to Bills being smuggled through the House at that late hour.

Committee deferred until To-morrow.

NEW LICENCES (IRELAND) BILL. (No. 94.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES objected, and said Bills should not be passed in that manner.

Committee deferred till To-morrow.

TRADE DISPUTES (ARBITRATION AND CONCILIATION) BILL.—(No. 129.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University) said, he hoped the Bill would be allowed to proceed. It had the approval of the Trades Unionists, and was approved by all sections in the City of London, and it would be a great hardship to delay it.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES objected.

Second Reading deferred till Friday.

EARLY CLOSING BILL.—(No. 357.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

SIR J. LUBBOCK said, the House had had a discussion on this question a short time ago, and he did hope that the Bill would not be opposed on its Second Reading that morning.

MR. BARTLEY said, he would support the right hon. Gentleman in this matter, and he hoped his hon. Friends would allow the Bill to pass, the question not being a Party one, as early closing was a matter in which they all, every one of them, took great interest.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN said, he would agree to the passage of the Bill if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the London University would agree to its being referred to a Committee before which counsel could appear—not a Select Committee before which counsel could not appear.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he really must object to the Bill being read a second time. He objected to all Bills being smuggled through the House.

Second Reading deferred till Friday.

IRISH POLICE ENFRANCHISEMENT BILL.—(No. 275.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I object.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) said, he would appeal to the hon. Member not to press his objection.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I object, Sir.

Second Reading deferred till to-morrow.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [19th May] reported.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS, 1893-4.

LONDON STREETS (REMOVAL OF GATES,
&c.) BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a."
—(The Earl of Morley.)

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM asked the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees if he would consent to postpone the Third Reading for a week to afford an opportunity for discussing the provisions of the Bill at a meeting of the inhabitants of Belgravia to be held on the 3rd of June. Attention had not, in fact, been called to the Bill before it reached the Committee stage in their Lordships' House, and, under the circumstances, it was desired that an opportunity should be afforded of considering the measure before it passed the final stage. The Bill affected all bars throughout Belgravia, and gave no compensation whatever, unlike the other cases in which bars had been removed.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The EARL OF MORLEY) said, the noble Lord was somewhat late in opposing the Bill at its last stage. It had been before Committees of both Houses of Parliament, unopposed, he understood, by the inhabitants of the Belgravian district, and it was now somewhat late to bring opposition to bear against it. He would ask the noble Lord whether it was worth while in the circumstances to oppose the Third Reading of the Bill.

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM said, that it was not known exactly what the Bill contained, and great opposition was raised against it. The extraordinary point was that so important a measure should have gone through its various stages without anybody knowing anything about it.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE said that, though the Bill had been opposed before the Committees of both Houses, in the House of Lords the opposition was confined to a few bars. The Duke of Portland had opposed the Bill in the House of Commons, but not in this House; whilst the Duke of Westminster had not appeared, nor had Earl Cadogan. The only parts which were opposed in their Lordships' House were those relating to Bryanston Square, Prince's Gardens, Shepherd's Bush, and in Doughty Street, where opposition was offered by the Holborn Local Board, because something had been done in the House of Commons behind their back after they had withdrawn their opposition upon the merits of the case. The Committee passed the Bill with only one Amendment in the case of the last-mentioned bar; but they had not before them the question of the Belgravian bars, as to which there was, therefore, nothing for them to decide upon. It would be very unusual for the Bill to be postponed at this stage, and, indeed, it was difficult to see what could now be done if it were. Their Lordships would hardly be likely to re-commit the Bill, even were the Third Reading postponed.

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM moved the postponement of the Third Reading.

THE EARL OF MORLEY pointed out that it was quite impossible for opposition to be taken to the Bill at the present stage, and that it was not likely that the House would re-commit it. Full notice was given of the intention to bring in the Bill, and anybody who desired to oppose it had the opportunity of going before the Select Committee. The House would hardly listen now at the last stage to any opposition which was not offered there, and it seemed hardly worth while to further postpone the Bill.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of KIMBERLEY): My Lords, I cannot help saying a few words in support of the noble Lord. Here is a Bill which has been through all its stages, and ample opportunity has been given for opposing it. At the last moment opposition is offered. It is too late for us now to postpone the Bill with the view of in some way or other altering it or throwing it out. To do so would, it seems to me, be open to great misconstruction, and I do not think there is sufficient reason for it.

Motion agreed to ; Bill read 3^a, with the Amendments, and passed, and returned to the Commons.

THE SCOTTISH EDUCATION CODE.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD BALFOUR: My Lords, I desire to ask the Lord President of the Council a question of which I have given him private notice. A Minute of the Scottish Education Department relating to secondary education in Scotland was laid on the Table of both Houses of Parliament on May 1. The Minute had, as stated in the last paragraph, to lie on the Table for 30 days, but of this number 14 days have been absorbed by the holidays. During the first 16 days the contents of the Minute had not become very widely known in Scotland, but since that time and during the Recess a great deal of opposition to it has gathered ; and the question I wish to ask the noble Lord, without raising any controversy on the subject at the present time, or in any way going into the merits of it, is whether the Government will allow the Minute to lie a few days longer in order that the provisions of the Minute may be fully considered ?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I am glad to inform the noble Lord that we are quite ready to allow the Minute to lie on the Table until June 8.

LORD BALFOUR: Then I shall move on that day that a humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that her consent may be withheld from the Minute of the Education Department relating to Scotland, dated the 1st May, 1893.

MR. P. A. M'HUGH (Leitrim, N.) :
I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when he proposes to make his statement promised on the 1st May as to the whole system of the appointment of County Magistrates in Ireland, and the action which the Lord Chancellor will be prepared to take ?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne) : The only statement which I think it useful to make is that the Lord Chancellor, acting on precedent set by some of his predecessors in Office, and confirmed by Resolution of this House of May 5, has prepared a list of additional Magistrates for counties without the recommendation of the Lieutenants of these counties. Some of these lists —including that affecting the county which the hon. Member represents—will be published in the course of a day or two.

THE ANALYSIS OF STALE MILK.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON (Middlesex, Ealing) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if his attention has been directed to the following paragraph in a letter addressed to Dr. Bell, the Principal of the Inland Revenue Laboratory, Somerset House, by the Society of Public Analysts, in September, 1892, and signed by 119 members of the Society, including nearly all the public analysts in the United Kingdom, in which they state that they have long observed with regret the practice of certifying, in a manner liable to be interpreted by the Court as definite, on samples of milk which have been kept for a considerable time, and which, therefore, when examined, must have been in such a condition as to preclude any trustworthy opinion being formed respecting their original composition ; also that the formation of any reliable opinion is in a great many cases impossible under such circumstances owing to the very irregular character of the changes milk undergoes on keeping, and, therefore, express a hope that in future it will be clearly stated in all certificates that owing to decomposition it is impossible to obtain analytical results comparable in point of accuracy with those yielded by the milk when it was fresh ; and whether there is any objection to directions being given to
Dr. Bell to comply with this request, especially if the practice complained of has led in any instances to failure of justice ?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H.
FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.) : I have been in communication with the Board of Inland Revenue on the subject of the question, and I am informed that the statements contained in the paragraph cited must not be accepted as representing the facts connected with the analysis of milks referred to Somerset House by directions of the Magistrates. No analysis of a sample is undertaken if found in a condition which does not allow of a trustworthy opinion being formed respecting its original composition ; and there are no valid grounds whatever for believing that any instances of failure of justice have arisen through the evidence contained in the certificates of analysis

furnished to Magistrates under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts by the chemical officers of the Board of Inland Revenue. In this connection it may be observed, with respect to the samples of milk referred by the Justices in disputed cases and analysed during the year ended March 31, 1893, that, of 26 alleged to contain added water, in only two instances did the Somerset House analysts come to the conclusion that no water had been added, and that, of 12 samples alleged to have been deficient in fat or cream, in only one instance were they of opinion that the fat was not deficient.

HALF-PAY COLONELS.

MR. PENROSE FITZGERALD (Cambridge): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether Colonels in the Army on being placed on half-pay are at once informed if it is decided not to offer them further employment; and whether the absence of intimation to that effect indicates that they will be offered further employment?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): It is optional with Colonels and Lieutenant-Colonels who have completed their period of regimental command to accept the retired pay to which they are entitled, or to go on half-pay on the Active List. If they accept the latter alternative they take their chance with others for employment as it offers. They are aware that their names are recorded for consideration, and in some instances it is intimated to them that their chances of employment are very remote.

MR. PENROSE FITZGERALD: I should like to recall to the memory of the right hon. Gentleman words used in February, 1891, by his predecessor to this effect—

"We all recognise the injustice of retaining such officers on half-pay unless, in the opinion of the Authorities, they have a reasonable prospect of obtaining employment. We think it right that they should be informed of what their prospects are."

I hope the right hon. Gentleman will bear those words in mind.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I will consider the matter, but I may point out that the words "reasonable prospect" are somewhat elastic.

Mr. H. H. Fowler

SIR FREDERICK SEAGER HUNT (Marylebone, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, with reference to his statement to the effect that the Government have thought it desirable to make some addition to the pay of Colonels on half-pay during their period of suspended animation, he is now in a position to inform the House what addition it has been decided to make; and whether the additional payment will take effect from the commencement of the present financial year or from a prior date?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is intended to increase the half-pay of the officers in question to £300 per annum. This increase could not take effect before April 1 of this year.

OUTRAGES IN KERRY.

MR. SMITH-BARRY (Hunts, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the house of a widow near Currans, County Kerry, was attacked by armed and disguised moonlighters on the 15th ultimo, and several shots fired into the house; that the house of a farmer named Flynn, also near Currans, County Kerry, was attacked on the night of the 14th instant by armed and disguised moonlighters, and several shots fired into the house; and that on the night of the 15th instant six cows, the property of Mr. McMahon, a farmer, of Castle Farm, near Currans, County Kerry (the place at which Curtin was murdered in 1886), were brutally stabbed and mutilated; whether any persons have been made amenable for these offences; and whether, having regard to the serious crime in the locality, any special steps will be taken to assist the law?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am informed that the house of Mrs. Cronin, of Cragg, near Currans, was entered by an armed party of four or five men on the night of April 15, and that a revolver was pointed at her by one of the party; but no shot was fired. Two arrests have been made in connection with this outrage, and the men so arrested are under remand in custody and will come up for trial at the next Quarter Sessions. The house of James Flynn, near Currans, was fired into on the night of the 13th instant by a party of three men, one of whom was armed, but none were disguised. Flynn has fully identified two of the party, both of whom have been arrested and remanded. The motive in this case possesses no agrarian element. With regard to the outrage on the cattle of Mr. McMahon, I pointed out, in reply to a question addressed to me yesterday by the hon. Member for South Tyrone, that three cows, not six, had been maliciously cut on the 8th instant, and that the cuts were merely skin deep. No person has been made amenable for this last-mentioned offence, which is not agrarian in origin. It will thus be observed that of the three outrages referred to in the question arrests have been made by the police in connection with two cases, and these the more serious. It is quite true that there has been an increase of moonlighting outrages within the area defined by me yesterday as comprehending small portions of Kerry, Limerick, and Cork. The authorities report that there is no cause for anxiety.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): May I ask whether the accused men will be tried within the disturbed area?

MR. J. MORLEY: I cannot say. The trials will take place at the place where they usually do.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): What is the proportion of the disturbed area to that of the three counties within which it lays?

MR. J. MORLEY: Of Kerry about one-fifth; of Cork much less—probably one-eighth; and of Limerick about one-fifth.

CIVIL SERVICE AGE LIMIT.

MR. MACDONALD (Tower Hamlets, Bow): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will explain on what grounds the Lords of the Treasury have, in reply to a recent Memorial, removed the age limit to 50, which had previously been laid down as the maximum beyond which approval to nominations to promotion to the rank of abstractor or assistant clerk had been refused, and substituted a limit of 60 years?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): The Treasury have altered the limit of age to 60 because, after consideration of representations that had been made to them, they came to the conclusion that the concession was reasonable.

THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Government intend to take action on the Report of the Committee on Parliamentary Debates, with special reference to the recommendation that, respecting the proofs of speeches for a record of Parliamentary Proceedings, no corrections by the Members be allowed?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: It is not practicable, during the continuance of the contract for the present year, to alter the system of correction of speeches, for which the contract provides. The whole subject will, of course, be carefully considered by the Treasury before a new contract is made.

SOUTHAMPTON CUSTOMS LAUNCH.

MR. TANKERVILLE CHAMBERLAYNE (Southampton): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether a new launch for Her Majesty's Customs at Southampton has been ordered from a firm at Dartmouth; and, if so, whether tenders were invited and the Dartmouth tender was the lowest; and, if not, will he state why the usual custom was departed from, and why the order was not given to a Southampton firm, one of which wrote to the collector and offered to tender?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: My right hon. Friend asks me to answer this question. Tenders were invited, and the lowest, that of a firm at Dartmouth, was accepted.

SUB-INSPECTORS UNDER THE RAILWAY REGULATION ACTS.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether any appointment of Sub-Inspectors to the Board under the Railway Regulation Acts has been made or will now be made; and whether in making such appointments those who have had practical experience of railway work will be selected?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): The desirability of appointing Sub-Inspectors of Railways has engaged my careful attention; but I am advised that the existing Railway Regulation Acts do not impose duties upon the Board which could be delegated to Sub-Inspectors. When the Railway Servants (Hours of Labour) Bill is placed upon the Statute Book I shall have to re-consider the question.

*MR. CHANNING : Then do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that under the Railway Regulation Acts inquiries into accidents to individuals and servants of the Company might not be legally conducted by Sub-Inspectors ?

MR. MUNDELLA : I am afraid that such inquiries cannot properly be delegated to Sub-Inspectors.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS WITH FOREIGN FIRMS.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether an order for upwards of £19,000 worth of armour-piercing shells has recently been given to a French firm over the head of any English tenderer ; and having regard to the recent Report of the Labour Correspondent of the Board of Trade at Sheffield, that many men (in analogous branches of industry) have only done one turn a week since Christmas, and are in a most deplorable condition, if more attention will be paid in the further orders about to be placed to avoid spending the people's money out of the United Kingdom in the employment of foreign workmen ?

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) : At the same time, may I ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether a large contract or order for steel shells has been placed with a foreign manufacturer ?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe) : This is a case in which public interests would have suffered by the adoption of any other course. The Admiralty have been anxious to employ English manufacturers ; but a heavy loss would have been involved in accepting an English tender.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT : Will the right hon. Gentleman give the date of the contract ?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : I cannot say the exact date, but it is a recent one.

Mr. Mundella

THE MARKING OF FOREIGN MEAT.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if the special attention of the Committee now considering the desirability of marking foreign meat to distinguish it from British will be drawn to the Report (Miscellaneous Series, No. 286) by Sir Francis Denys, Secretary of Legation at Copenhagen, recently laid on the Table, upon the successful marking by Government authority of all meat sold in that city, and of the advantages thereby accruing to both producers and consumers ; and if the oral evidence and personal experience on the subject of that diplomatist will, if desired, be placed at the service of the Committee ?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden) : I have reason to know that the Chairman of the Committee to which the hon. Member refers is fully cognisant of the Report in question, and I have no doubt that the system of marking in force in Copenhagen will receive the attention of the Committee. If the Committee desire to obtain any further information on the subject, we shall be glad to do anything in our power to give effect to their wishes ; but I understand that it would be contrary to precedent to call a Diplomatic Officer home to give evidence, and, of course, Sir Francis Denys is not himself an expert in regard to the matter.

THE UNION JACK IN IRELAND.

SIR THOMAS LEA (Londonderry, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the Police Authorities of the City of Londonderry ordered the Union Jack flags to be taken down from the hotels of that city during the recent visit of Lord Salisbury on Friday last ; and if this was done under the orders of the Government ?

MR. MACARTNEY : I will, at the same time, ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland by whose authority was the order given to certain holders of licences in Londonderry to remove the Union Jack from their premises during the visit of Lord Salisbury ; and on what grounds ?

*MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers, may I inquire whether the late Government did not prosecute a licensed victualler for displaying a flag from his house; and whether the late Colonel King-Harman did not state in the last Parliament that the law would be enforced and prosecutions instituted in all such cases?

MR. J. MORLEY: I believe the circumstances alluded to by my hon. Friend did take place, and that the answer to which he refers was given. In reply to the questions on the Paper, as they have given rise to some not wholly unnatural excitement and to a great deal of wholly unfounded comment, perhaps I may be allowed to answer at some length. The true story is this. On the 26th inst. Mr. Humphrey Babington, publican, of Derry, applied to the Magistrates at Petty Sessions for permission to put up flags on his licensed premises in honour of the visit of the Marquess of Salisbury. The Mayor referred Mr. Babington to the District Inspector of Constabulary, who drew the attention of the Magistrates to Section 8 of the 6 & 7 William IV., cap. 38, and stated he could give no directions in the matter, and that any person putting up flags should act on his own responsibility, as it was against the law. The matter then dropped. The same evening a sergeant of police saw a flag displayed from the Northern Hotel. He spoke to the proprietress, and told her it was wrong. He does not know what flag it was, except that it had a "red look." The same sergeant saw flags displayed from the Imperial Hotel on the same evening. He told the proprietor, Mr. Hagan, they were not legal, and the latter replied that as they were out he would leave them out. Up to this time the sergeant had only consulted the Head Constable, and no order had been given by any person in superior authority. Next day, the 27th, an acting sergeant on duty was directed by Mr. Doherty, a local Magistrate, to warn a publican named MacIlwaine to take down the flags which he had displayed on his licensed premises. The acting sergeant obeyed the Magistrate's order. The publican, however, would not take down the flags. This was the only interference by the police; they drew attention to no particular flag, and merely stated it was illegal to display "flags" from licensed premises. I need hardly say that no order was ever issued by any Central Authority, and that it had no cognizance of these transactions until after they had taken place. Under the 9th section of the 6 & 7 William IV., cap. 38, a constable authorised by a Justice of the Peace or Chief Constable may enter into licensed premises

"To remove and take away and destroy, if he shall think proper, any banners, flags, colours, symbols, emblems, or decorations hanging out or displayed from such premises."

It is clear to my mind that the Union Jack is not one of the flags contemplated under this section as a flag proper to be destroyed. That and the previous sections of the Act would seem to be prohibitive of holding in licensed premises illegal assemblies or secret societies, or hanging out or displaying from such premises party flags, emblems, or banners. I think the words used by Colonel King-Harman wise words when he said that the law would continue to be enforced wherever and whenever the preservation of the peace demanded it.

MR. MACARTNEY: Can the right hon. Gentleman inform the House what is the flag with regard to which a prosecution was instituted by Colonel King-Harman?

MR. J. MORLEY: It was not the Union Jack. It was a piece of calico with the words "God save Ireland!" upon it.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I beg to give notice that on an early day I will ask leave to bring in a Bill to repeal the section of the Act of William IV. referred to, or, at any rate, to refer it to the Statute Law Revision Committee.

MR. MACARTNEY: And I beg to give notice that I shall oppose the introduction of such a Bill.

TROOPS FOR BELFAST.

SIR THOMAS LEA: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if the 1st Battalion of the King's Own Yorkshire Light Infantry has been sent from Guernsey to Belfast; and if this increases the troops in Belfast above the normal average?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : There will be no increase of the force at Belfast. The 1st Battalion King's Own Light Infantry has sailed for Belfast to relieve the 1st Battalion Lancashire Fusiliers, which is under orders for the Curragh.

INVERNESS PRISON.

MR. WILLIAM WHITELOW : I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if any addition has been made to the cell accommodation in Inverness Prison since 31st March, 1892 ; if so, how great was the increase, and when was it made ?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton) : I have communicated with the Prison Commissioners for Scotland, who inform me that there has been no change in the cell accommodation at Inverness Prison since March, 1892.

DOCKYARD WAGES.

COLONEL LOYD (Chatham) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether an employé in Her Majesty's Dockyards who is in receipt of a pension for work done in some other branch of Her Majesty's Service, e.g., the police, cannot receive the maximum wage to which his present position would otherwise entitle him ; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will remedy the inequality which exists in these cases ?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee) : The re-employment of Pensioned Civil Servants is governed by the Superannuation Act, 1834, and no Civil pension can be drawn by a re-employed man if his wages exceed his former pay ; if re-employed upon a lower scale of pay, then only so much pension can be drawn, as will, together with his present pay, equal his former pay.

COLONEL LOYD : I beg to give notice that I shall bring this matter forward on the Navy Estimates.

THE ARMY AND HOME RULE.

MR. P. J. O'BRIEN (Tipperary, N.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the paragraph in The Westminster Gazette of the 18th instant, as quoted from The Irish Catholic, in which it is stated that at the officers' mess at Aldershot of a regiment now quartered at the Camp, the toast of "The Queen and no Home Rule" was given a few nights since, and responded to by all the officers present ; and, if so, having regard to the fact that the rank and file of the regiment in question is said to be largely composed of Irish Nationalists, the officers will be reprimanded for such conduct ?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : The general officer commanding at Aldershot reports that the only regiment there which could come within the conditions implied by the question is the Leinster Regiment. The officer commanding that regiment reports that, so far as it is concerned, the report is without foundation. I must add that we have no knowledge whatever of the political opinions of soldiers in any regiment.

IRREGULAR EDUCATION GRANTS.

MR. CHANNING : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to certain irregular and illegal payments of the grants for small populations (Code, Articles 104 and 105) made during the year ended August, 1891 (Return No. 336, 1892), among which occur cases of grants paid on the population of an ecclesiastical or other district not being a school district as defined by the Education Acts, and grants paid to a school recognised as supplying more than one district, although the population of the combined districts is in excess of the statutory limit ; and whether he will take any, and, if so, what, steps in order to prevent a recurrence of such payments ?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham) : My attention has been called to certain cases in which irregularities have occurred in the payment of grants under Articles 104 and 105 of the Code. But for some months past special attention has been given to the conditions under which these grants are made, and means taken to prevent any irregularity in future, by requiring fuller particulars from the school authorities, and instructing Her Majesty's Inspector to satisfy himself as to the accuracy of their figures. Directions will also be given that the new Census Returns for parishes shall be carefully considered in connection with the small population grants.

THE DISTRIBUTION OF PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the Orders of the Day sent to each Member each morning now amount to and even exceed one pound in weight, the whole House thereby receiving some six hundredweight of printed matter a-day; whether he is also aware that of this over 50 pages a-day sent to each Member, or about 35,000 foolscap printed pages sent to the whole House, are Amendments to the Government of Ireland Bill issued over and over again, thus rendering it almost impossible to find out which are new Amendments; and whether he can arrange that only new Amendments shall be issued daily, with a weekly edition of the whole Amendments, or some other arrangement, in order to save this large expenditure of printing and stationery and the inconvenience which the distribution of this great amount of printed matter involves on hon. Members?

MR. LODER (Brighton): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question, may I suggest whether it would not be desirable to print the actual clause under discussion at the head of the Amendments?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The printing of the Notice Paper is under the control of the Speaker, who will, no doubt, consider the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman. As to the question of the hon. Member for North Islington, no doubt the weights of the Orders of the Day and the number of printed pages are as stated by my hon. Friend. In reply to the concluding paragraph of the hon. Member's question, it may be remarked that when a Bill does not stand for Committee upon the Notice Paper of the House for that day's Sitting, it is only new Amendments to the Bill, of which notice has been given at the previous Sitting, which are printed and circulated with the morning delivery of the Notice Paper, but that whenever a Bill stands for Committee upon the Notice Paper, all the proposed Amendments to the Bill must be circulated in each morning's delivery of the Notice Paper, and that the cost of that circulation is only the cost of the paper on which the Amendments are printed.

MR. LODER: Then if it is deemed necessary to issue all the Amendments each morning would it not be as well that the new Amendments should be printed in a different type?

MR. T. M. HEALY: I hope that the hon. Member who has just sat down will, in the interests of economy, use his influence to induce hon. Members near him to refrain from putting down so many Amendments to the Government of Ireland Bill.

THE DUTCH OPERATIONS AGAINST THE ACHEENESE.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have any information as to the progress, present aspect, and prospects of the war which has been carried on by the Dutch against the Acheenese during the last 20 years; whether, by the Treaty of Perpetual Defensive Alliance, of 22nd April, 1819, between Great Britain and Acheen, Great Britain undertook to defend the Acheenese from aggression; whether, under the rule of the Law of Nations, laid down by the Black Sea Conference of London on the 17th January, 1871, Great Britain is still bound by that Treaty, or whether she has ever been released from her obligation by Acheen; and whether Her Majesty's Government, taking into consideration the Treaty of 1819, will now either carry out the engagements of Great Britain under the Treaty, or will use its influence with the Government of Holland to bring about some accommodation whereby an end may be put to the war in Acheen?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): The latest Reports do not indicate any prospect of a cessation of the chronic state of warfare which has unfortunately existed for so long. A recent Ordinance issued by the Netherlands Indian Government has, however, partially relaxed the blockade of the coast of Acheen. It appears to have been held by successive Governments, at various times, that the provisions of the Treaty of 1819 had not been uninterruptedly observed on either side, and could no longer be said to be in force.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Cannot the hon. Baronet give me some answer to the last three paragraphs of my question?

SIR E. GREY: The last lines of my answer fully cover those questions.

"THE LABOUR GAZETTE."

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can state who is the proprietor of The Labour Gazette.

*MR. MUNDELLA: The proprietorship of The Labour Gazette, like that of all other Government publications, is in the hands of the Government, and the Controller of Her Majesty's Stationery Office is registered at Stationers Hall as the owner of the copyright?

THE SLAUGHTER OF INJURED HORSES.

MR. SAUNDERS (Newington, Walworth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to a statement in The Daily News, of 29th May, of great suffering inflicted on a horse injured by a collision in Piccadilly, which, for over three hours, the police would not allow the owner to kill because the services of a licensed slaughterer could not be obtained; and will he take measures to prevent in future such delay?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): The accident has been brought under the notice of the Department. The statement that the police would not allow the owner to kill the horse until the licensed slaughterer had arrived is not correct. The general subject is now under consideration.

THE REVENUE OF THE PROPOSED IRISH GOVERNMENT.

MR. BRODRICK (Surrey, Guildford): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is now in a position to lay upon the Table the Revised Estimate of the Revenue of the Irish Government under the Government of Ireland Bill, and of the Irish Customs Receipts, promised by him on 27th April; and, if not, whether he will fix a date for giving this information to the House?

Sir E. Grey

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I am unable to say when the Revised Estimates of the Revenue of the Irish Government under the Government of Ireland Bill will be laid upon the Table of the House, but I will try and get it ready as soon as possible.

MR. BRODRICK: Seeing the important character of these figures, cannot the right hon. Gentleman fix any date when they will be ready?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am afraid I cannot. They shall be given as soon as possible.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH SPAIN.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Representative at Madrid has been able to induce the Spanish Government to commence negotiations, with a view to establish a new Treaty of Commerce between Spain and England of a character favourable to the development of trade between the two nations?

SIR E. GREY: The Spanish Government have not yet formulated their proposals, but Her Majesty's Ambassador at Madrid has come to London in order to confer with Her Majesty's Government on the subject.

SCIENCE AND ART SCHOOLS UNDER HOME RULE.

MR. WILLIAM KENNY (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education if he will state under what section of the Government of Ireland Bill provision is made in respect of Science and Art schools and Technical Education in Ireland?

MR. ACLAND: The expenditure on Science and Art schools in Ireland will be one of the Civil charges of the Government in Ireland, which under Clause 12, Sub-section 2, of the Bill are to be borne after the appointed day by Ireland—in other words, the expenditure will be provided by the Irish Legislature out of the Irish Votes. Technical Instruction can be provided by Local Authorities in Ireland at the present time under the Technical Instruction Act, 1889.

★ FLOATING GROG SHOPS IN THE NORTH SEA.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Government of the French Republic declined in 1892 to continue their concurrence in the North Sea Liquor Traffic Convention of 1887, because of their disagreement with us in regard to the occupation of Egypt; and, if so, whether he can indicate, and present to the House, any official Correspondence containing any such declaration on the part of the French Government?

*MR. MUNDELLA : The French Government have never based their refusal to ratify the North Sea Liquor Traffic Convention of 1887 on the ground of a disagreement with this country with regard to the occupation of Egypt. On the contrary, they submitted the Convention to the Chamber of Deputies for confirmation. But the members of that Body appointed a Commission to report upon the question, and the Commission recommended the rejection of the Bill. The arguments they used were mainly directed against Great Britain, and they referred to an alleged opposition to French influence in Egypt. The hon. Member will find the reference at page 39 of the Correspondence recently presented.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL : May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he is aware that the reference to Egypt to which he has just alluded is a reference to the affairs of Egypt before 1842?

MR. MUNDELLA : I cannot say that.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES : Is it not a fact that the objection of the Commission to the Convention was based not on English intervention in Egypt, but on the idea that England would dominate the sea?

[No answer was given.]

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) : I wish to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has seen a report that two "coopers" are causing wholesale demoralisation among the North Sea Fishing Fleet; and whether this does not render it especially desirable that he should use his influence to secure that the Bill now before Parliament be passed through the House of Lords as soon as possible?

MR. MUNDELLA : I have seen a telegram to the effect stated, and I hope we shall be able to pass the Bill dealing with this subject through the House as promptly as possible, and put it into operation without delay.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : How does the right hon. Gentleman propose to deal with "coopers" sailing under the French flag?

*MR. MUNDELLA : There never have been, and there are not any, and we have no reason to believe that there ever will be any, "coopers" under the French flag. When the question arises we shall know how to deal with it.

THE CLOSURE.

MR. HENEAGE : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, with a view to securing harmonious action in the Committee on the Government of Ireland Bill, he will consider the advisability of using his influence in order that the conduct of the Bill may be left in the hands of a responsible Minister with regard to the Motion for Closure?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian) : I do not exactly gather the intention of the right hon. Member who has put this question, or what he intends to recommend; but I must say, as a substantial answer to it, that when the Government of Ireland Bill is in Committee responsible Ministers of the Crown who are present and taking part in the discussion upon all occasions when proposals of first-class importance or of serious interest are before the Committee on which the Government think it their duty to bring their minds to bear are prepared to make proposals for the Closure at a time when it appears to them that it is proper to do so. But I am bound to say that it would be impossible for the Government to take upon themselves to interfere with the general liberty of hon. Members in reference to the subject.

DR. MACGREGOR (Inverness-shire) : On a point of Order, Sir, may I ask whether the Rules of Procedure do not permit the humblest Representative of the people to move the Closure when he deems that the Rules of the House are being abused by flagrant obstruction of the Public Business?

*MR. SPEAKER: According to the Standing Order, it is open to any hon. Member to move the Closure.

THE LABOUR ARBITRATION BILL.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will set down the Labour Arbitration Bill at some hour before midnight, when after a moderate discussion the matters connected with this Bill can be determined?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am aware that a considerable number of hon. Members are interested in the passage of the Bill; but I am afraid that I cannot undertake to say at present that any arrangement can be made as suggested.

HOW TO SAVE TIME.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, with the view of saving the time of the House at Question time, a Member, on being called upon by Mr. Speaker, may simply respond by giving the number of the question which stands in his name on the Paper instead of the usual introductory form of words?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: My opinion is that the humblest economies of time are not to be despised. That which the hon. Member suggests is one I should be glad to see adopted; but, at the same time, I do not think that the proposed innovation would be a good basis for the Government to work upon in amending the Standing Orders.

THE PROPERTY QUALIFICATION UNDER HOME RULE.

MR. SAUNDERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he proposes to adhere to the property qualification, as stated in Clause 6 of the Bill for the Better Government of Ireland, for electors who vote at elections of the Legislative Council?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The question about qualification, and particularly the qualification proposed in the Bill for electors of the Council of the Second Chamber in Ireland, is one which the Government have put frankly before the House, and have laid open to discussion. They have never stated that in their view the matter was so stereotyped as not to be open to modification, after discussion in this House. I am not prepared to say more than that at present, because I think we ought to avail ourselves of any light which may be thrown upon the subject during the discussion which will take place upon it.

THE BLOCKING OF BILLS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the inconvenience caused repeatedly recently by the objection after 12 o'clock of a single Member to particular business when the House is universally desirous of proceeding with it; and whether he will facilitate the adoption of some such alteration of Standing Order No. 1 as suggested by the Motion on to-day's Order Paper?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The proposal referred to is one of great importance, and I should be inclined to agree that some such alteration as that suggested is desirable. It is, however, a serious matter, as it is in the nature of a restriction of the liberty of action of hon. Members, and no steps ought to be taken without mature deliberation and consultation with the authorities.

PLACES OF WORSHIP ENFRANCHISEMENT BILL.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Places of Worship Enfranchisement Bill, which has precedence on Wednesday next under the Standing Orders, will be taken as the first Order on that day; and, if not, what facilities will be given to proceed with the remaining stages of the Bill, having regard to the statement made by him with reference to the Bill on the 30th March last?

MR. BRODRICK: May I inquire whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that, owing to the action of the Chairman of the Standing Committee on this Bill, it has assumed a very controversial character; and whether he is aware that if the Bill were proceeded with on Wednesday it would necessarily lead to prolonged discussion?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I have not heard that. In answer to the question of my hon. and learned Friend, I cannot hold out any hope that it will have precedence of the Government of Ireland Bill to-morrow.

MR. S. EVANS : May I remind the right hon. Gentleman that on March 30 he said that the "usual facilities" would be given to all Bills which had already passed the Committee stage; and whether this did not imply that the Places of Worship Enfranchisement Bill, which has passed through Committee, will have precedence to-morrow over the Government of Ireland Bill, which has not passed that stage?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I am unable to speak to the exact words which I used upon the occasion referred to; but I do not remember that I stated that the main business of the House would be set aside as in the case of the Eight Hours (Mines) Bill. Still, the hon. Member may rely on it that the Government are not at all disposed to lose sight of the importance of the Bill to which he refers.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR R. TEMPLE : I beg to ask the Prime Minister a question of which I have given him private notice—namely, whether he will be so very kind as to adjourn the Debate on the Government of Ireland Bill to-day a little before midnight, so as to allow time for a brief discussion on the Vote on Account?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : That is a very reasonable request, and we shall propose, about 11 o'clock, to report Progress.

THE IRISH RAILWAY ACCIDENT.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Kerry, W.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what arrangements have been made by the Board of Trade to inquire into the recent railway accident in Ireland?

MR. MUNDELLA : As soon as I heard of this sad accident I telegraphed authorising a special inquiry which would involve an Assessor in addition to one of the Inspectors of the Board, and I desired that some Irish barrister should be appointed as Assessor. The result is that Major Mariudin will represent the Board of Trade, and Mr. Adams, Q.C., will be his legal Assessor.

MOTION.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE (DERBY DAY).

*MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye) said, he desired to move, "That the House, at its rising, do adjourn till Thursday, June 1." In so doing he was not actuated by any interested or personal considerations. He had put this Motion down at the request of some of his hon. Friends, and also on broad public and partly philanthropic grounds. When he first handed in the Motion he was informed that it ought to have come from the Prime Minister; and from 1860 to 1878 this duty was, in fact, discharged by the Leader of the House, from the Treasury Bench. He believed that it was a Liberal Prime Minister (Lord Palmerston) who started the practice, and that it was a Conservative Leader (Sir Stafford Northcote) who first departed from it. In any case, he might be allowed to express the deep regret he felt that the Prime Minister's sense of duty did not permit him to-day to bring this proposal forward himself, and that his inclinations would not permit him to-morrow to avail himself of the leisure which he would thus secure. He was quite certain that however much the right hon. Gentleman might give offence to some of his sterner supporters, like the hon. Member who had given notice of an Amendment—which he understood was out of Order—he would certainly gain popularity among the masses of the country. It was not for him to offer any advice to hon. Gentlemen who chose to oppose the Motion; but he might suggest that they were under a misapprehension upon two important points. They were mistaken if they supposed that the British Democracy—Conservative, Liberal, Radical, or Irish Home Rule—were not passionately devoted to the national sport of horse-racing; and he thought they were labouring under a still greater mistake if they thought that their example of abstention from, of non-participation in, this particular race would have the smallest effect upon any man, woman, or child in the country. Hon. Members would recollect, perhaps, the words of the great essayist, who used once to sit upon the Bench opposite, about the attitude of the old Liberal Party, the Puritans, towards a much grosser and less defensible sport than horse-racing. "The Puritans," said Lord Macaulay, "hated bear-baiting, not because it gave pain to the bear, but because it gave pleasure to the spectators." That was, he submitted, a concise description of what they would be doing if they refused to adjourn for this great Democratic festival to-morrow. If they assumed a sour and fanatical posture towards this great event, the public would be entitled to say that they were not so much distressed about the injury that would be done to the morals of the people as at the notion of Members of the House being allowed to enjoy themselves with the people, and of sharing in their amusement. How often had hon. Members informed their constituents that the greatest pleasure they enjoyed was being in their company? What better opportunity could they have of proving that, for once in a way, they were in earnest than by venturing upon the Downs at Epsom to-morrow in company with the masses as well as the classes? He thought that, on a question of this sort, that House was more liable than any other body of men to assume an attitude that was open to the charge of being hypocritical. Who were they? Who were they that they should have the right to take up this very censorious and conceited attitude on the subject of horse-racing? He did not know that they had in that House as many owners of race-horses as were to be found in another place; but he believed they had a few, and that some of them occupied high places in the confidence of the Crown. And, if they were to gauge the real tastes of hon. Members of that House by humbler indications than the possession of race-horses, he would point to the fact that, not only within the gilded saloons of the Carlton Club, but also within the more chaste retirement of a rival establishment close by, there was maintained a thing called a Derby sweep, which, if it were publicly indulged in in an open space, would bring all the participators within the grasp of the law. He believed that the sincerity of Members of this House on the subject of gambling would best be proved to the world, not by resisting this Motion, but by empowering the Police Authorities occasionally to make what was called a betting raid upon the great establishments in Pall Mall, as well as upon some of the humbler institutions in other quarters of the town. But he could go a little further in proof of his contention that they had no right to take up this particular attitude on the question of the Adjournment for the Derby Day. He believed it was a melancholy truth that some amount of betting actually went on within the walls of that House. The only case which he would venture to bring under the notice of the House was one which occurred not very long ago, when he saw just outside those doors, in the inner Lobby, a Member of the fraternity known as bookmakers, with his pocket book in his hand, plying his ordinary vocation. The matter was apparently such an everyday occurrence that nobody took any notice of it. Now he saw the bookmaker doing a little business, as he would have said, with an hon. Member of this House, and, strange to say, that hon. Member was not one of those thoughtless, stupid reactionaries—he was a Member of the Liberal Party, and now a distinguished Member of Her Majesty's Government. [Cries of "Oh!" and "Name!"] Hon. Members below the Gangway asked for the name of this Member of the Government. He could only tell them that if they thought he was saying anything that was unwarranted, or of a slanderous nature, the simplest course would be to consult the senior Law Officer of the Crown on the subject. There were a great number of considerations—[Interruption.]

Dr. Macgregor rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put"; but Mr. Speaker withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

*MR. BROOKFIELD, continuing, said, he wished that the Question might not only be put, but carried without any further delay. He had said that there were many other considerations which he could put before the House. He might remind hon. Members below the Gangway that it was an Irish Parliamentary Whip who used to undertake the duty of seconding this Motion. Now, by consenting to an Adjournment to-morrow, they would add a whole day to their political existence.

But there was one argument which, he was sure, would secure a hushed respect from all quarters of the House. He had observed that sentimental arguments always had the greatest weight in that Assembly, and there was one sentimental argument which was invariably introduced into Motions for the Adjournment of the House, and that was consideration for the feelings of the officers of the House. Most of the officials of the House, he was informed, were very much interested in the event that was to take place to-morrow, and on their behalf he thought this proposal ought to be well received. Looking at the business view of this proposal, he would ask hon. Members what satisfaction did they derive from the experience of last year? Last year, for the first time for a great number of years, a similar Motion to the one he was now submitting was defeated by a majority of 14, and when the Speaker took the Chair at 12 o'clock on Derby Day he found 12 Members present. At 1 o'clock there were 19, at 4 o'clock there were only 35 hon. Gentlemen in attendance, and at five minutes past 4 the House adjourned without having transacted any business whatever. By assenting to the present Motion the House would give a most refreshing and conclusive answer to those accusations of hypocrisy which were so constantly and, he must say, so justly levelled against it, and would take a course which he fully believed would be at once wise and pleasant, at the same time expedient and popular. He begged to move the Motion.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) said, as he moved this Resolution last year and seconded it the year before, possibly hon. Members would permit him to say half-a-dozen words on the subject in seconding the Motion now before the House. He ventured to appeal to right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench opposite, and to ask them to consider whether, with bad seasons, swine fever, and wheat at 23s. a quarter, it would not be an act of common charity to allow hon. Members representing agricultural constituencies to go down to the Derby, possibly for the last time? He felt morally certain that in 12 months time many of them would not be in a sufficiently strong condition financially to pay for their return tickets, unless, of course, the Prime Minister brought within the region of practical politics his measure for paying them 15s. a day, with third-class return tickets. That measure might possibly put a different face on the situation. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that there was no plethora of capital in the agricultural districts, whatever might be the case in Ireland. It might possibly be a question of time, and Ministers might be unwilling to tear hon. Members from the contemplation of the great measure in which they all took such a warm interest, and in reference to which he saw that some misguided person had been commenting on and counting their Divisions, which he ventured to consider was a most reprehensible thing. But if the Government could not spare the time, surely with their solid majority of 40—which was occasionally a little more—they could, by suspending the Twelve o'Clock Rule for a fortnight, make up for the time that would be lost by adjourning to-morrow? He looked forward with the greatest interest to the speech of the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division (Mr. J. E. Ellis). Nobody who had sat opposite to the hon. Member could doubt his virtues; but because he was virtuous that was no reason why others should have no more cakes and ale. He did not know whether the noble Lord the Member for Ipswich (Lord Elcho) was in his place that afternoon. He believed that on these occasions the noble Lord usually made his annual visit to the House of Commons. He need not say how much they all admired his flexibility of adaptation; and if the noble Lord were present, considering he voted for the Resolution two years ago, and against the Resolution last year, he would ask him to consider whether, in the words of hon. Gentlemen opposite, he might not find salvation and please his constituents and those who supported this Motion by again turning his coat and voting with them on this occasion?

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House, at its rising, do adjourn till Thursday 1st June."—(Mr. Brookfield.)

*MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe), in rising to oppose the Motion, said he should have regard to the fact that discussions on this question had generally been extremely brief. As mentioned in the Amendment he had placed on the Paper, this was a comparatively recent Motion. It was first made by Lord George Bentinck in 1847. It passed unopposed at that time largely from the circumstance that it came on unexpectedly. But in the following year it was only carried by a majority of 13. It was quite true that Lord Palmerston in 1860, as head of the Government, took up the Motion; but in 1878 Sir Stafford Northcote dropped it as a Government Motion on the very good ground that it had become an opposed Motion, and that it was not fitting that the Government should use their authority and influence to pass a Motion which had then become opposed. Since that time the Motion had had uniform success in that House until last year. He noticed sitting below the Gangway the noble Lord the Member for Ipswich, and those of them who were in the last Parliament would have missed his advocacy of the Motion that day. When this Motion was made by the noble Lord, whose sparkling humour and perfect taste and tone compelled the admiration of those who dissented from him, it was successful; but directly the noble Lord joined with the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth in opposing it it was defeated. He did not stand there to oppose that Motion and then not be prepared to appear in the House at 12 o'clock on the following day. He took it that those who opposed the Motion on the present occasion bound themselves to attend in their places and make a House to-morrow. Speaking on this subject in 1848, Mr. John Bright said—

"It was below the dignity of this House to make the fact of certain races being held within a few miles of the Metropolis a pretext for a holiday."

That was the ground on which he now opposed the Motion. Coming there, as they did, with the earnest purpose of passing legislative measures which they believed were for the benefit of the nation, it was unworthy of them to set aside their whole proceedings because of a certain race meeting in the County of Surrey.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.) said, he rose for the purpose of supporting the Motion made by the hon. Member for Rye; but in doing so he was actuated by considerations very different from those which had influenced the Mover. That hon. Member had spoken on behalf of the aristocracy, but he ventured to speak for the democracy. Those hon. Members who, like himself, represented some portion of the large population of this great city dwelling South of the Thames were aware that throughout that wide area the Derby Day was looked upon almost in the light of a national holiday, and there were thousands of them who would as soon think of being absent from Epsom to-morrow as the Spanish workman would think of missing the first bull-fight of the season. The rough Radicals were not all cast in the same Puritanical mould. Many of them looked with a very lenient eye upon the foibles and follies of mankind, and even made allowance for those honourable aristocrats who felt that for one day out of the 365 they would be better employed at Epsom than in wandering, like dismal spirits, round the Division Lobbies of that House. The result of the Division on the Eight Hours for Miners Bill gave him great satisfaction. He was one of those who wished to see the hours of labour curtailed, not only for those who worked in mines, but also for the many who toiled upon the surface. But his deepest sympathy was reserved for those who passed the first portion of the day in dealing with a mass of Correspondence, and the second part of the day and all the night in dealing with an amount of Public Business fully sufficient to occupy two Legislative Assemblies, if not four, with the result that they were deprived of their fair share of Nature's great restorer. He hoped the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth (Sir W. Lawson) would not think he was referring to fiery alcohol. He was alluding to balmy sleep, which when it did come to weary legislators came in a long series of night-mares. He supported the Motion.

MR. MACFARLANE (Argyll) only wished to observe that if any hon. Member would get up and declare on his honour that he had something new to say on the subject the House would, no doubt, listen to him; but, in the absence of any such declaration, he begged to move that the Question be now put.

LORD STANLEY (Lancashire, S.E., Westhoughton), for whom there had been calls), rose to continue the Debate—

*MR. SPEAKER: The House seems desirous to hear the noble Lord.

LORD STANLEY said, that the hon. Member (Mr. Macfarlane) asked if there was anybody who could get up and say anything new about this matter. It was not his intention to accept that challenge. To a certain extent he might claim to have an interest in this question that did not pertain to anybody else in the House—he might say it was almost a personal matter. He had read—and he agreed with it—that the best way to secure the holiday was not to take up a long time discussing it that day. He could address no fresh arguments to the House, and Heaven forbid that he should try to make a fresh joke! As to the noble Lord the Member for Ipswich (Lord Elcho), this occasion seemed in years past to have been a sort of jocular benefit for him. The year before last the noble Lord proposed the Adjournment for the holiday, and last year he opposed it; and in that respect the noble Lord seemed to have done within the year what some right hon. and hon. Gentlemen also had done—namely, changed their minds, and been able to see and vote in diametrically opposite ways. The hon. Member who opposed this Motion seemed to him to put the whole case in a nutshell. He apparently looked upon the noble Lord the Member for Ipswich as a sort of standpoint by which the House should go, so that whatever way the noble Lord spoke and voted the House ought at once to follow. [Cries of "Divide!"] He would not stand longer between the House and the noble Lord, and felt certain that if his noble Friend voted for the Motion they would be able to do what they had done in times past and carry the Adjournment.

Question put.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

(No. 209.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 17th May.]

[NINTH NIGHT.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Legislative Authority.

Clause 3 (Exceptions from powers of Irish Legislature).

Question again proposed, "That Clause 3 be postponed."

Debate resumed.

*SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, he rose to resume his speech in support of the proposal to postpone the consideration of Clause 3, and the postponement, if allowed to Clause 3, must extend to Clause 4. In speaking to the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Colchester (Captain Naylor-Leyland), it would be necessary for him to refer to other clauses than that which was now before them; but he would do so as briefly as he could, and he hoped he would not go beyond the bounds of Order in any remark he might make. The postponement of that clause would involve the postponement of Clause 4 also. The Prime Minister, he understood, agreed that the Amendment was not unreasonable.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian) said, he did not agree.

*SIR R. TEMPLE said, at all events the contention was that the Constitution of the new Legislature ought to be definitely settled before they dealt in detail with the powers to be entrusted to it. He admitted that such powers must be settled in the main before they came to the constitution. This had been done in Clauses 1 and 2. Now, however, they were coming to particularities—that was, to restrictions. And even with those restrictions they learnt from the foregoing Debates that the new Legislature might deal with many subjects not anticipated—such as divorce, female suffrage, currency, Merchant Shipping Laws, bills of exchange, and an infinitude of other things. Hence the importance of Clauses 3 and 4. By the postponement of Clauses 3 and 4 the Committee would come at once to the consideration of Clauses 5, 6, 7, and 8. In Clause 5 they were face to face with the Executive power; and if the Unionist Party knew what that power was to be, and were satisfied with regard to it, they would be less nervous about the exceptions and restrictions in Clauses 3 and 4, and they would be more willing to grant concessions. One would suppose, on reading Clause 5, that the functions and position of the Lord Lieutenant would remain as they were at present; that the whole Executive would be under the control of the Lord Lieutenant, and that he would be under the control of the Imperial Parliament; but the very opposite would appear to be the intention of the Government. That matter of doubt could only be settled after Clause 5 was discussed in Committee; and if it were decided that the Executive in Ireland remained under the supreme authority Clauses 3 and 4 would be less alarming. Again, with regard to Clause 6, which constituted the Irish Legislative Council, it was conceivable that they might succeed in inducing the House to create a Second Chamber such as was proposed by the Prime Minister in the Bill of 1886. If that were done there would not be the same alarm about Clauses 3 and 4. Then came Clause 8, dealing with the Irish Legislative Assembly, and it could hardly be supposed that that Assembly would be constituted otherwise than as appeared in the clause. Then followed the clause which proposed, in the event of a disagreement between the two Chambers, to place the Second Chamber entirely at the mercy of the first—to place the Irish Upper House under the heel of the Irish Lower House. If the Opposition succeeded in obtaining real power for the Second Chamber, such as the Second Chamber in this Parliament had, that would affect their opinion with regard to the whole Bill. Supposing these later clauses were passed as they stood, the Second Chamber would practically be composed of the same class as the first, and would be subservient to it; and, consequently, measures for the abolition of rent and property in land and for the expropriation of landlords might, conceivably, be passed, notwithstanding any exception in general terms dealing with these matters in Clauses 3 and 4. Under those circumstances, he and his hon. Friends would have to press for some amendment of those clauses, so as to take the land altogether out of the power of the new Irish Legislature, instead of for three years only, as was proposed by the Bill. And supposing that the Irish Assembly, free from all real control of any Second Chamber, and entirely consisting of the peasant interest, were to turn round and no longer acknowledge liability for the advances made to them by the British taxpayer for Land Purchase and other works of utility in Ireland, there would be no check on such proceedings except by the insertion of express words in Clauses 3 and 4. The Unionists were, therefore, anxious to pass at once to the consideration of the clauses dealing in detail with the Constitution of the new Irish Legislature before they proceeded to consider further its powers in detail. These were their arguments, and he hoped they would have the support of the House, which he thanked for the patience with which it had listened to him.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) said, he did not think the Government had any ground for complaint with regard to the resumption of the Debate on the Amendment now before the Committee, because the Recess had given the Government an opportunity of making up their minds on questions of the highest importance still before the Committee. He was afraid they could not be certain that the Government had made up their minds on all points, because only that afternoon the Prime Minister had announced that his mind was completely open with regard to the franchise of the Upper Chamber. The Government might well be expected now to make some announcement with respect to the important subjects of finance and the retention of the Irish Members, for it was almost impossible to discuss Clauses 3 and 4 without knowing how these subjects were to be dealt with. The enormous number of questions that arose upon Clause 3 would be determined in a totally different manner, according to the decision to which the Government might come as to the inclusion or exclusion of the Irish Members. He knew it would not be in Order to go into many matters dealt with in the clauses ; but he would refer to one of the most important sub-sections of Clause 3, Sub-section 7, excluding external trade from the cognisance of the Irish Parliament. How could they expect that the Irish Members would consent to cut themselves off from all discussion of trade outside Ireland, when, possibly, after Clause 9 had been dealt with, they might find themselves excluded from the Imperial Parliament? Then, again, with regard to the question of coinage, how could they possibly cut off that matter from the Irish Legislature if they had no representation in the Imperial Parliament? The same observation applied to trade marks, merchandise marks, patent rights, and copyright. These questions could not be excluded from the cognisance of the Irish Parliament unless Ireland retained her representation at Westminster in some form or another. And the Government might produce a great change of feeling on their own side of the House. Many hon. Members on the Ministerial side would think that if the Irish Members were to be admitted to the Imperial Parliament on all subjects there were many matters in regard to which the Imperial Parliament ought to retain the fullest control. There were a great number of Amendments on this clause proposing to increase the restrictions of the section which ought to be admitted even from the Gladstonian point of view if the Irish Members were to be admitted into the Imperial Parliament for all purposes. He failed to see how they could go into this clause before they knew the mind of the Government on that important question. There were Amendments on the Paper to include amongst the restrictions Factory Legislation, Merchant Shipping, Joint Stock Companies, Currency Banks, Internal as well as External Trade, Land Administration, and the Marriage Laws. He thought that all these things ought to be included amongst the exceptions in any case ; but every fair-minded man, on whichever side of the House he sat, would agree that they should be included if the Irish Members were to be retained at Westminster on all subjects. He had dealt shortly with the bearing of the 9th clause on the Amendments before the Committee ; but the Finance Clauses were in exactly the same position. The Committee did not know in the least what financial proposals the Government were going to place before the Committee except this—that they were going to be very different to what appeared on the face of the Bill. The uncertainty as to the Financial Clauses made it impossible to discuss Sub-section 7 of this clause. What would they know in regard to restrictions on trade by the Irish Legislature if they were not aware of the policy of Her Majesty's Government as to the financial portion of the Bill? It was grotesque to ask the Committee to determine the restrictions to be imposed upon the Irish Parliament if they did not know what powers the electors of Ireland were to have in the Imperial Parliament, and if they did not know the initial financial arrangements to be made between this country and Ireland. The Government had had 10 days or a fortnight to think all these difficult questions over. He had no doubt they had applied their minds to them. He invited the Chief Secretary for Ireland to make a clean breast of it—he would get on a great deal quicker if he would—and tell them what he proposed to do as to the retention of the Irish Members at Westminster and as to the financial part of the Bill.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) wished to call attention to the particular ground on which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister refused to assent to the Amendment proposed by the hon. and gallant Member. The Prime Minister first of all made the statement that he had on his side the custom and precedent of Parliament in dealing with this matter. Well, he (Mr. Macartney) would show that, instead of the custom and precedent of Parliament being on the side of the Prime Minister, the arrangement of the clauses in this Bill was diametrically opposite to the course followed in the establishment of our Colonial Legislatures. The Prime Minister had gone on to say that it would not only be inconvenient, but absolutely anomalous, to assent to the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member. It seemed to him (Mr. Macartney), on the contrary, that it would be a much more convenient course for the Committee to pursue to discuss the matters contained in Clauses 3 and 4 before the very important matters contained in Clauses 5 and 6 had been arranged to the full knowledge of the Committee. They knew, at the present moment, that there was nothing stereotyped in the 6th clause; they knew that the 9th clause was in a practically unsettled condition, and they knew that the Financial Clauses were to be postponed to the end of the measure; therefore, instead of its being inconvenient, it seemed to him that it would be convenient to the Committee if it had the proposals contained in the 5th, 6th, and 7th clauses settled before dealing with the 3rd clause, because those clauses were of the highest importance, bearing on what the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster called the other day—

“The large and solid guarantees to the minority against the abuse of either executive or legislative power by the Irish Government.”

The relation of those clauses to the rest of the Bill would throw the largest amount of light on the sincerity of the declarations that the Government had made with regard to Imperial supremacy and the protection of the minority in Ireland. The Prime Minister had said that the proposal was an anomalous one. Not only was it not anomalous, but it actually proposed to deal with the present clause in the way in which similar clauses had always been dealt with by that House and Parliament, when constituting other Assemblies of the character of the one it was proposed to set up in Ireland. To take the earliest precedent of all—namely, the Act which granted a representative Constitution to New Zealand—he found that the 32nd section of that Act established the General Assembly, consisting of a Governor, a Legislative Council, and a House of Representatives, and that the next 20 sections, instead of dealing with the powers of that Assembly, dealt with the election or qualification of the Members who were to form the Legislative Council or the House of Representatives. It was not until the 53rd section was reached that any attempt was made to deal with the powers or restriction of the powers of the General Assembly. The same course was followed in the Act constituting the New South Wales Legislature and in the Act dealing with Victoria, and these precedents were observed in the most important measure of all—namely, the British North America Act. So that the precedents were all against the argument urged the other night by the Prime Minister. The course Parliament had already adopted amply justified the proposal now made, and the Prime Minister had given no adequate reason for refusing its adoption. The arguments used by the noble Lord who preceded him (Viscount Cranborne) and by the hon. Baronet the Member for Kingston (Sir Richard Temple) showed conclusively that the demand which was being made by the Unionist Members was a reasonable one, to which the Government, if they desired to meet the arguments of their opponents, ought to accede. He did not know whether, even at this moment, they could make any impression upon the hostility of the Prime Minister; but surely when the right hon. Gentleman found himself divested of the ground upon which he had based himself previously, he would see the reasonableness of meeting the wishes of those who supported the Amendment.

*MR. H. S. FOSTER (Suffolk, Lowestoft) said, that the Government, during the past few days, had had an opportunity of reviewing their position. The Unionist Members contended that they ought to know how the Irish House was going to be constituted and what powers it ought to possess before they considered what restrictions should be placed on it when constituted. The Government had had pointed out to them, in a way which required an answer, that some of the restrictions proposed in Clause 3 would be unreasonable, or excessive, or insufficient, just in proportion as the Irish Members retained their full powers or unlimited powers only in the Imperial Parliament. Many of the subsections dealt with restrictions that it might be unreasonable, under certain circumstances, to impose on an Irish Parliament, and he understood from the speeches of the Irish Members that they already considered them unreasonable. They certainly would so consider them if those Members were only to have a limited power in the Imperial Parliament. The clause under discussion certainly would not clothe the Irish Parliament with the dignity and powers of our Colonial Legislatures. If the Bill were passed with the proposed restrictions it would only constitute an additional source of irritation as between this country and the Irish Parliament; and surely it was grotesque to ask the Committee to enter on the consideration of the restrictions which were to be imposed upon the Irish Parliament before they knew what voice Ireland was to have in the Imperial Parliament. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had been invited to make a clean breast of it; but he (Mr. Foster) gathered from the way in which the right hon. Gentleman met the suggestion that the same policy was to be pursued after the Whitsuntide Recess as was pursued before. He was confirmed in that impression by the empty state of the Government Benches. All that the supporters of the Government were asked to do was not to meet argument by argument, but to give their silent "Votes, Votes, Votes"—which the Prime Minister stated at an early period was the great duty of the Party that supported him—

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I altogether decline to acknowledge that statement.

*MR. H. S. FOSTER said, he was bound to accept the right hon. Gentleman's disclaimer. He could not contradict him, not having the quotation at his hand. The declaration was in the recollection of the House, and, at any rate, the right hon. Gentleman uttered the memorable words, "Vote, Vote, Vote."

AN hon. MEMBER: It was Churchill.

*MR. H. S. FOSTER: The noble Lord the Member for South Paddington taunted the Members of the Government with their sense of duty being confined to "Vote, Vote, Vote," and the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister accepted that challenge.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE dissented.

*MR. H. S. FOSTER said, that what he had been about to say was that it was true the Government, in voting down Amendments, might succeed in securing a Parliamentary victory, because they had the battallions behind them; but whether that was a proceeding which would commend itself to the judgment of the country was another matter. So far as the Opposition were concerned, they would be perfectly content to see the Government continue what they considered their present suicidal policy. If they continued to vote down Amendments without taking part in discussion, or answering arguments reasonably brought forward, those arguments would go to the country, and the country would come to the conclusion that no answers had been given to them because there were no answers to give.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 240; Noes 273.—(Division List, No. 101.)

*MR. H. S. FOSTER said, he desired to make a personal explanation to the Committee, and he, therefore, took the earliest opportunity of doing so. In supporting the Motion upon which the Committee had just divided, he had ventured to quote a statement from the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, in which he had advised his supporters to "Vote, Vote, Vote." The right hon. Gentleman had challenged the accuracy of his (Mr. Foster's) statement. He had had an opportunity during the Division, through the assistance of an hon. Member, of verifying the quotation, and he held in his hand a copy of Hansard for February 23, 1893, containing the Debate on the Welsh Suspensory Bill. In the course of that Debate the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) said—

"Sir, to carry that Irish policy nothing must be spared; never such a trifle as the Established Church in Wales! Votes! Votes! Votes! That is the great cry of the right hon. Gentleman, and that is the political morality which he preaches. Votes at any cost; votes at any price."

In reply to that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister said—

"It is impossible for me to traverse the wide field of the speech of the noble Lord; but this I will do—I will accept the challenge of the noble Lord, and I will say that the arts and resources of the present Government consist in this—in bringing forward while in Office measures which they approved in Opposition, in endeavouring to redeem the pledges which they have given to the country; and while the noble Lord tries to play Welsh Disestablishment against Irish Home Rule and Irish Home Rule against Welsh Disestablishment, I tell him plainly that I am not ashamed either of the one or of the other proposition, and I am quite prepared to adopt his monosyllabic exclamation, and to say Vote, Vote, Vote—Vote for both Welsh Disestablishment and for Home Rule."

He (Mr. Foster) hoped he had made good the point he had stated.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It appears to me that the hon. Member has entirely failed to make good his case. The hon. Member was speaking about Debates on the Irish Bill and on the Government having adopted a system of silence on that Bill, and in support of that he now goes off to another subject, when these words of the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington were adopted in a totally different manner for a totally different purpose. When the noble Lord said that we were going to sacrifice everything for the Irish measure, I did answer that we would not flinch from the fulfilment of our English, Scotch, and Welsh pledges, and that in order to carry them out we were ready to say "Vote! Vote! Vote!"

THE CHAIRMAN: The first two Amendments are as follows:—

In Clause 3, page 1, line 19, leave out "Legislature," and insert "Parliament."—(Mr. Parker Smith.)

In Clause 3, page 1, line 19, leave out "Legislature," and insert "Assembly."—(Mr. Heneage.)

These are out of Order. The next Amendment, standing in the name of the hon. Member for East Somerset (Mr. H. Hobhouse), is—

In Clause 3, page 1, line 19, after "Irish," insert "Government shall not (except so far as may be authorised by this Act) have power to do any executive act, and the Irish."

That is out of Order on this clause, and ought to be moved on Clause 5. The first in Order stands in the name of the noble Lord the Member for West Edinburgh (Viscount Wolmer).

MR. H. HOBHOUSE: On the point of Order—[Loud cries of "Order!"] I dare say, Sir, you will allow me to submit to you what I intended by my Amendment. [Cries of "Order!"] I wish to explain the object of my Amendment. [Continued cries of "Order!"] I do not wish in any way to anticipate Clause 5, which constitutes the Executive, but to deal with the excepted subjects as a whole, and put them entirely outside the purview of the Executive as well as of the Parliament. May I submit—[Cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is at liberty to move this on Clause 5; but I am clear that it is out of Order on this clause.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) rose to Order. He begged to submit that all the Amendments on the first page of the Notice Paper were out of Order. [Cries of "Order!"] He must state his reasons. [Cries of "Order!"] He wished to point out—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I rise to a point of Order. [Cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for North Kerry is in possession of the Committee.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL again rose. [Loud cries of "Order!" and "Name!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for North Kerry rose to a point of Order.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Yes; but I am—[Interruption, and renewed cries of "Order!"]

MR. SEXTON said, that Clause 2, which the Committee had already passed, said—

"With the exceptions and subject to the restrictions in this Act mentioned, there shall be granted to the Irish Legislature power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Ireland in respect of matters exclusively relating to Ireland," and so on. Clause 3 proceeded to say—

"The Irish Legislature shall not have power to make laws in respect of the following matters or any of them;"

and then recited the exceptions. He understood, therefore, that Clause 3 was limited to the question of power of the Irish Legislature to make laws, and that any exception to be introduced in the provision must be as to the making of laws. He submitted that the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for West Edinburgh, which related to the passing of Resolutions and not to the making of laws, and the second Amendment, which related to Votes in Supply, and the various other Amendments on the page should be moved as new clauses, or as Amendments to Clause 5.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, the Chairman had distinctly ruled the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for West Edinburgh in Order.

THE CHAIRMAN : I have carefully considered the matter, and have come to the conclusion that the noble Lord's Amendments are in Order. It may be said to be part of the ordinary business of a Legislature to pass Resolutions of this kind.

*VISCOUNT WOLMER (Edinburgh, W.) said, he had to propose the insertion in the clause of the words "to discuss or pass Resolutions or to." He thought the Committee had a right to ask what was in the minds of the Government when they framed this clause. There was no reason why the Committee should be in any doubt in the matter whatever, as it was only necessary to refer to the speech of the Prime Minister to ascertain what that right hon. Gentleman had in view. Speaking in the House of Commons on the 13th February in the present year, the Prime Minister, referring to the power to be given to the Irish Legislature to "Make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Ireland, in respect of matters exclusively relating to Ireland, or to some part thereof," said—

"That power is subject to a double limitation, which I will describe. First of all it is subject to the necessary and obvious limitation that certain heads are reserved to Parliament—not reserved as given to Parliament, but reserved by way of excluding the new Irish Legislature from doing any act in relation to them."

That this had always been the right hon. Gentleman's purpose was clear from the speech he made in introducing his Home Rule Bill in 1886. On the 8th April in that year he said—

"I will now tell the House—and I would beg particular attention to this—what are the functions that we propose to withdraw from the cognisance of this Legislative Body."

The right hon. Gentleman then proceeded to enumerate the exceptions which were to be found in this Bill. The purpose which the right hon. Gentleman indicated on both those occasions had not in any way been fulfilled in the drafting of this Bill. The governing word of this section was the word "law." The Irish Legislature were not to have power to make law. He submitted to the Committee that this was a far narrower definition, and covered a far narrower field, than that foreshadowed by the Prime Minister in either of the speeches he had just quoted. In one case the right hon. Gentleman said that these matters were to be withdrawn from the "cognisance" of the Irish Legislature, and in the other he said the Irish Legislature were to be precluded from doing "any act" in relation to them. Laws were only part of the field which was embraced in the word "cognisance," and were only part of the "acts" referred to by the right hon. Gentleman. It was quite true that if the Bill became law in its present form the Irish Legislature would be precluded from passing laws; but it would not be precluded either from discussing and passing Resolutions on any one of the subjects enumerated in the clause. He asked the Committee to consider what a position affairs would assume if the Irish Legislature were to abuse the power it would certainly have of passing Resolutions on some of these subjects. He would, in the first instance, take the 1st sub-section, which dealt with regency. He was not going to indulge in any of those wild and unfounded prophecies which the Prime Minister had accused the Unionist Party of indulging in with respect to this Bill. He was going to deal with historical fact. It was well known that when there was a Parliament in Dublin it interfered with the question of regency. Under this Bill the Irish Legislature was to be precluded from passing any Act on the subject of regency; but what might be the position of affairs if, at a critical moment, the Party in power in the Imperial Parliament had certain views on the question of regency, and the Irish Parliament were to pass a Resolution expressing totally different views and in favour of an entirely different candidate? Although, happily, they had been free from such dangers in the past, was it not possible that they might arise in the future? The Lord Lieutenant was to occupy a double position under the Bill. He was, in the first place, to be the Queen's Representative in Ireland, and he was also to be the Minister of the Imperial Parliament for certain purposes which were specially reserved in the Bill. He was to have power to veto the Acts of the Irish Parliament, and he was also to have power—it might be in spite of the expostulations of the Irish Ministers—to order payments from the Irish Exchequer for the benefit of the Exchequer of the United Kingdom. He might also be considered as mainly responsible for seeing that the decisions of the Exchequer Judges and the Privy Council were carried out. The opponents of the Bill had maintained over and over again that the supremacy proposed by the Government was a sterile supremacy, because, whatever the paper guarantees might be, there would be no Executive force with which the Imperial Parliament could carry out its will against the Irish Government. The Home Secretary, in reply to this argument, had put forward as one of the safeguards of the Imperial supremacy the fact that all the officers of the Irish Executive Government would be bound to obey the orders of the Lord Lieutenant as representing the Imperial Government just as much as, if not more than, they would be bound to obey the orders of the Irish Executive. Now what would be the position of the Lord Lieutenant if he had to carry out the views of the Imperial Parliament contrary to the wishes of the Irish Government, and in the teeth of the general Nationalist opinion? He would have great difficulties to contend with. Would the Irish Executive support his orders? They might feel doubts and difficulties as to what they should do; but how long would they hesitate if the Irish Parliament passed a Resolution condemning the Lord Lieutenant for vetoing a Bill or for giving an order for payment from the Irish Exchequer to the Exchequer of the United Kingdom, or if they passed a Resolution censuring the Exchequer Judges or the Irish Privy Council for the tone of their decisions on points of Constitutional Law. As the Bill now stood, the Irish Legislature could do any one of these things, although the Prime Minister said he desired to withdraw these matters from its cognisance. He asked the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary what reliance the Lord Lieutenant could have in the officers of the Irish Government to carry out his orders if the Irish Legislature passed a Resolution condemning the Lord Lieutenant for giving those orders? Sub-section 2 forbade the Irish Legislature to make laws in respect of peace or war, or matters arising from a state of war. What effect would this Bill, if passed, have on the position of this Empire in a great national struggle such as took place at the end of the last century? This surely was a point of paramount importance, not only to themselves, but to their descendants. Parliament in this matter was acting not on its own behalf, but as trustees for future generations; and yet this branch of the subject had not, he believed, been touched upon in these Debates by any supporter of the Bill. What would be the position of the Imperial Government if, in the middle of some critical war, the Irish Legislative Body were to pass Resolutions condemning the war and the policy which caused it, and demanding immediate peace, or expressing sympathy with the enemies of the Empire? There was nothing whatever in the Bill as it stood to prevent the Irish Legislature taking such a course. When the Prime Minister said that matters of peace and war were to be withdrawn from the cognisance of the Irish Legislature he never meant that that Body would be in a position to pass a Resolution of sympathy with our enemies. Had they no rights on this subject? It was a matter of public knowledge that in some of the wars that had occurred when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian was Prime Minister Irish Nationalist Members, both in their speeches and in their Press, had very freely expressed their sympathy with the enemy the right hon. Gentleman was attacking, and their condemnation of his policy in carrying on those wars. One Member of Parliament even plunged into poetry on the subject, belittling his own country, and praising and belauding her enemies. The Prime Minister and other right hon. Gentlemen who supported the Bill might say that these sentiments were expressed when the Irish Members were smarting under a sense of wrong. But how did the right hon. Gentleman know that Irish Members in the future would not think that they had reason for dissatisfaction with the new scheme; and, if so, why should they not use such means of extorting from the Government of this country further concessions? Again, on this subject we had had experience. When was Grattan's Parliament formed, and under what circumstances was it that it forced the Imperial Parliament to concede its demands? It was in exactly analogous circumstances to those which would obtain if this Home Rule Bill passed that the leading Members of the Irish Parliament desired to have a Parliament of greater independence, and they took the opportunity of a war and of foreign complications to demand better terms, and got them. Was it not almost certain that some Members would desire for their new Irish Parliament more independence and less restrictions, and when we were engaged in a war why should they not again hold a pistol to our head and say—"Give us this concession, or we will pass a Resolution condemning the war and sympathising with your enemy?" If history was any guide or light, dangers which had occurred in the past must be foreseen and met; and how the Government, with their expressed desire to withdraw these subjects from the cognisance of the Irish Parliament, could be content with a barren and narrow enactment as to law, leaving the Irish Legislature free to pass such Resolutions at a critical time, the right hon. Gentleman had failed to explain. In Sub-section 3 the Irish Legislature were forbidden to make laws on the subject of Naval or Military Forces. But it was well known that there had been in Ireland a great Military Force—the Volunteers—which needed no law to call it into existence, and that Military Force was the foundation-stone of Grattan's Parliament. No Act of the Irish Parliament was passed to create it, and no doubt a similar body without any legal status at all might, by a system of mutual co-operation and understanding, again come together. But by this Bill as it stood the Irish Parliament might pass a Resolution calling upon patriotic Irishmen voluntarily to band themselves together and make one of those Military Bodies which had had so great an effect on the history of Ireland, and which might enable the Irish Parliament created under this Bill to take up with greater effect that position in foreign politics which he had foreshadowed. Sub-section 4 forbade the making of laws in connection with Treaties and other relations with Foreign States. As the Bill stood, there was nothing whatever to prevent the Irish Legislature from sending an Envoy of its own to Washington or Paris without making any law whatever. The Irish Government could send an Envoy as its own separate Representative to any Foreign

State at any time, and the Irish Legislature could vote money for that purpose. He need not enlarge on that point. That Envoy might take his place beside the Imperial Representative, and might put forward a scheme of policy different from that of the Representative of the Imperial Parliament, and use it as a lever to try to wring some further concession from us. What would be the position of this country in such a case? Supposing we were passing through a critical stage in our history at the time, supposing complicated diplomatic negotiations were going on and the question of peace or war hung in the balance, would not the Foreign Minister of this country—the man on whom, perhaps, the fate of the Empire depended, and with whom rested the decision whether there should be peace or war—would he not be placed in a cruel position when he learnt that there was side by side with his Envoy an Envoy from the Irish Parliament having ulterior views of its own? There were two countries in particular with which the relations of this country were vast and complicated. Indeed, there was scarcely any part of the world in which the British Empire did not touch some French interest. We had, too, an enormous field of contact with the United States, and those were the very two countries of all others where the Irish Legislature would be most likely to send its Envoys. In the United States there was a large Irish vote. What would prevent the Irish vote in the United States, in the interest of the Party which it supported and the Irish Parliament in Dublin, for the objects of its own ambition, from using Parties in the British Empire and in the United States as a sort of battledore and shuttlecock for the promotion of their own purposes, and to extract from the Imperial Parliament those concessions which were the ambition of the Dublin Parliament? He had only touched upon the borders of a very large field which the Committee was bound to explore. It was a subject upon which not a single word had dropped from any supporter of this Bill. It was a subject on which the House had been left in complete ignorance; it was a matter of vital consequence, and yet the Leaders of the Gladstonian Party had never vouchsafed to the constituencies of the country a word to show how the Government meant to forestall those dangers. Then Sub-section 6 said that the Irish Legislature should not make laws with regard to treason and treason-felony. There were historic words of the Prime Minister in introducing his first Home Rule Bill when he talked of laws coming to Ireland "in a foreign garb." Were there any laws which came to Ireland in a more foreign garb than the laws of treason and treason-felony; and would these laws assume a native aspect because they had been entirely withheld from the purview of the Irish Legislature? The whole Irish Party of both sections were united in condemning the use of these laws, and they asserted that the right hon. Gentleman himself had put men in gaol most unjustly under them, and kept them there. What would be the position of the officers of justice and the Ministers of this House if the Irish Parliament passed a Resolution of condemnation upon every conviction and imprisonment of an Irishman under the laws of treason-felony, prospective or retrospective? Lastly, he came to Sub-section 7, which forbade the Irish Legislature from making laws in regard to trade with any place out of Ireland. Here, again, the governing word was "laws." The Prime Minister had told the country he desired to withdraw this subject from the cognisance of the Irish Parliament. Let the Committee consider once more what the position of the Foreign Secretary would be in his future commercial negotiations. England was the only country that had adopted a thoroughgoing Free Trade policy. Every other country almost was endeavouring to raise higher and higher a Protectionist barrier against her. What would be the position of an English Minister if, while he was trying to negotiate from a Free Trade point of view, the Irish Legislature passed Resolutions in favour of a Protectionist policy? For it was notorious to the Committee that the sympathies of the Irish Nationalist Members in matters of fiscal policy were on the side of Protection. The late Mr. Parnell openly avowed the fact. He expressed the hope that Ireland might yet be benefited by the adoption of a Protectionist policy, and all those who were once his followers were generally supposed to hold the same views. Was it to be supposed that the Irish Nationalists would not give vent to those views when the time and opportunity came? Thus the two Parliaments might be promulgating directly opposite principles, and thus any English Foreign Minister would find it a very difficult task to negotiate any Commercial Treaty of a Free Trade character with another Power. He had drawn attention to some of the dangers which were involved in this clause of the Bill—dangers which the Prime Minister and the Government evidently intended to meet. But he maintained that the clause did not carry out the avowed intentions of the Government as explained by the Prime Minister. If the Government did not accept the Amendment, or insert in the clause words to the same effect, it must be assumed either that the Prime Minister, in his statement in introducing the Bill, went beyond what his real meaning was, and thus gave the country a wholly erroneous impression, or that the point must have escaped the observation of the Government, and the words used by the Premier went further than their policy was intended to go. Either the Government meant to withdraw the subjects he had referred to from the cognisance of the Irish Legislature or they did not. If they meant that that Body should have the power to pass Resolutions condemning the foreign policy of the Empire, censuring the Lord Lieutenant, dictating what the fiscal policy of the Empire should be, and in favour of establishing Military Forces in Ireland, now was the time for them to tear off the mask and let the country know. If they did not mean this, then he could only say they had failed in the Bill to carry out their intentions, and that it would be necessary for them to insert effective words enabling them to do so.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 19, after the word "to," to insert the words "discuss or pass Resolutions, or to."—(Viscount Wolmer.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I confess that the Amendment appears to me to be one of great importance, and I should have desired to discuss the question apart from those Party differences which underlay the consideration of the Bill, and in a temperate spirit, looking straight at the real difficulties of the case—the prohibition of any proposed Irish Legislature discussing certain subjects. It must not be supposed that the prohibition is merely against the passing of Resolutions, it is a prohibition against discussion, requiring the Irish Legislature to maintain absolute silence on certain subjects. I will endeavour to discuss the question with that dryness which ought to be observed in handling questions of a delicate and serious nature. Let us consider the meaning of these words. I am unable to agree with the noble Lord that the question is to be ruled by previous expressions and previous proceedings in this House. We are speaking of a Legislative Body, and in expressing the intention to withdraw certain subjects from the cognisance of that Body, necessarily I meant, in relation to the subject, legislative cognisance. I am reminded that I used the phrase, “do not act,” and undoubtedly in using those words I had in view legislative action, no act having force beyond itself, no act of a binding character. If it had been my intention to say that the Parliament of Ireland should not be allowed to discuss particular subjects, it would have been my absolute duty, in justice to the House at large, and especially to the Representatives of Ireland, to let them know that there were certain subjects on which the mouths of the Members of that Parliament must not be opened. The noble Lord has gone through a number of instances, and here I could not but remark the bias with which he approached the subject. He spoke of the great and serious danger of the interference of the Irish Legislature with matters of foreign policy. I accept the justice of the description of such interference as serious; but what interference could there be? The noble Lord spoke of the sending of an Envoy abroad; but that is what the Irish Legislature will not be able to do. Money cannot be voted and paid in any civilised country that I know of without an Act of Parliament. There must be an Irish Act to sanction the payment of every farthing. Suppose the Irish Parliament were impassioned for evil and animated by all those unworthy and hostile motives which have been attributed to it—suppose the Members of that Parliament were incapable of using rational powers in a rational manner for rational purposes, which is the assumption of some critics of the Bill—otherwise why should it be supposed that the Irish Legislature, appointed for domestic purposes, would send Ambassadors to a Foreign Power? The Irish Legislature would have no power to pay such an Ambassador, or to accredit such a Representative to a Foreign Court, and he could not be received at a Foreign Court without being accredited. I fully admit that if the Irish Legislature were animated by this astounding spirit which is attributed to it—if it were so impassioned for evil as seems to be sometimes assumed, it would lead to much inconvenience. We have heard of paper supremacy, and of supremacy which, though declared, must be of no value. In my opinion, no course would be more unwise for the Committee to adopt than to make a declaration of power without having adequate means to support it. That you have never done. I would ask the noble Lord whether it is wise, not for the sake of the Irish Legislature, but for our own sake, to make prohibitions which we supply no means of enforcing? This we have never done. If hon. Gentlemen opposite can show any instances in which it has been done, I will be prepared to discuss them. The noble Lord has not shown any means of enforcing the prohibitions which he proposes. I would like to put it this way:—What would be the position of this House if the prohibitions which we are now asked to impose were disregarded? Those prohibitions might be flourished in the face of this Parliament, and might be disregarded by the Irish Parliament. This House would have no means of enforcing them. It would be out of the power of this House to interfere. But this is not the whole objection. There is a still wider one. I am not now opposing the prohibition on the merits. I would have no sympathy with the Irish Legislature if it should proceed to perform acts which were manifestly inconsistent with the Act of Parliament; and I would say—“If you can stop such acts without inconvenience, stop them.” The difficulty which I feel, however, is that they could not stop them; and, what is more important, we might, in the attempt to stop them, be stopping that which we ought not to stop, and which we would have no Executive means of stopping. My first proposition is that such prohibitions could have no executory or operative means. The effect of passing an Amendment of this kind would be to place Parliament in a false position, and to expose its dignity to disparagement. I now come to another question which I consider of still greater importance. I do not know whether it is what the lawyers call inter apices; but what I want to know is—Are you prepared to adopt as a principle that when you appoint a Legislative Body you should inhibit that Body, as a proper portion of their arrangement with it, from doing anything except legislating? That is a thing which, in my opinion, you cannot do. I think that every hon. Member should consider this question in some such terms as I have propounded. Take the case of Canada. Would it have been desirable to prohibit the Canadian Parliament from doing anything save legislating? If you had done so and the Parliament wished to pass a Resolution, as it did pass one on Irish Home Rule, could you have enforced your authority? This subject led me to request my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce) to go and consult a book which I had made certain would be in the Library of the House, where the selections are, I may say in general, admirably made. The book I wanted to consult was The Life of Lord Sherbrooke—a most interesting book it is—in the first volume of which it is stated that the Legislative Council of New South Wales petitioned this House with regard to a matter of law—not in New South Wales, but in Great Britain. They petitioned this Parliament to allow Australian corn to be admitted on the same grounds that Canadian corn had been admitted. Is this Committee prepared to say that the Irish Legislature should be prevented from petitioning Parliament or the Crown upon any and all subjects which were excepted from its competency? Is the noble Lord prepared to prohibit the Irish Legislature from petitioning the Crown, for example, against the continuance of a war which the Irish Legislature might consider to be burdensome and unjust?

*VISCOUNT WOLMER: I thought the Irish Members were to continue to sit in this House for the very purpose of expressing their views on these subjects.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I had hoped the noble Lord would have given me an answer, not an argument; but I presume the noble Lord does mean to prevent the Irish people from petitioning, on the ground that they are legislatively represented in this House. How far is that principle to carry? Is the noble Lord prepared to prohibit petitioning wherever there are Legislative Representatives? What, then, would be the state of the case? In one hall in Dublin there would sit the Municipal Corporation, with very limited and purely local powers; while in another hall in Dublin would sit a subordinate, but still a legislative, Assembly. The Municipal Corporation might petition Parliament and the Crown upon any and every subject; but the same power of petition would be denied to the Legislative Assembly. I do not wish to lay down any wide and sweeping proposition; but I am inclined to say that you could hardly show me a case, whatever subject or persons it affects, in which I am prepared to give the slightest countenance, or to assume the smallest participation in any limitation of the right of petition. Will the noble Lord and his friends say that a Resolution is one thing and a Petition another? Have they examined the law of Parliament on the subject? The inexorable rule of Parliament is against the noble Lord. (Turning to Mr. Bryce, Chancellor of the Duchy)—Would you just read the passage for me, please?

MR. BRYCE (reading from Sir Erskine May's book on Parliamentary Practice)—

“Every question when agreed to assumes the form either of an Order or a Resolution of the House. By its Orders the House directs its Committees, its Members, its Officers, the order of its own proceedings, and the acts of all persons whom they concern; by its Resolutions, the House declares its own opinions and purposes.”

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Thank you, Sir. Now, the question is—Do you mean to stop petitioning or not? That is a serious question. The Amendment of the noble Lord is perfectly clear, because you cannot petition without discussion, and the noble Lord would prohibit discussion. I hope I have argued the question fairly. I have not said anything impugning the character of the Amendment as one otherwise than quite worthy of discussion. I have not said that the prohibition of an abuse is an illegitimate purpose. Every abuse of power that can be prevented ought to be prevented; but I am not prepared to say that, while the mouth of every Local Authority in Ireland should be open, the mouth of the Legislative Body in that country should be closed. I need only add we are opposed to the proposition.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): The right hon. Gentleman began his reply to the speech of the noble Lord by expressing the hope that this discussion—which must be important, and which can hardly be brief—should be conducted with dryness. I do not know whether, by that remark, the right hon. Gentleman intended to convey any implied censure upon the way in which the noble Lord presented his case; but I have seldom heard a speech in Committee in which there was more argument, and which was more admirably adapted to the occasion. Though the right hon. Gentleman, in the dry arguments he has laid before the Committee, has made quite clear the nature of his own objections to this proposition, he has not met, and has not attempted to meet, the arguments of the noble Lord. To not one of the noble Lord's arguments did the right hon. Gentleman reply, except the one connected with the sending of a Representative by the Irish Legislature to some Foreign Court, and of that he disposed by saying it would be impossible for the Irish Legislature to pay such a Representative, and, as they could not pay him, they would not send him.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: He could not be received without credentials.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that he was once a Member of a Government which did send to a Foreign Power a Representative who was never paid out of the Votes of the House; and what was open to the right hon. Gentleman to do without the consent and without payment by the House would evidently be still more open to the Irish Legislative Body to do, because they could do it in a more open manner than suited the policy of the right hon. Gentleman when he sent Mr. Errington to Rome. The right hon. Gentleman went on to speak of a paper supremacy. This is a paper safeguard—

“You have always objected to paper safeguards.” He added, “How can you be so inconsistent as to suggest a safeguard which you yourselves must admit could not be effectively enforced by this House?” If this is to be a possible Bill, the Government has told us over and over again that it involves a contract between the Irish people and the English people, between the Irish Legislature and the British Legislature. Is the right hon. Gentleman now going to tell the House that if we make a contract with the Irish Legislature that contract is to be absolutely worthless because it cannot be enforced? By that one argument the right hon. Gentleman has demolished the whole fabric by which he endeavours to support his Bill. We now know from his own lips, and on his own authority, what value he attaches to these contracts between the British Parliament and the Irish Legislature. True it is that, if the Amendment is carried, it will certainly not effectively and completely restrain the powers for mischief which must necessarily be given to any new Legislature created in Ireland; but it will do something towards correcting that mischief. The right hon. Gentleman got hold of some precedent of what happened in New South Wales; but there is no parallel between the Colonial case and the Irish case. My noble Friend has taken a list of subjects on which the Government propose that the Irish Legislature should legislate, and the Government says—“As they may legislate about them, they may deal with them.” Is there any similar list of prohibitions in the Colonial Acts? Is there any analogy between the Colonies and the case of Ireland? If there is such a list of similar prohibitions then they would be logical in their contention; but until there is such a list how can they bring forward the Constitution of the Colonies as an argument on which to base their action as to the list of prohibitions they introduce into the Bill? Is it not evident that the case of the Colonies and the case of Ireland are so widely different that to argue from one to the other is really wholly illusory? Then the right hon. Gentleman said—and that is the argument that appears to him conclusive against the Amendment—“Would you prohibit the Irish Parliament from petitioning the English Parliament?” Before I answer that question directly I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, not for the first time, another question—Are you going to keep the Irish Members in the House of Commons, or are you not?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I refer the right hon. Gentleman to the 9th clause, which it is our intention to propose, and to do our best to induce the House to adopt.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I confess I have never heard a more explicit statement from the right hon. Gentleman at any previous stage of our Debates. We now have it from him that the Government not only mean to propose the 9th clause, but to do their best to induce the House to accept it. These words are now on record. I am sure if they had been put on record some weeks ago a good deal of Debate would have been avoided.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: They were put on record by me in introducing the Bill, when I stated our distinct intention to propose the retention of the Irish Members in deference to what we believe to be the wishes of the House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The distinct intention of the right hon. Gentleman in introducing the Bill seemed to be so worn away by the subsequent utterances of his Colleagues, and I must add of himself, in reference to the Amendment spoken to by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), that I confess I had not understood it was the intention of the Government to do their best to pass the clause in its present shape.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I said to pass the clause which retained the Irish Members.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I admit that is what the right hon. Gentleman said; but I think I was justified in interpreting that as meaning the clause in its present shape, because the right hon. Gentleman, if he refers to his speech in introducing the Bill, will see that the only method of retaining the Irish Members other than that contained in the clause was one which he deliberately rejected when he introduced the Bill. But it is only necessary for my argument to know that the right hon. Gentleman means to do his best to retain the Irish Members; and if they are retained I do not see what function in the way of petitioning the Irish Parliament need have at all. The proper organ of the Irish people in Imperial matters will be their Representatives returned to this House as representing Ireland, and there is no conceivable reason why the liberty of petitioning should be left to the Irish Legislature with regard to the list of prohibited matters. Therefore, by the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman that he means to retain the Irish Members, it appears to me he has finally disposed of the one argument which he appeared to think unanswerable. If the right hon. Gentleman's arguments against the Amendment appeared to be singularly weak and almost self-destructive, the strongest argument in its favour was to be drawn from the right hon. Gentleman's silence. He had to admit—and his silence was a most eloquent admission—that the noble Lord had not gone beyond the bounds of truth when he pointed out what injury might be done, not to Ireland alone, but to the whole Empire, by giving this power to the Irish Legislature. [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE dissented.] If the right hon. Gentleman did not admit the argument he did not reply to it. Has he an answer which he has withheld? If the right hon. Gentleman has, I hope he will communicate it to some of the eloquent gentlemen who sit around him, and that at some later stage we may hear the unuttered part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. For the present I am content to assume that, as the right hon. Gentleman has left nine-tenths of the noble Lord's speech unanswered, an answer did not occur to him at the moment. If that be so, is it not obvious that in every matter of internal administration and of external policy, in time of peace and in time of war, if there were any cause of difference between the Irish nation and the English nation, between the Irish Legislature and the British Legislature, we should, if we left the Irish Legislature with full powers of passing Resolutions, put into their hands a weapon which they would not be slow to use, and which, if used, would shatter the unity and organisation of the whole fabric of your Government? The right hon. Gentleman must know well enough—for no lesson stands out more clearly upon the face of political history—that the possession of an organised and admitted mouthpiece of public opinion, or of any form of opinion, adds enormously to the value and weight and strength of that opinion; and if it should so turn out that in any great crisis of our national history the minority of the citizens of the United Kingdom who live in Ireland should not agree with the majority of those citizens who live in Great Britain, then you put it in the power of that minority to thwart the Imperial policy of this country, perhaps at a most critical moment of its history, and, by doing so, increase ten-thousand-fold the dangers of this most dangerous measure.

*MR. DUNBAR BARTON (Armagh, Mid) was surprised that no Member had risen on the Government side to reply to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. The Prime Minister had admitted that this was a most important Amendment, which ought to be considered and discussed; but that opinion did not seem to be shared by the Party of the right hon. Gentleman, for not one of its Members had risen to take part in the discussion. The Prime Minister had given four reasons why this Amendment should not be accepted. In the first place, he laid stress upon the point that if this Amendment was accepted the Irish Legislature would not be able to petition this Parliament. It seemed to him that that was a most extraordinary confusion, and that no such argument could be sustained. Every Member knew the difference between a Resolution of that House and a Petition to that House. Every Member of the Irish Legislature would still be able to petition the House of Commons; all its Members could join in signing any Petition; but what he understood his noble Friend to mean by his Amendment was that when that House took certain subjects away from the Irish Legislature it desired that that Legislature should not indulge in impotent discussions on those subjects. The intention of this Statute was that the Irish Legislature should not legislate upon the matters mentioned in Section 3, and what he understood was the Prime Minister's view was that with reference to other subjects the Irish Legislature could legislate, but with reference to these subjects it should be a Debating Society, and that these excepted subjects might be proper matters for discussion by a

Debating Society in Dublin, although they might not be matters of actual legislation by that Body. It seemed to him that the first argument of the Prime Minister about Petitions fell completely to the ground. Every man in Ireland, including the Members of the Irish Legislature, would be able to petition the House as now. All the people would be able to bring their grievances before the House as at present, and all the Amendment sought to do was to provide that the Irish Legislature should not be permitted to render the subject of fruitless discussions matters which were by this Statute removed from their jurisdiction. Another argument of the Prime Minister was that this Amendment would be impossible of enforcement. That, again, he contended, was an argument that could not be supported. If anything in the Bill would be enforceable, the Amendment would be no less enforceable. There were certain Resolutions in that House which were irregular, but the Speaker did not put them from the Chair; and just it as was within the jurisdiction of the Speaker in that House not to put such a Resolution, so it would be the duty of the Speaker of the Irish Legislature not to put a Resolution which was within these excepted subjects. Again, that House could not make an Address relating to a pending Bill, and it was no more a slight to the Irish Legislature or unenforceable to say they should not pass a Resolution with reference to these excepted subjects than it was to say that that House should be prevented by Orders and Rules from making an Address and passing Resolutions on certain subjects; and if that House could not pass Addresses and Resolutions on certain subjects, and if the Speaker could refuse to put them if brought before the House, could it be any indignity to the Irish Legislature to tell them there were certain subjects on which they should not move Resolutions or pass Addresses; and if there were such subjects, what better subjects could they be than those which that House said they were not to deal with? The third argument of the Prime Minister was that if this Amendment were adopted it would interfere with the freedom of discussion. But what did that 3rd clause do? It interfered with the freedom of legislation; and if they interfered with the freedom of legislation on certain points, why should they not interfere with discussion on these points? Public meetings could be held in Ireland just as before on these questions, but they would, in effect, say to the Irish Legislature, "We prohibit you from freedom of legislation in reference to these particular matters, and we do not think it unwise or unnecessary to add that we prohibit you from freedom of discussion on these particular matters." Therefore, instead of there being any interference with freedom and liberty of discussion, it came to this: that the limitation of the freedom of discussion in reference to certain matters was the natural corollary, and ought to be the sequence, of the prohibition with reference to legislation. The fourth point of the Prime Minister with reference to this matter of resolution was that it was not an act. He had said he would prevent the Irish Legislature from doing acts with reference to these matters, but he said that did not cover the question of Resolutions. But the right hon. Gentleman and his Government had taught that House that Resolutions were serious matters, and were to be treated seriously, because, as he understood, the principle laid down by him and his Party—was that when that House passed a Resolution the Government ought to take some opportunity of giving effect to it. Were they, then, to understand this: that while a Resolution of that House was to be treated as a matter of importance to which the Government would give effect if it could, the Irish Parliament was to pass Resolutions with reference to naval and military matters and Treaties, which were to be of no importance, or disregarded? If, however, they were to be of importance, then the argument of the Prime Minister fell to the ground, because he would be permitting important and serious matters to be taken up by the Irish Legislature—only one degree less in importance than legislation. But there was a still more serious argument in favour of this Amendment. The history of Grattan's Parliament would teach the right hon. Gentleman that Resolutions had in that Assembly been a greater source of danger to Imperial interests than legislation. The Regency (one of the matters excepted by this clause from the legislative powers of the Irish Legislature) was actually the subject of dispute between the Imperial Parliament and the Irish Parliament during the time of Grattan's Parliament in 1789. The Irish Parliament at that time asserted the right of differing from the Imperial Parliament on the question of appointing a Regent during the mental incapacity of George the Third. Accordingly the Irish Parliament proceeded to invest the Regent with powers differing altogether from those granted by the British Parliament, and they asserted that right not by Bill or legislation. On the contrary, Mr. Grattan said he would not proceed by Bill with reference to the matter. He well knew that if he had done so he would have had to get the Great Seal of England to an Irish Bill—even in Grattan's Parliament; therefore, he did the very thing which the Irish Legislature would do if they wanted to make themselves disagreeable to the Imperial Parliament—and proceeded by Address, which, as Sir Erskine May points out, is a particular kind of Resolution. If, therefore, they were to take lessons from history, they would not for a moment admit that there was no danger in Resolutions, because it was on account of this very power of passing Resolutions that a great danger occurred in the last century, under Grattan's Parliament, with reference to one of these very excepted subjects—namely, the Regency. These were matters which called for some reply from Members of the Government, and he appealed to the Chancellor of the Duchy, or some of his Colleagues, to make some reply to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. They were setting up in Ireland a subordinate Parliament, and they found that in Grattan's Parliament the power of passing Resolutions was a great danger, which nearly brought the two countries into collision, and which did bring the two Parliaments into collision; that the point which caused this danger was the subject of the Regency, which was one of the matters excepted in this very clause; and how, therefore, could it be contended that there was not likely to be any danger in reference to Resolutions as to the Regency and other matters of that sort? The House ought to pause before it incurred the danger which history showed confronted the Imperial Parliament in the past. If the Government were really determined to keep these matters outside the Irish Parliament—if they were sincere in that desire—now was the time to test it. If they meant that the Irish Legislature was not to deal with all these great topics which were excluded by the clause, let them show their sincerity by also telling the Irish Legislature that they should not have the power of moving Resolutions on them and of rendering them subjects of serious discussion. Was it the intention of the Government that the Irish Legislature should be permitted to play with these subjects without doing any work with reference to them? He believed his noble Friend had performed a most useful duty in showing this great danger which underlay this particular clause. Apparently it was contemplated by the Government that these Imperial questions might become the subject of fruitless discussion and dangerous agitation in an Irish Legislature.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick) said that, of course, the House accepted the explanation of the Prime Minister as to what was in his mind when he made use of the expressions which had been quoted by the noble Lord. He explained that his phrase as to allowing no act of the Irish Legislature was intended to mean no legislative act. Here were the words in the speech which the right hon. Gentleman made on the 13th February last—

“That power is subject to a double limitation, which I will describe. First of all, it is subject to the necessary and obvious limitation that certain heads are reserved to Parliament—not reserved as given to Parliament, but reserved by way of excluding the new Irish Legislature from doing any act in relation to them.”

That seemed to him most decidedly to mean from doing anything of any sort, and it appeared to him a somewhat forced construction to say that by “act” the technical words “Act of Parliament” was signified. He should have thought it would have included the power of passing Resolutions. He thought the other passage in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman delivered in 1886 was almost stronger. In his speech on the First Reading of the Home Rule Bill of that year the right hon. Gentleman said—

VOL. XII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

“I will now tell the House, and I would beg particular attention to this, what are the functions we propose to withdraw from the cognisance of this Legislative Body.”

Surely that signified an absolute and complete withdrawal. But the right hon. Gentleman now said it meant simply the withdrawal of the power of legislating. This Bill would create not only a Legislature, but an Executive for Ireland, and the acts of that Executive would be influenced not only by the legislation, but also by the Resolutions of the Legislature. If there was one thing more certain than another it would be that the Irish Executive Officers would be far more ready to carry out measures which lay on the doubtful line of the Irish Legislative Assembly if they were covered by the broad shield of a Resolution of the Irish Lower House. His noble Friend gave a large number of examples in which the various Resolutions carried by an Irish Parliament might have a very grave and deleterious effect upon this country. There was one other matter on which he should like to say a few words, and that was the question of foreign enlistment. He was puzzled to know whether that question was intended to be dealt with by this clause. They knew that any Resolution dealing with that matter might have the effect of forcing a fresh Alabama question upon the country, and he should certainly have thought they had learned a sufficient lesson from one Alabama not to desire to open the door for another similar question in the future. At any rate, it was clear that any Resolution the Irish Assembly might take in regard to that question at a critical moment would very largely affect the action of the Executive. They had heard no answer to the arguments brought forward in support of that Amendment, except that everything was to be trusted to go right, and that to suggest that things could possibly go wrong was to suggest that Irishmen in the past and future were fiends in human form. Without people being fiends, or destitute of every scrap of human virtue, they had a way of differing in opinion and taking different sides, especially with regard to great foreign questions. This difference on the part of an Irish Parliament, if it had freedom of action, might lead to disastrous consequences, and to obviate such ill effects they asked for the adoption of this Amendment. As to the question of petitioning, he pointed out that the Irish people would have Irish Members there to represent their views and the right to petition would in no way be interfered with. He denied that by supporting such an Amendment hon. Members were expressing unworthy distrust of the Irish people. He felt just as much confidence in Irish gentlemen as anybody else. He felt, as the Chancellor of the Duchy said in a recent speech, that they were neither saints nor devils. They had, perhaps, rather more of human nature in them than other people. When they gave powers to a man he used those powers not in any spirit of malice or wickedness, but he would naturally use those powers for the purpose of obtaining what he believed to be his rights. This Bill was to give to the Irish Nationalists one-half of the loaf they desired. It gave them certain powers subject to very large and definite restrictions. What the Irish Nationalists had contended all along was that Ireland was a nation. They found that their claim to be a nation was acknowledged by the Front Bench; but, all the same, their rights were not the rights of a nation, but were subject to all kinds of embarrassing restrictions. If history could teach them anything, it seemed to him to teach them this: that when they put men into that position they would feel themselves bound to use the powers that had been given to them for the purpose of getting what they (the Liberals) have acknowledged to be their rights, and what they would think was wrongfully and weakly withheld as a concession to the prejudices of the British people. The supporters of the Amendment were justified in demanding that the British people should be safeguarded against the consequences of such a use of the measure, and he trusted that the Amendment would be accepted.

MR. GRIFFITH BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge) said, for the third time they had no attempt on the part of Her Majesty's Government to answer the objections and arguments of Members on the Opposition side. Nor did any Member of the Nationalist Party rise to support the views entertained on this question by the Prime Minister. He was rather surprised at the silence on the Ministerial Benches. He doubted whether this silence was due to the fact that the Government and their Irish friends were in a desperate hurry to get this Bill through somehow.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. BOSCAWEN (resuming) said, as he had already declared, his view was that it might be doubted whether the Government were anxious to hurry through the Bill. However, he thought it would be admitted that no rational grounds had been advanced to show why this Amendment should not be accepted. At the General Election the country certainly understood the Prime Minister to say that the Irish Legislature should not have power to discuss and pass Resolutions on the subject it was precluded from legislating upon; and the opinions of some of those who supported Home Rule would certainly be changed when they found that, by the non-acceptance of this Amendment, the Irish Legislature would be able, by discussing and passing Resolutions, to obtain further concessions. The power of passing Resolutions, as exercised by Grattan's Parliament, was used to the detriment of the Imperial Parliament and of Imperial interests; and it would be dangerous to have an Irish Legislature passing Resolutions on subjects upon which they were forbidden to legislate. If, as the Prime Minister said, they could not restrain the Irish Legislature from discussing and passing Resolutions, how could they enforce prohibitions against legislation upon excepted subjects? How could they enforce any prohibitive sentence in this Bill? How could they enforce the declaration that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament was not to be impaired? To say that the Amendment could not be enforced was to give away the whole of the declared intention of the Government. The Amendment would stand precisely upon the same footing as the exceptions in the clause. If it was impossible to prevent the Irish Parliament from passing Resolutions, it would be equally impossible to prevent their passing laws. Had the power of Local Bodies to pass Resolutions been beneficially exercised? The Boards of Guardians in Ireland had neglected their proper business in order to discuss evictions and the tyranny of landlords, with which they had nothing to do——

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): How about the Grand Juries?

MR. BOSCAWEN said, there could be no doubt that the Bodies he referred to had wasted time in discussing questions that did not come within their business cognisance, and that to the neglect of the regular business which they were appointed to discharge. It was very difficult, owing to the action of these Bodies, for the authorities to enforce the law. But they had examples nearly as flagrant nearer home. During the tithe agitation in Wales the County Councils could not proceed to their proper business without first discussing whether there ought to be an Established Church in Wales and whether the police ought to be allowed to attend distraint sales. At every meeting resolutions were passed in favour of Disestablishment and against the police attending tithe distraint sales, which were necessary to the carrying out of the law; and then the regular business was done in a hurry at the end of the meeting. It never entered into the head of anybody who voted for Home Rule that the Irish Legislature would be allowed even to discuss such matters as Foreign Treaties, such matters as the Crown or a Regency; and without this Amendment the clause would leave a dangerous power in the hands of the Legislature; and, when England might happen to be in difficulty, the working of such a clause might lead to Imperial disaster. He should support the Amendment.

*MR. H. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.) said, one of the remarkable features of that Debate was that all the argument was on one side; but perhaps the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. J. Morley) would redress the balance when he came to address the House——

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): No, no!

*MR. HOBHOUSE said, the Prime Minister, in the speech which he had delivered early in the evening, had shown a full sense of the importance of the Amendment and of the extreme difficulty of meeting it. The right hon. Gentleman adduced two arguments—the first dealing with the power to discuss and pass Resolutions; and the second with reference to the right of Petition. It was an ominous reflection that the Prime Minister had admitted that he proposed to create a Parliament, the action of which he could not control to the extent of preventing it from discussing and passing Resolutions. He had told them that in his view the Irish Legislature should be the organ of the general voice of the Irish people. If that was the view of the Prime Minister and the Government, they ought not to have introduced this clause into the Bill at all. There was no doubt that over and over again, in the clause, subjects were mentioned in which the people of Ireland would be most legitimately interested, but which, nevertheless, the Government asked the Committee to prevent the Irish Legislature from legislating upon. These arguments, if they were valid at all, went a great deal too far. They were directed not only against the power of passing Resolutions, but also against the power of making laws. Some of these Resolutions might have an extremely important bearing on the action of the Irish Government. There had recently been a very striking illustration in that House of how the action of a Government might be affected not by passing laws, but by passing a Resolution—he referred to the Resolution passed after a very short discussion a fortnight ago, on which the Lord Chancellor was pledged to act in creating Justices of the Peace throughout the United Kingdom. That would reverse what had been the established practice time out of mind. The natural way of reversing such a practice in a Constitutional country would be by passing a law with the consent of the two Houses of the Legislature and of the Crown. That course, however, was not taken, and it was, at least, possible to conceive that there might be similar action on the part of the Irish Government in the future. There would be a much more potent reason for such action actuating a new Irish Government, for they, instead of representing the majority in a Sovereign Parliament, would be “cribbed, cabined, and confined” by a law imposed from without—the alien law of the Imperial Parliament coming in, what the Prime Minister had once called, a “foreign garb.” Under those circumstances, the Irish Administration might be disposed to take the Resolution either of one House or, if they liked it better, of both Houses of the new Legislature, and act on it to the best of their ability. And yet they were told that the intention and wish of Her Majesty’s Government was to prevent the Irish Legislature from passing any Act which would be binding in respect of the various matters mentioned in the section. He would allude to a few things which might be done in this way by Resolution. His noble Friend had suggested that in the case of a Regency the Irish Government, acting on Resolution, might proclaim a different Regent from that recognised by this country. Then, the Irish Parliament might release an Alabama, acting on a Resolution of the Legislative Assembly—an act which might very well involve not the Irish Government, but the Imperial Government, either in a foreign war, or in compensation to the tune of several millions of money. Surely that was a matter which concerned the taxpayers of Great Britain. It was not a matter of small importance, and he ventured to think that an Irish Government who refused to act on a Resolution of this character passed in deference to the feeling of the American friends of the majority in the Irish Parliament would incur great danger of being hurled from power by that majority. They might establish a Volunteer Force, conclude a secret Treaty with America or any foreign country, or extradite political prisoners without the protection of the Extradition Laws. They might release treason-felony prisoners whom the majority of the Irish Parliament might think unjustly sacrificed to the law of the Imperial Parliament. In fact, a very large number of instances might be mentioned in which the most serious acts of policy might be taken on the strength of a Resolution, and would be taken, because the Irish Government would depend for their power on the very majority which passed the Resolution. It was an important fact that a large part of the clause was concerned with things that could naturally be done without any legislative action whatever on the part of the Legislature. They (the Unionist Party) had been accused, and not for the first time, of attributing to the proposed new Legislature improper motives, because they suggested that the Members of that Legislature might not only be willing but anxious to go beyond the functions conferred upon them by the Bill and enter into relations with Foreign Powers. Surely, considering the remarkable relations which existed at this very moment between one of the Parliamentary Parties in the House and the large body of their friends and relatives in America, it was not beyond the bounds of ordinary expectation to expect that they would wish to show their gratitude and make an adequate return for the favours they had received and the favours they undoubtedly would continue to receive from the other side of the Atlantic. Nothing, to his mind, was more probable than that action would be taken to enter into closer relations with some Foreign Powers—with Rome, for instance, seeing that the majority of the Representatives would be, to a great extent, controlled by the Catholic priests. Money could not be voted for the purpose, but it would only be necessary to pass a Resolution on the subject, and the Government would be bound to find the means for establishing these diplomatic relations. With America and Rome an Irish Parliament would be almost certain to establish close relations. It had been pointed out that elective bodies in Ireland at present discussed and passed resolutions on political questions. That was true, and, if he remembered rightly, some Irish Boards of Guardians had been suspended for neglecting their proper business for matters outside their proper functions—matters such as the evicted tenants and the Coercion Act. He did not suppose his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary would be willing to suspend the Irish Parliament for such neglect of duty, as he had ridiculed the suspension even of a County Council that did not perform its duty. But in creating a brand new Body with brand new functions they were bound to take into consideration the possibility of their not confining themselves to their proper duties and sacrificing the interests of the public by discussing and passing Resolutions on subjects with which they had nothing to do. It was said that the proposed prohibition could not be enforced. But should the Irish Legislature be as orderly as it was always represented to the Committee that it would be, there would be no difficulty in enforcing this proposed prohibition; because when a Resolution on a forbidden subject was proposed, all that the Speaker or Chairman would have to do would be to call the Member proposing it to Order. Judging from the respect for order now exhibited by Nationalist Members when Unionists were attempting to depart from the strict ruling of the Chair, they might rest satisfied that if this prohibition were introduced it would meet with ready acceptance from the Members of the Irish Legislature. He ventured to commend the Amendment from two points of view—first, that of those who thought that the new Body was very likely indeed to exceed its functions and to be disorderly; and, secondly, from the point of view that nothing was likely to be more businesslike or orderly than the new Body. From whatever point of view the matter was regarded, the Committee would see that if they inserted a clause for the purpose of prohibiting the Irish Legislature from passing laws on particular subjects it was only reasonable and logical and consequential to forbid them from passing Resolutions on similar subjects—Resolutions on which a Government would be bound to act if it wished to continue a Government.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.) thought that this discussion was about the most valuable that had taken place since the Bill was before the House, because it had brought to notice certain matters with a clearness that they had not attained to before. It seemed to be admitted on all hands that there was no power under the Bill to prevent the dangers which the noble Lord who moved the Amendment had so eloquently pointed out. The Prime Minister had frankly admitted it. The reality and greatness of those dangers must have struck every Member who had listened to the noble Lord's speech, for he showed that safeguards were useless—if, indeed, it was necessary to point out the fact to the House, seeing that the Ulster Members had always maintained their uselessness, and had declared that they would rather be without them. One important point which had been gained was a deliberate statement from the Prime Minister that, if he could, the Irish Members would be retained in that House. But if the Irish Members were to be retained to the number of 80, which would be the full representation to which Ireland was entitled, it would be quite unnecessary for the Irish Parliament to indulge in petitioning. The noble Lord had called attention to several important matters which might become the subject of discussion and Resolution in an Irish Parliament. He had first called attention to Resolutions as to the Crown and the succession. He had pointed to the well-known fact that Grattan's Parliament had actually discussed the question of the Regency during the illness of George III., and had come to a Resolution as to how it should be filled up. The noble Lord had also referred to the power of the Irish Parliament to pass Resolutions with regard to making war. They had seen Resolutions of that kind before. They had had illustrations of such things so frequently that it was not wonderful that they should expect that Resolutions in this direction would be proposed in an Irish Legislature. There was a gay and festive locality called Letterkenny, which owed its notoriety to the fact that the senior Member for the City of Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) made a speech there while war was going on between this country and another during the term of Office of the Prime Minister, and the audience very largely cheered the Power with which we were at war. That being so, and the sentiments of that constituency having been expressed with great unanimity, it would not be wonderful if in the Irish Legislature the Member for that part of East Donegal in which Letterkenny was situated proposed a Resolution of sympathy with such a Foreign Power. Then, again, the noble Lord had called attention to the matter of sending Envoys and Ambassadors to foreign countries. Many Members of the House had not had their attention turned to this matter before. It came as a surprise to most Members of the House to learn that the Irish Legislature could send Envoys or Ambassadors to a Foreign State. Could anyone imagine that the Irish Parliament, composed, as it would be, mostly of Roman Catholics, would not send an Envoy to Rome? He did not think they would be true to their convictions if they would not. These things had been pointed out, and the Prime Minister had risen in his place and had admitted the gravity of every one of them, and his answer was that they could not possibly be prevented. With that statement they must all agree. They did not think it would be possible to prevent those dangers; they did not believe that the Imperial Parliament could control the Irish Parliament in any possible way; and, that being so, he accepted the Prime Minister's statement most fully. Then the right hon. Gentleman said that the Canadian Parliament had passed a Resolution in favour of Home Rule, and that we should only have stultified ourselves if we had attempted to interfere. That was absolutely true. We had no power over the Canadian Parliament. Canada was, for all practical purposes, totally separated from us, except in the matter of that which was called the golden link of the Crown. Were they going to give to an Irish Parliament the same powers as the Canadian Parliament possessed? If so, the fact ought to be stated, so that Members might know where they were. If the analogy was to be taken from Canada or Victoria, or any other Colonial Parliament, the Committee should know it. The Prime Minister asked if they would prevent the Irish Parliament from exercising the right to petition—a right which every Vestry and Local Board and other small authority possessed. And if, said the right hon. Gentleman, they permitted the Irish Parliament to petition, as a necessary consequence they must allow them to discuss the subjects upon which they would petition. That was true; but, without interfering with that right, a clause could be inserted in the Bill preventing the Irish Legislature from passing Resolutions on prohibited questions, and providing that the Speaker or Chairman should not put such Resolutions from the Chair. In this respect the presiding authority in the Irish Parliament would only be following the example of the Chairman of the London County Council, who, when a resolution was moved in respect of meetings in Trafalgar Square, refused to submit it to the Council on the ground that it was ultra vires. A clause might be inserted in the Bill declaring that if the Irish Parliament and Irish Members wandered into forbidden bye-paths of discussion, nevertheless no Resolutions founded on those discussions should be put from the Chair. The Prime Minister had said that if men set themselves deliberately to do wrong and go away from their contracts there was no power to restrain them—whilst declaring it to be his desire to safeguard the minority in Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman said it could not be done. He seemed to think there was only one thing to be done—namely, to trust to the majority of the Irish people. Well, he (Mr. Rentoul) did trust those who would form the majority in an Irish Parliament absolutely. He trusted them to make thorough good use of this Bill when they got it, and to do their best to bring about that which they so much desired—namely, total separation between this country and Ireland. On these points he trusted them, but on the other point, in regard to the loyal minority in Ireland, he had no trust in them whatever. For these reasons he desired to support the Amendment of the noble Lord, and to impress on the Government the duty of inserting in the Bill some clause which would prevent these Resolutions being passed in the Irish Legislature.

*MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD (Warwick, Stratford) said, that no part of the speech of the Mover of the Amendment was more convincing than that in which he showed the possibility of the Irish Legislature establishing relations with Foreign Powers. The Prime Minister, in his reply, had raised two objections. He had objected, first, that there would be no power on the part of the Irish Legislature to pay Envoys; and, secondly, that, unless such Envoys were properly accredited and had credentials, they would not be received by any Foreign Power. His right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition dealt effectively and thoroughly with the first of these objections. He showed how Missions had been sent before now without Parliament having been called upon to vote a penny towards their support, and he had given one instance. But, in the case of Ireland, it would not be necessary for the Irish Parliament to vote any money towards the expense of a Mission that might be undertaken to make representations to, or communicate with, the enemies of England. Whenever Ireland had needed money to inflict an injury on England that money had been forthcoming without making any call upon Ireland. As regarded the question of credentials, supposing that the Irish Parliament desired to send Envoys to a Power with which England was on friendly terms, no doubt that Power, acting loyally by us, would refuse to receive Envoys from the Irish Parliament, unless they were backed by credentials from the English Government. But supposing that we were not on friendly terms with the Government to which Ireland desired to send Envoys—supposing there were strained relations, that we were even on the eve of war, that the issues of peace and war were under discussion, who could doubt that, at such a moment, Irish Envoys, coming with a message from the traitors in the camp, would be received with open arms? That would be their opportunity. England's difficulty would be, "under the blessing of Providence," as was, he believed, said by the Member for Clare, once more Ireland's opportunity; and it would be exactly when relations were in the most difficult stage that the Irish Envoys would come further to embarrass our Ambassador or Minister. That was the great danger with which they would have to contend. He was not speaking of an imaginary danger, for he had seen something of these things in the course of a tolerably long diplomatic career. He had seen men sent over by the enemies of the Government that happened to be in power in the country to which they belonged, and he had seen how they embarrassed the Ambassadors who were acting for their own country, and were alone holding full powers. There were times when friendly relations between two countries might be imperilled by these unauthorised and amateur diplomatists. That was a great and real danger. Imagine a Mission sent out to America, such as the Mission undertaken so ably by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham some time ago. Suppose that our Representative arrived at Washington to carry out difficult and delicate negotiations, but that, at the same time, the Member for Louth or the Member for North Kerry came out on behalf of the Irish Government for the express purpose of throwing sand and grit in the wheels of the coach of the English Representative. How would that act on the negotiations? Would the English Representative not be sorely impeded? He took leave to think that no diplomatist, however able, could afford to neglect the danger of such intrigues going on around him. In the case of the Mission of the Member for West Birmingham there was a friendly negotiation between two friendly Powers anxious to arrive at the solution of a difficulty which they both acknowledged. In a case like that the intrigues of unauthorised persons might not be effective, though they would always be embarrassing. But how would it be in a case of peace or war? How would it be if a Foreign Government dealing with our Minister or Ambassador at a moment when the fate of nations hung in the balance found that there were men on the scene nominally subjects of the Queen, but, in fact, traitors in the camp, who were ready to assist to the utmost of their power the nation with whom we might be in difficulties? He held that this was a most real and a most vital question in regard to the proposed Legislature. If this clause stood in its present form they would have in it—as, indeed, they had in every part of this disastrous measure—a standing danger to England. It was a danger that they could not afford to neglect, and he ventured to think that any hon. Member who would carefully consider the points which might be raised under that clause would see that it was a clause which he could not vote for without adding to the difficulties and dangers of this country precisely at moments when those difficulties and dangers might be most pressing.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, he did not rise to go into the details of the question, because at the present moment the noble Lord the Member for Edinburgh had made a statesmanlike speech which had not been answered on any single point. The Prime Minister had contented himself with referring to one or two matters which were, perhaps, à propos to the subject under discussion, but without dealing with the questions raised by the noble Lord. The right

hon. Gentleman had mentioned Petitions, but the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition had satisfactorily dealt with that point. The whole question was what was to be the representation of the Irish Members in the House. If the Irish Members were to be retained at Westminster, the constituencies would have the same right of presenting Petitions to this House as they had now. He thought the Committee had derived one advantage from the discussion, for they had heard something which they did not know before. They now knew, from what was said, and what was not said, by the Prime Minister, that Ireland would be represented in its full strength of 103 Members within the Imperial Parliament. It might be assumed from the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman that he fully intended to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), so that the Irish Members would not only be supreme in College Green, but at Westminster also, over English, Scotch, and Welsh concerns. He doubted whether the Government would find a great number of their supporters to vote for such a proposal; and the Scotch Members especially were pledged to the eyes against Ireland having any such representation after she had a Parliament of her own. The Prime Minister argued that if the Amendment were carried there would be no means of putting it into effect; but if that argument was a good one against the Amendment, it was equally good against the clause as it stood. If it were impossible to prevent the Irish Parliament from passing Resolutions and voting money, it would also be impossible to prevent their making laws, except by the force of arms, and that meant nothing short of civil war. In fact, what the Prime Minister had said constituted the very strongest argument against the Bill that had been used throughout the whole Debate. The right hon. Gentleman had thrown away the whole case for the Bill, and had admitted that there was no power in the world by which the British Parliament could effectually maintain its supremacy. It was clear the noble Lord had not exaggerated the importance of the point with regard to Foreign Envoys. Many Envoys who had performed great service for this country had been sent out without being paid; and why should that not be done in Ireland, especially if the Executive, in sending them out, were acting on the authority of a Resolution of the Irish Parliament? This question, to his mind, was most important. He did not think that either this clause or Clause 4 would be of the slightest use so long as the Executive power in Ireland had unlimited influence. If the Irish Parliament was to have the power of passing Resolutions its hands would be materially strengthened if at any time it desired to set at defiance the power of the Imperial Parliament.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) said, that when this Debate was spoken of in the future, it would be described as "the lop-sided Debate." The discussions on the Bill consisted, as a rule, of many speeches from the Opposition and one speech from the Prime Minister. The present Debate was an instance in point. The Amendment, which had been moved in a speech of such conspicuous ability, raised a question not so much of Irish as of Imperial interest. He was bound to confess that if the Bill could be shown to affect only Ireland, he believed it would have much more chance of being accepted by the country, which, as it was, it never would be. The country was beginning to see, and would see more and more as these Debates went on, that the question was not simply an Irish Question, but that Irish affairs were inextricably mixed up with Imperial affairs; and the opinion was, therefore, gaining ground that it was beyond the power of Parliament to disentangle them. The noble Lord who moved the Amendment was answered by the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman had practically taken all the rhetorical efforts out of the hands of his Colleagues, and he supposed the reason was that none of them exactly knew what the right hon. Gentleman meant. Members had thought that evening that they had got an authoritative declaration from the right hon. Gentleman in plain English, but the right hon. Gentleman jumped up two minutes afterwards and informed the Committee that he did not mean what he had said just before. If the right hon. Gentleman did not himself know what he meant, how could his Colleagues be expected to know. The right hon. Gentleman had only touched one of the arguments used in the noble Lord's speech, and that was the very last one he ought to have touched, for it related to sending an unpaid Envoy to represent the Government at a Foreign Court. The right hon. Gentleman forgot Mr. Errington, who was sent to represent the Government at a Foreign Court, and paid no one knew how. He (Colonel Saunderson) had been glad to learn from the lips of the Prime Minister that he looked upon the speech and the Amendment as serious. By that he understood the right hon. Gentleman to mean that he did not intend to move the Closure before 10 o'clock. But, although the right hon. Gentleman looked upon it as a serious Amendment, he studiously avoided meeting a single one of the arguments brought forward by its Mover, with one single exception. Still, the right hon. Gentleman's speech was important, because it amply justified the speeches which had been made by Members of the Opposition in support of various Amendments. The right hon. Gentleman asked what power there would be of giving effect to the Amendment if it were embodied in the Bill. This was what the Opposition had been asking the Government all along with reference to their safeguards. They had pointed out that even if the Bill were saturated with supremacy, the saturation would be of no good if there was no power to give effect to it. The Prime Minister said that the Amendment, if adopted, would be an isolated statement of absolutely no value. But he (Colonel Saunderson) understood that the Amendment was to form the foundation for the introduction into future clauses of the Bill of very clear and definite legislation which would give effective power to the statement which the Committee was now asked to accept. Certainly, isolated and alone, a declaration of the kind would be of absolutely no value. ["Hear, hear!" from the Nationalist Members.] He was glad that the patriots below the Gangway agreed with him. The reason they did was that they knew that the words which were embodied in the Bill for the purpose of maintaining the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament could not be of any value. The Prime Minister said that the way we had dealt with Canada and Australia ought to give the Committee courage to pass this Bill. The suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman was that the relations of Ireland with the Imperial Parliament should be the same as those of the Australian Colonies, which were on the other side of the world, and the Dominion of Canada, which was on the other side of the ocean. He thought that very few of the supporters of the Government were returned to Parliament at the last Election on the understanding that the Home Rule Bill would be one that would place Ireland in the same position as Australia or Canada. He wished to look at the Amendment, however, not so much from an Imperial as from an Irish point of view. Any Amendment which would have the effect of restraining the authority of the Irish Parliament would, as far as it went, be an improvement. If they were to have a Home Rule Parliament in Ireland, and if that Parliament was not to be destructive of the liberties of the Irish people and ruinous to the peace and welfare of the Empire, there ought to be created by legislative enactments and restrictions a sort of legislative paddock carefully walled and restricted—a kind of legislative menagerie, in which Land League legislators might carry out their varied forms of legislation without danger to other people and only with danger to themselves. That was the only reason why he voted on any of these Amendments. The more power that was given to the Irish Parliament the worse it would be from the point of view of the Irish Loyalists, and they proved this conclusively by what their future rulers had said and done in the past. It was because the Amendment had a restrictive tendency, and because if the House had any common-sense left it would be enforced hereafter by other clauses, that he thought it deserved the support of the House. The Opposition were anxiously waiting for light on these points—not from the Radical Party, who dare not speak, but from high authorities on the Treasury Bench. It must surely have struck the Committee with sorrowful amazement that the greatest authority on Parliamentary procedure—the Chancellor of the Exchequer—had not only been conspicuous by his absence from the Debates, but had been absolutely dumb up to the present. Knowing what they did of his past history, and the great reputation he had made as a Constitutional authority, they had surely a right to expect and hope that the right hon. Gentleman would let loose the floods of information which he had boiling up inside him, and pour it out to satisfy the thirsty Opposition. But they had utterly failed to draw a word from the right hon. Gentleman. The whole affair of defending this Bill had fallen upon the Prime Minister, although he (Colonel Saunderson) did not believe he was its author. Its author was just going out of the House. [Mr. Bryce had just risen from the Treasury Bench.] The Prime Minister, charged with the Constitutional lore which his Colleague had gathered in every corner of the earth, generally got up and answered the arguments advanced against the Bill with declamatory ridicule and contempt. The right hon. Gentleman had, however, admitted that the question raised by the present Amendment was too great to laugh at and deride in the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman, from the serious character of his speech, appeared to realise that the mind of the country was becoming awake to the fact that the dearest and deepest interests of the Empire were at stake, and that the noble Lord had pointed out dangers and difficulties that must inevitably arise when an alien Parliament and an alien Government, composed of men who now sat in this House, and who were now supported by the money of foreigners on the other side of the Atlantic——

THE CHAIRMAN : I must recall the hon. and gallant Member's attention to the Amendment.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said, he at once bowed to the Chairman's ruling, and would allude to the speech of the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman dealt at great length with the idea of sending an Ambassador to a Foreign Court, and said that he could not conceive that the Irish Government would be so impatient for evil as to adopt such a monstrous course. [An hon. MEMBER : Impassioned for evil.] Well, impassioned for evil. That was equally understandable. At all events, his compatriots had been very open in their declarations. Though they never spoke inside the House, they did outside, and they had very clearly laid it down that there was no finality in the Bill. It was because the restrictions which this Amendment proposed to place upon the Irish Parliament, followed by others, might have the effect of making this Parliament, if it ever existed, less potent for evil than he supported the Amendment.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.) : I think that those who have listened to the Debate, opened as it was by the noble Lord the Member for West Edinburgh in a speech of great merit and ability, will acknowledge that on the whole it has been extremely instructive, and has thrown considerable light upon the spirit in which the Government have entered upon their great undertaking. I will also say that it contains a lesson to those rather impatient Members of the House who desire to see a Bill of this importance disposed of in a few days. Here we are on a very early stage of the Bill, and a discussion has been raised the importance of which cannot be denied. It would, therefore, be a monstrous thing if such discussions, tending as they do to enlighten the public as to the character of the Bill, were to be shut out by anything like a ruthless application of the Closure. I do not believe the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister has any sympathy whatever with those ardent spirits. He has proposed and carried many Bills in this House, and he knows that it is a part of the traditions of the House to give Bills of importance a fair consideration. But when the Government propose a Bill to create a new Constitution and to destroy an old one, we must expect rather more than the ordinary time for consideration. Anyone who doubts the importance of the Debate that has been raised would have had those doubts removed had he listened to the speech of the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman did not deny the importance of the question. On the contrary, he put it in a category by itself as one of those subjects which he himself desired to treat with dryness, and he recommended that others should treat it in the same way. There are many subjects brought forward in this House which my right hon. Friend never treats with dryness, and, therefore, it must be a subject of an altogether exceptional character which requires that exceptional treatment. If this matter is to be treated with dryness because it is a proposal for limiting freedom of discussion in a Parliament which has yet to be created, then I would only say in passing how much more dry must be the treatment of any proposal to limit discussion in a Parliament which already exists. I now come to the proposition which my right hon. Friend has shown to be of great importance. Let us see what the position of matters really is. My right hon. Friend proposes to pass a Bill to give to Irishmen the management of exclusively Irish affairs. How many hon. Members are there behind him who have pledged themselves in the country that that is all they intend to do—that they will not go one atom beyond it—that they will not allow the Irish Parliament to meddle, even by one jot or tittle, in affairs that are Imperial? Unity of the Empire is to be preserved, and that is to be attended to by the Imperial Parliament. The Irish Parliament, a subordinate Parliament, is to deal only with exclusively Irish affairs. My right hon. Friend, as has been explained by the Mover of the Resolution, proposes to secure that result by refusing to the Irish Parliament cognisance of any affairs which are not exclusively Irish. My right hon. Friend has attempted to-night, I think without sufficient consideration, to minimise the importance of his statement, because he has said that when he spoke of not allowing the Irish Parliament to take cognisance of matters other than those which are purely Irish, he only meant by Act. That would be playing with the House, and, what is more important, it would be playing with the country. To allow an Irish Parliament to deal with Imperial affairs by Resolution, when you pretend that they shall not deal with them by Act of Parliament, is to allow this interference with Imperial affairs to come in by a side door when you refuse to allow it to come in by the front door. It is absolutely impossible that the Prime Minister can keep faith with the public, and establish a Parliament in Ireland dealing exclusively with Irish affairs, if it can be shown that by his proposal this

Irish Parliament can—and, of course, probably will—deal with Imperial affairs. My noble Friend the Member for West Edinburgh has shown, under almost every head of the excluded subjects, that the Irish Parliament will be able to deal by Resolution with those matters with which it cannot deal by Act of Parliament. One would have thought, under those circumstances, that the Prime Minister would at once have accepted the Amendment, or that if he objected to its terms he would have suggested a variation of them. He might have suggested such an alteration as would have provided that the Irish Parliament should not deal with these forbidden matters either by Resolution or Act of Parliament. That would have been more consistent than the position occupied at present by the Government. But how did my right hon. Friend meet the noble Lord who moved the Amendment? The noble Lord showed on half-a-dozen different points that it would be possible, on critical and important occasions, for the Irish Parliament to interfere by Resolution, to the great disadvantage of British interests, in Imperial matters. The Prime Minister, however, referred to only one of those matters, and that was the suggestion that if the Irish Parliament was so disposed it might send Envoys to foreign countries, though it would be prohibited from making Treaties, and would thus hamper and embarrass British diplomacy. What was the answer of the Prime Minister? He simply said that those Envoys could not be paid, and could not be accredited. Permit me to say that that was a purely technical answer. There are many indirect ways in which payment could be found, and many Envoys have been rewarded in one way or another—in this country by Baronetcies. But in Ireland some good fat office may no doubt be the indirect reward for such services, although, of course, it is perfectly well-known that every patriotic Irishman is willing to serve his country for nothing. But my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister says that the Envoys would not be accredited. Let me remind him, however, that Mason and Slidell were not accredited, and yet if they had not been taken en route, their presence in this country would have been extremely inconvenient to the Northern States of America at that time. I will take another case. What about Franklin and our Colonies? Franklin was not accredited when he went to France, before that country recognised the United States, and yet he was successful in obtaining the recognition of his country and of at length getting himself accredited, and in procuring an alliance between France and the United States against this country. I merely refer to these facts for the purpose of showing how very weak the argument of my right hon. Friend is even as regards the one point out of the six which the noble Lord put forward, that my right hon. Friend selected to deal with. My right hon. Friend suggested that another answer to the arguments of the noble Lord—an answer the spirit of which we have heard of before, and of which, doubtless, we shall hear again. My hon. and gallant Friend opposite quoted the words of the Prime Minister, in which he said, “You assume that the Irish are impassioned for evil.” My right hon. Friend admitted that if the Irish Parliament were inclined to do perverse things, if they were going to use their rights for improper purposes, no doubt they might make themselves extremely inconvenient. This is a point upon which the throwing of a little dry light may be very useful and necessary. Why does my right hon. Friend say that we believe that the Irish Parliament will be impassioned for evil if they adopt a foreign policy which may be opposed to the foreign policy of this country? I wish that my right hon. Friend would sometimes look at these matters from the point of view of a patriotic Irishman. Why should the Irish Parliament be impassioned for evil, if, hereafter, when we get into some trouble with a foreign country, they sympathise with that country rather than with ourselves? My right hon. Friend must not forget that the iron has entered into their souls for the last 700 years. Does my right hon. Friend believe that he can pull that iron out in the course of seven years? On the contrary, my right hon. Friend has himself done something to drive the iron in still deeper. Is it not possible that, after my right hon. Friend, some Body may arise who may have differences with the Irish Parliament, and who may treat that Body in regard to Imperial matters with scant respect; and how can we, in such circumstances, expect that Parliament to be in entire sympathy with our foreign policy? Would it be fair for us in that case to accuse the Irish Parliament of being impassioned for evil because they took a view of events that was opposed to our own? I accuse my right hon. Friend of acting with extraordinary levity when he proposes to place the very existence of this country at the mercy of the Irish Parliament. [Cries of “Oh!”] Hon. Members who sit upon the Ministerial Benches may ridicule my remarks, but they are not the men who made England, though they may be indifferent to the chances of its destruction. We may well be indignant at the charge of obstruction that has been brought against us when we are determined to discuss these matters. Upon what basis are you creating this Parliament for Ireland? You are doing so on the ground that Ireland is a separate nation, and therefore ought to have a separate Parliament of her own. Therefore, we ought not to have any sentimental talk about that Parliament being impassioned for evil in case they should act as though they were the Parliament of a separate nation. We do not accuse France of being impassioned for evil because she takes a different view of Siamese matters from what we may happen to do. It is not only probable—it is absolutely certain—that the Irish Parliament will, in the future, as Irish Parliaments have done in the past, take a different view of foreign policy from our own. Therefore, if the Irish Parliament is allowed to discuss and to pass Resolutions with regard to our foreign policy, it will seriously hamper and embarrass us at a time when, perhaps, we may be in a position of great difficulty. This is a real danger to us. Does any man in this House believe that, if we went to war with France, an Irish Parliament would not, if it had the power to do so, pass Resolutions in opposition to our foreign policy? This is one of the most serious questions that the House of Commons can discuss. I ask with great confidence whether any impartial man, quietly considering the possibilities and the probabilities of the case, can doubt that an Irish Parliament, influenced as they would be both by tradition and by interest, would not sympathise, in such a case, rather with France than with this country? Can we conceive anything which would do more to weaken the arm of England than to have such a Parliament within our own borders passing Resolutions opposed to our policy in such a case? It is not necessary, in such an event, to accuse the Irish Parliament of being impassioned for evil, or of possessing a double dose of original sin for taking that course. On the contrary, viewed by the dry light of reason, it is the most probable thing that they would do. We have had Irish Parliaments before, and we know what course they are likely to pursue in the future. In my opinion, the answer which my right hon. Friend has attempted to make to the arguments of the noble Lord is most inadequate. My right hon. Friend said that there was no restriction in this matter upon the Colonial Legislatures. We know that the Canadian House of Commons passed a Resolution sympathising with Home Rule. But does not that raise once more the difference between our Colonies and Ireland? Our Colonies are thousands of miles away; Ireland is quite close to us. What our Colonies can do with perfect impunity may not be done by Ireland without danger to this country. I think it will be agreed that the Resolution of the Canadian House of Commons was impertinent. If any Foreign or Colonial Legislature passed Resolutions which are impertinent, we can afford to regard them with perfect indifference. In all these cases it must, however, be borne in mind that it is one thing to have Parliaments thousands of miles away passing such Resolutions, but it would be quite another thing to have such Resolutions passed by a Parliament within a few miles from our shores. The Prime Minister saw that this was what he would term a plausible Resolution—that is, it was one which would be difficult to explain away in the country, and he may be sure that we shall do our best to point out what light this throws on the supremacy of Parliament as provided in the Bill. The Prime Minister's argument was that if we were to say to the Irish Parliament, "You shall not pass Resolutions and shall not discuss matters which are expressly taken from your cognisance," we shall be interfering with their sacred right of petition. That is a most wonderful argument. A Board of Guardians may petition, but not the Irish House of Commons. The Irish Legislature will alone be deprived of the right of petitioning the British Parliament. The Irish Members may here break their silence. There is the hon. and learned Member for Louth bursting with eloquence. Let him get up in his place and tell us in the course of a few hours what value he attaches to the right to humbly petition this Parliament. The subjects in Ireland would, of course, continue to have their right of petition. But how long is it since the Prime Minister conceived this extraordinary opinion of Petitions? Does he know anything about the Petitions to this House? It is an ancient and venerable practice, and continues down to the present day; and I am assured that there are Petitions against this Home Rule Bill which contain over 1,000,000 signatures. Here is a case in which my right hon. Friend can give practical proof of his opinion of the value of the right of petition which he gives to the Irish Legislature. When Petitions come to this House with 1,007,793 signatures against Home Rule and with only 47 signatures in favour of it, if my right hon. Friend would thereupon drop his Bill, we should understand his appreciation of the value of Petitions. But if the Prime Minister ignores Petitions in the proportion of, roughly, 1,000,000 to 40, what value will the hon. and learned Member for North Louth attach to the right of petitioning the House of Commons? The Prime Minister asked what would be the use of prohibiting the Irish Legislature from passing Resolutions which you would be unable to enforce. Why not? Hon. Members have been satisfied when in speeches equally dry he has assured them that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament was assured. He said, "You have a Navy and Army. You are in the proportion of 30,000,000 to 5,000,000. You are so tremendously powerful, and you can enforce anything you like at any time you please." Exactly the same principle applies to the proceedings of the Irish Parliament, and you can at any time send an Army to Ireland. Suppose they pass an Act which they are prohibited from passing. What then? When the Prime Minister answers that,

I will answer his question as to how we are going to enforce the prohibitions which we now propose. I suppose he looks to the Exchequer Judges. I do not know how that is to be done, but I am quite sure, I hope, that when we come to the clause, the right hon. Gentleman will explain what it is he expects from those two unfortunate learned gentlemen. The argument cuts both ways. It absolutely destroys the argument of my right hon. Friend, who can no more enforce the supremacy, or restrictions, or safeguards which he puts forward in his Bill than he can enforce the prohibitions which we propose. If he says he has convinced himself that the safeguards in the Bill are insufficient to enable this House to exercise control over the Irish Parliament, that admission applies equally to all the other safeguards—it applies to those which he has accepted just as much as to those which he has not accepted. The securities are insufficient by the confession of the Prime Minister himself. He has said—"You cannot enforce your will upon the Irish Parliament." We agree with him, and it has been our contention all through that, in order to enforce your will upon an Irish Legislature, you must have something more than the Army and the Navy to rely upon; you want something in the nature of a Civil force, something in the nature of a permanent Executive. This Debate has gained for us a most complete and satisfactory admission from the Prime Minister, and I hope and venture to believe it will bear fruit when we come to propose our Amendments to secure a satisfactory Imperial Executive in Ireland.

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir JOHN RIGBY, Forfar): I must agree that this has been a most enlightening Debate, and it has brought out most distinctly the efficacy of the safeguards which are provided in the Bill, as compared with the triviality of those which it is proposed to substitute. For instance, Clause 3, Sub-section 10, provides that no laws shall be passed by the Irish Legislature in regard to trade marks, merchandise marks, copyright, or patent rights, and it makes that clear by saying that any law passed in contravention of the section shall be null and void. That is a genuine safeguard. [A laugh.] At all events, it is a totally different safeguard from those which are now proposed, and a far better one. No law that could be passed by the Irish Legislature would have the slightest validity so far as it was not derived from the Act of the Imperial Parliament; and waste paper, indeed, would be all laws passed through the two Houses of the Irish Legislature unless they could show their authority in an Act passed by the Imperial Parliament. Of themselves Resolutions have no validity; you cannot take anything from them, because they have nothing. The proposal of the Amendment is, first of all, to prevent discussion; but I do not think you can fairly divide discussion, Resolution, and the right of Petition. If you allow discussion, it is vain to refuse to allow Resolutions; the moral effect produced by the opinion of the Irish Legislature would be equally plain whether a Resolution followed discussion or not, and would it be possible to put an end to discussion if you attempted it? The right of Petition, of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) spoke in terms so contemptuous, has, throughout the whole of our Constitutional history, been most highly prized; and, unless you shut out the right of Petition, you cannot shut out the right of resolution or the right of discussion. The safeguards in the Bill, which hon. Gentlemen say cannot be relied upon, cannot but act; they act automatically. The authority of law which gives an Act of Parliament force without bringing about civil war, without requiring the aid of the military, and, except in extreme circumstances, without even requiring the intervention of the police, will be given to the Irish Acts only so far as they are within the powers marked out for them by the Bill. Pictures have been drawn of dangers that might arise if the Irish Legislature travelled beyond its functions. It has been said that Representatives might be sent by Ireland to Foreign Powers, and the case of Franklin has been quoted. But Franklin was accredited to one of our enemies, and there is nothing to prevent that being done again. Irish rebels, if such there are, might send their Ambassador to any Power with which we were at war. I do not disguise the difficulties of the position, but I wish to show that the Bill will neither increase nor diminish them. Franklin was a rebel, and was accredited to one of our enemies, and we should have had the right, if we had got him, to have hanged him. Franklin was kindly received by our enemies; but if he had been received in the same capacity by any of our Allies, that would have given us just cause to go to war with them, because it is against the Law of Nations to receive an Ambassador from the rebels of an Ally. The position is this. An Act passed by the Irish Legislature, if beyond its powers, is null and void, and yet it is suggested there is great danger from Resolutions which have no pretence of being laws, but are mere expressions of opinion. I do not deny that the utterances, however irregular, however unauthorised, of a representative body of men in Ireland must necessarily have weight; but do right hon. Gentlemen think it would be good policy or that it would be wise to endeavour to shut down that safety-valve for the expression of opinion by the Representatives of the people?

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 238 ; Noes 259.—(Division List, No. 102.)

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: In accordance with the pledge given this afternoon, I now move, Sir, that you do report Progress.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. W. E. Gladstone,)—put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolution [29th May] reported.

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE
DEPARTMENTS, 1893-4.

FURTHER VOTE ON ACCOUNT.

"That a further sum, not exceeding £4,810,250, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charges for the following Civil Services and Revenue Departments for the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1894."—(see pp. 1427-9.)

Resolution read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

*SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, he wished to call the attention of the Vice President of the Council to a Circular which had been issued by his Department in January, last as to the accommodation and system of education in elementary schools, which Circular had been sent to all the schools throughout the country, whether Board schools or voluntary schools. It had been alluded to in the House of Lords by one of the very best living authorities on elementary education, Lord Sandford and from the purport of the noble Lord's remarks it seemed clear that he considered the implied requirements of the Circular were such as to make it practically impossible for the voluntary schools to comply with it; and if anything like exact conformity with the Circular was to be insisted on the voluntary system would be seriously endangered. Lord Kimberley, in replying, said—

"It seemed to be thought, in some quarters, that there was a desire suddenly to come down on voluntary schools throughout the country and make a peremptory demand upon them to bring their accommodation, sanitary provision, and school apparatus up to the higher standard; and so, by a side wind, to convert a large number of voluntary schools into Board schools. That, in his opinion, would be a perfectly unjustifiable proceeding."

It would be well if the Vice President would kindly confirm before them the assurances given by the President of the Council in the other House. Lord Kimberley said the Circular was merely one of inquiry; but he ventured to say that it meant something more than that. Why, the Inspectors were told to see to the rectification of any defects which the inquiries under this Circular might bring to light. But the Inspectors had been doing this all along. Why, then, was a fresh inquiry started this year? It looked as if some new departure were contemplated. The voluntary schools were entitled to know what to expect. There had been spent on them in the last generation no less a sum than £13,000,000, and they had conformed to all the requirements of the Education Department from time to time. Now, all sorts of requirements were put upon them—as to warming, lighting, the providing of certain areas for playgrounds, even in places where no ground could be got. Surely the voluntary schools were entitled to know under what new rules they were to act. Why had the Department waited until this year of grace, 1893, for all these new requirements? It really did look as if there was an intention to impose fresh liabilities on voluntary schools. Lord Kimberley stated—

“The Royal Commission which reported in June, 1888, stated that the time had come when the State might well be more exact in requiring for school children a proper amount of air and space, suitable premises, and a reasonable extent of playground. That Report was the foundation of the whole matter.”

Lord Norton stated that the Code of 1890 demanded generally that all schools receiving grants should satisfy the Department as to their healthiness; but it restricted the application of any new requirements as to space to new buildings. He trusted that now no immediate pressure would be put upon the older schools beyond a general warning to all voluntary managers to set their houses in order so far as their means would allow. He hoped some consolatory assurance would now be afforded to that effect. There was no more praiseworthy, deserving, and meritorious class than those for whom he was pleading. They were the pioneers of Elementary Education; before the creation of School Boards they were prophets crying in the wilderness. They had been the means of saving the State £40,000,000, which had been raised by private subscriptions and resources. It was the buildings erected by this money it was now desired to improve by this Circular. Notwithstanding the great number of Board schools, there were 5,000 more voluntary schools than there were in 1870. He hoped that, in the circumstances, the voluntary managers would receive the kindly, gracious, and sympathetic consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham) said, if his hon. Friend had given notice of his intention to deal with the Circular, he would have been in a better position to answer him than he now was. The hon. Gentleman asked why the Circular, which dealt with the sanitary and healthy condition of schools, was issued in this particular year? He (Mr. Acland) only said that a large number of Inspectors, reporting upon all parts of the country, had been desiring some inquiry of this kind for a long period. They had reported again and again that the condition of many schools was such that the children suffered in health; and he drew no distinction between Board schools and voluntary schools, considering it the duty of the Department to deal equally with both classes of schools. Again and again School Inspectors had called attention to this matter, and had asked for some kind of Statistical Returns to show how the schools stood. The Commission of Lord Cross said the time had come when, in the very words of the Circular, it would be reasonable to limit the time for requiring compliance with certain conditions as to the healthiness of the buildings. The Circular asked questions of the Inspectors in order that the state of things might be ascertained. He submitted that the Circular did not ask for anything which was unreasonable. It asked, for instance, whether the site was open and airy and provided reasonable space, and whether the playground was of sufficient size and provided with gymnastic apparatus. He quite agreed there were various crowded parts where it was impossible to insist on the playgrounds being of a certain size for an old school as in the case of a new. But he considered it was a good thing they should have the information as to whether and where such schools existed. The Circular further asked whether the building was dry and in good repair, whether it was properly lighted, whether the class-rooms were of reasonable size, and the staircases properly arranged, and as to the cloak-rooms and offices. There ought to be good cloak-rooms in all our schools, whether in town or country. To have damp clothes steaming in the same room where the children were taught was most undesirable for health, as every medical man would testify. As to the offices, they ought to be disconnected from one another. The hon. Baronet said that great efforts had been made by voluntary managers as well as by Boards to bring their schools up to modern requirements. In bringing schools up to modern requirements—and he was glad to say that many clergy, landlords, and others had made admirable efforts in this direction—this Circular would not injure them in any way whatever. If the hon. Baronet inquired what action had been taken since the Department had received the answers to the Circular he would find there was no cause for great alarm ; but he did not hesitate to say that in all matters relating to the warmth, light, sanitation, ventilation, equipment, and generally healthy accommodation, he, with the Department, thoroughly intended to do all he could to bring up our schools of all kinds, whether voluntary or Board schools, to a state of complete efficiency.

MR. E. STANHOPE (Lincolnshire, Horncastle) did not think the statement of the right hon. Gentleman was by any means satisfactory, and he was afraid, when the proper time came, in Committee, there would be some further observations to make upon the matter. In the meantime, he desired to point out one important subject as to which the right hon. Gentleman had said nothing. Many schools within the last few years had made great structural alterations in order to comply with the requirements of the Education Department. The managers had done this at great cost, and in the face of great difficulty, at the request of the Education Department, although they themselves did not entirely approve of the alterations. Notwithstanding the fact that these structural alterations had been made in the case of many of these schools, the right hon. Gentleman or his Inspectors were actually calling upon the managers to reverse what they had done three or four years ago, and make further changes and incur additional expense.

MR. ACLAND : That has nothing to do with this Circular.

MR. E. STANHOPE : I am quite well aware of that ; but I want to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the matter, and when we go into Committee I should like to ask him a special question about it.

*DR. MACGREGOR (Inverness-shire) desired to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he could definitely state whether the Government would give its support to the Bill for amending the Crofters' Act ?

VOL. XII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

*MR. SPEAKER intimated that it was out of Order to refer to the Bill on the Report of the Vote on Account.

*DR. MACGREGOR desired to ask a question or two relating to the Royal Commission in the Islands and Highlands. The excuse was made that this Commission could not begin its operations until the weather had improved. In the middle of April, the weather having improved, they had commenced, and now, after a month's work, they had suspended operations for three weeks, when the days were at the longest and the weather was at its best. Why had they suspended operations at this juncture, when there was so much urgency with regard to the question of land in the Highlands ? He would like to ask what remuneration was being made to the Royal Commission ? He was aware that the expenses of its members were allowed ; but he would like to know what that meant ! The Mail Service in the Highlands and Islands was in a very unsatisfactory state, especially in the Islands, where there was great irregularity. The people complained that they could not get their letters, in some instances, more than once a week. He would ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he could not, by conference with the Postmaster General and the Treasury, make such arrangements as would effect a much-needed improvement in the Mail Service ? With regard to Secondary Education in the Highlands, he would like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman would not act upon a hint which he had given him, and provide small annual bursaries for boys who would have to come a long way to the central school ?

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) desired, for a few moments, to allude to a matter on which he had ventured to trouble the House on several occasions, by way of questions to the Home Secretary. He had the honour to represent a constituency in which there was a large convict prison, the warders of which had a great many grievances with respect to hours and other matters, to which the attention of the Home Office had frequently been called. He had assisted the warders to the best of his ability, and the Home Secretary had been courteous enough to give directions that he should be furnished with an elaborate Memorandum dealing with those grievances. The tone of that Memorandum, however, was very disappointing. It was the tone of an advocate defending his cause, rather than of an impartial Department deciding upon a case which had been laid before it. This Memorandum differed very seriously from the allegations made to him by his constituents; but upon many matters in the Memorandum he did not think the facts were disputed. He would venture to call the attention of the House and the Home Secretary to one or two of the facts in regard to the hours of these prison warders. They often heard in that House of the necessity for shortening the hours of labour, and he thought the House would admit that the hours of labour among the employés of the Government itself were very long. These warders were sometimes on day and sometimes on night duty. The hours of labour of those on day duty were as much as 65 per week, exclusive of meal-times. That was a very large figure. The Department, in reply to his statement on this subject, declared that he had taken the months in which the hours of labour were longest, and had not taken into account the days of leave. But the months on which the duty was longest happened to be about 10 in the year, and the days of leave were only 14 at the outside, and in speaking of the length of hours in that House they did not take into account the days of leave granted to employés. If they were to take account of the leave, they ought also to take account of the patrols necessary during meal-times. As to night duty, it would be admitted, considering the character and strain of the work, that the hours should not be long, yet the warders had to do 60 hours' night duty a week; and when the change was made from night to day duty, or the opposite, the warder had to be on service for 17 hours out of the 24. Then there was the question of a half-holiday. The warders on day duty had an occasional half-holiday on a Saturday. But those on night duty had no half-holiday, and nothing corresponding to it; and that was the principal grievance of which they complained. Night duty was far more laborious than day duty, and he urged the Home Secretary to make some mitigation in this respect. It might be asked, if these men had grievances, why did they not lay them before the Visiting Director? They had done so themselves, and also through their Governor, but apparently without success. He appealed to the Home Secretary to re-consider the whole matter, especially the point of the half-holiday. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman might be willing to grant a Departmental Committee of a small character to inquire into the grievances of the warders. If the right hon. Gentleman could not see his way to do that he would ask him to receive a deputation of the warders, who might themselves lay their case before him. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to mitigate the grievances of a very deserving body of men to whom the country owed a great deal, and who were worked harder than would be allowed in most private employments.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.) said, he regretted that, not having had notice of the intention of the noble Lord to bring forward the subject, he had not with him the materials which would enable him to go in detail into the various points to which the noble Lord had referred. But he would remind him and the House that the whole question of the treatment of warders of convict prisons—their status, pay, hours of labour, and holidays—was most carefully and laboriously investigated in 1891 by a Departmental Committee presided over by Lord de Ramsay, and in consequence of the Report of that Committee very large changes and improvements were made in the positions and conditions of labour of the warders less than two years ago. He had satisfied himself, after careful inquiry, that the position of the warders in Rochester Prison did not differ in any respect from the position of the warders in other convict prisons. The rules and the system which prevailed there were those recommended by the Committee with full knowledge of the circumstances and after full inquiry. He had no responsibility in the matter, except that he had inherited the system. He could not accede to the noble Lord's suggestion to start a fresh Departmental Inquiry within so short a time of the last one; but if any well-founded case was brought before him and were proved to his satisfaction to be a real grievance he should gladly attend to it and do everything in his power to meet it. He would suggest to the noble Lord that between now and the Committee of Supply—which he admitted was a contingent and indefinite time—the noble Lord should bring before him officially any complaints he had to make, and he would promise to give them his personal attention and most careful consideration.

MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON (Dorset, W.) commented on the way in which the Votes had been closed in the attempt to rush through the Vote on Account on the previous night. He desired to know from the Minister of Agriculture what his intention was with regard to the great distress in agriculture? Nothing surprised him more than the apathy and indifference in the House generally as regarded the condition of agriculture. The agricultural industry in England was positively on its last legs. Day after day and night after night they had interminable discussion about Ireland, whilst the most important industry of the country—that of agriculture—was positively going to the dogs. He considered that before they finally disposed of the Vote for the Board of Agriculture they ought to hear from the Minister of Agriculture what his views were as to some remedy for the present state of agriculture. There was the matter of swine fever, for dealing with which the President of the Board of Agriculture promised to bring forward a measure; but no such measure had as yet been laid before the House. He should like some information as to this. He desired also to put one or two questions to the President of the Local Government Board. He had very great fault to find with the way the Annual Report of the Local Government Board was brought out, and with the tables and figures given. With reference to the lunatic and insane children, who were described as indoor paupers in the workhouses, he asked how many such cases there were, and whether the lunatic children were kept apart from the sane children? Nothing could be more harmful than to allow the two classes to be mixed up. He expressed the opinion that the agricultural localities had to support more workhouses in proportion to population than other localities, and proceeded to ask for information respecting what were described as able-bodied inmates in workhouses. As regarded children, he did not understand what an able-bodied child meant, but he supposed children under 16 were not able-bodied. One more point to which he would draw attention was that of the maintenance of paupers, and the expense of that maintenance as applied, distinctively, to indoor and outdoor patients. It was impossible to arrive at a conclusion as to the distinction on the face of this Report. There was a number of other items, dealing with matters of expense, which might have the careful consideration of the right hon. Gentleman and his subordinates at the Local Government Office. He would only express a hope that the right hon. Gentleman would in future instruct his subordinates to draw up the Report of the Department so that the items, as affecting indoor and outdoor pauperism, would be made clearer to the public, for whose information the Report was intended.

*MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) said, it was, no doubt, very inconvenient to raise important questions at that late hour of the night (after midnight), but he would undertake not to make a speech, and not to detain the House long, in calling attention to one or two matters affecting that part of the country in which he was specially interested. He had, first of all, to call attention to the neglect of the Scotch fisheries. Much might be done to develop this important industry. Then, with regard to the Board of Supervision, its re-construction was absolutely necessary. At present this Board did its work very badly, and he did trust that the Secretary for Scotland (Sir G. Trevelyan) would inquire into its method of conducting public business, and apply adequate remedies? The hon. Gentleman then referred to the negligence of the Board of Supervision in the matter of the proposed fever hospital at Auchtermuchty, which town he visited during the Recess, and when there, was asked by the Provost and Burgh Authorities to help them in their efforts to get the Board of Supervision to act. With such inattention to the state of matters in the Lowlands, and this, too, in the constituency of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, what would the Board of Supervision not do in the Highlands? He wished the right hon. Gentleman, in his management of the affairs of Scotland, not to confine his purview to the mainland, and to the principal place in each of the Islands, but to extend his inquiry—or, better still, his visit—to the various districts of the Islands and the mainland, and so be better able to learn something of the requirements of the people, and of the indifference of the Board of Supervision to the wants of the population in the remote districts. The Board of Supervision had too many lawyers among its members; and it was for the Secretary for Scotland to prevail upon his Colleagues to bring about such reforms as were demanded. The number of lawyers should be reduced, and these sanitary theorists replaced by practical men. The policy evidently was at present to find work for a number—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is wandering from the question before the House.

*MR. WEIR said, he would bow to the ruling of the Chair, but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Scotland would do something in the direction he had indicated. He trusted that the Fiscals would be better looked after than they were by the Lord Advocate (Mr. J. B. Balfour). Another matter upon which he had a word to say was the manner in which the business of the Board of Trade Offices was conducted. There were officials who used the offices for their own private purposes. In his opinion, all Government Departments should be above suspicion. If private firms allowed their employés to do such things as had been permitted by the Board of Trade, the result would be the Bankruptcy Court for the firms and commercial immorality amongst the employés. These officials were paid sufficiently high salaries for attending to the business of the Department, and he thought they should give their services to the Department wholly and exclusively. He hoped the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Mundella) was in a position to assure the House that the business of his Department would be conducted on the lines of probity, honour, and honesty henceforward.

COLONEL R. GUNTER (York, W.R., Barkstone Ash) said, he was anxious that some guidance should be given to Boards of Guardians who might find it necessary or desirable to take buildings for use as cottage hospitals. The Guardians frequently had actions brought against them which were expensive to the ratepayers, and they would like their duties and liabilities to be more clearly defined. The question was, Were they entitled to take buildings, and, if they were, what arrangements had been made to safeguard them against litigation?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton) said, the hon. Member for Inverness-shire spoke of the Royal Commission having made a break in its sittings. But they must remember what this Commission was, and what its labours were. It was a Commission composed of gentlemen with important avocations of their own, who could not be taken from those avocations continuously, and their labours involved great physical inconvenience and physical hardship in the very roughest and wildest parts of the United Kingdom. They never asked from the unpaid members of the Royal Commission the same sort of work that they had a right to ask from public servants with a continuous salary. The Commission had arranged its work most admirably. They had gone, first, to the important district of the Isle of Skye, where they stayed a month or more thoroughly examining the country. They would re-commence their labours at Beaulieu, in the very centre of what might be called the sensational deer forest district of the Highlands. The Chairman of the Commission, Sheriff Brand, would find during the three weeks' recess public duties which it was necessary for him to perform. This was not a paid Commission. The members received £1 ls. per day for maintenance for each day they were on service, and their travelling expenses—that was to say, nothing but a bare maintenance, so that they should not be absolutely out of pocket except for the time they were taken from those avocations by which they earned their livelihood. There was only one exception, Mr. Gordon, a surveyor, who was paid £5 5s. for each day that he was commissioned by his brother Commissioners to perform professional work. As to the bursaries, there were no bursaries given out of the funds voted by Parliament. This was a question for the localities, and if the District Committees proposed to spend the money that was given for secondary education upon providing bursaries for Highland children, he was quite sure that the Department over which he had the honour to preside would help them in every way to carry out that intention. The hon. Member sitting below the Gangway (Mr. Weir) asked when the Board of Supervision, which he said did its work very badly, would be re-constructed. He (Sir G. Trevelyan) did not admit that it did its work badly, and more especially would he not admit that the individual members of the Board failed to apply to their work very great industry, great diligence, and great public spirit; but, as he had said, both in the House and elsewhere, he thought it was a Board faultily constructed. He was prepared to re-construct it in a manner which, when the time came, he should be glad to explain to the House; but he could only do it by legislation, and when he brought in the Local Government Bill for Scotland the construction of the Board of Supervision would be an interesting part of the measure. In regard to the other points brought forward by the hon. Member, he must say he thought the hon. Member was too ready to appeal to the Central Authority on matters that ought to be left to the Local Bodies who represented the public opinion of the localities; but in all matters where the Board of Supervision ought to interfere, he could promise the hon. Gentleman that that interference should take effect.

*DR. MACGREGOR asked if the right hon. Gentleman could inform them when the Royal Commission would finish its work?

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) said, he had to congratulate the Government upon the fact that they had doubled the grant to the Association which found employment for Reserve and discharged soldiers. They had a very interesting Debate on the subject of such employment last night, and he could only say that the matter was one of extreme importance. Other countries provided employment for their soldiers when discharged after long and honourable service, and it was found an excellent system, helping largely to popularise the Army and to strengthen it. France, Russia, and America provided State-aided employment. The English Government, among the Governments of the civilised nations, did not do so. They had voluntary enlistment, and voluntary enlistment would be more popular if the Government followed the examples of other Governments. It was, of course, gratifying that this grant had been made, but he would prefer that the Government should seriously consider the whole question of employing men discharged from the Army or finding employment for them.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.) said, he could assure the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down that the Government were sensible of the importance of the subject, and that they were doing their best in reference to it.

SIR T. LEA (Londonderry, S.) said, he rose to appeal to the Government, through the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir W. Harcourt), to postpone the Vote on Account, in order that an opportunity might be given for discussing the lawless condition of the Counties of Clare, Kerry, and Limerick. It was obvious that at 25 minutes to 1 o'clock in the morning it was impossible to raise that question.

Many hon. Members were anxious that the discussion should take place, and he believed the Chief Secretary was desirous of giving his answer. [Mr. J. MORLEY dissented.] If that were so, he presumed it was because the case was as bad as some hon. Members believed it to be. He asked that the Vote should be taken as the first Order on Thursday, and he did so in the interests of order in Ireland.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) said, he would explain that it was necessary that the Vote should be taken before the House rose, as payments had to be made on June 1. He regretted that the matter which the hon. Member desired to raise had not been brought forward; it would probably have better occupied the attention of the Committee than some of the topics which were discussed. He thought it a pity that some arrangement was not made for seeing that matters of real importance and not trifling subjects should be discussed on the Vote on Account. That was a matter affecting both sides of the House. In his early Parliamentary days no one ever pretended to raise the trivial questions that now occupied so much of their time. Nothing, indeed, was ever raised to matters of urgent importance. He hoped the House would not delay the Vote any longer.

MR. W. REDMOND (Clare E.) said, he only wanted to say a few words in reference to what had fallen from the Member for South Londonderry. For his part, he was anxious that a Debate should take place, because he believed it would result in showing that the condition of the three counties named had steadily improved. He would point out that the condition of his county (Clare) had been discussed three or four times within as many months. He did not object to that discussion, provided something new was brought forward. They had it debated on the Address, on a special Motion for Adjournment, and again during the ordinary Business of the House. Personally, he would be glad to enter into the matter again, as, with regard to the condition of County

Sir T. Lea

Clare, the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Arnold-Forster) had declared him to be able to place his hands on the persons who had committed some recent shooting outrages. That was a statement which ought not to have been made by one hon. Member of the House of another. The hon. Member had widely circulated in the columns of The Times the statement that, if the hon. Member for Clare did not know who were the men who committed the outrages, which everyone deplored, he could find out for the trouble of asking; and the hon. Member declared the parish priest to be in the same position. He did not think that any hon. Gentleman would require him to place on record his denial of such a charge. He had been in the House, attending to his duties, since the beginning of the Session. The County Clare was well supplied with police, and it was a monstrous thing to maintain that it was his duty to leave the House and go to his constituency to perform police work. If the men were so well-known, how was it that the police did not know them? And how was it that, if he could find them for the trouble of asking, the hon. Member for West Belfast and his informants had not taken that trouble? It was a monstrous practice for one hon. Member to write to the newspapers because a murder had taken place in another hon. Member's constituency, and urge that it was that hon. Member's duty to track down the murderer. Everyone in the House would believe that he had not, and could not have, any knowledge, direct or indirect, of the men who fired the shots. He had repeatedly set his face against outrage of every kind, the only difference between him and the hon. Member for West Belfast being that he had impartially denounced every crime, whether on the part of the moonlighter or the landlord; whereas the hon. Member had nothing to say of the primary cause of most of the crime in Ireland—the evictions by landlords. If they were to have this Debate, his (Mr. Redmond's) conduct would be shown to be what it ought to be; but, having been allowed to make this statement, he did not care much whether the Debate on the condition of Clare was continued or not. If, however, the Debate should take place, it would the hon. Member established that the condition of the county had improved, and that it was not for the general good of Ireland, and of Clare, that this matter should be talked about in that House over and over again.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) said, that he could well understand that the hon. Member did not desire further debate on the condition of County Clare. But this matter was much too serious for personalities. He wished, first, to deal with the public aspect of the question. The reason that this matter of grave public importance was not pressed the previous day was that there was a ruling of the Chairman declaring it to be impossible to take any question out of the order in which it was placed on the Paper. He and his hon. Friends were then and now anxious to raise the question, because it affected the lives and liberties of subjects and was on that account most urgent. The hon. Member said that nothing had changed in Clare. A great deal had changed, and many miserable outrages had been committed since the last Debate on the subject took place. With reference to the personal matter, the hon. Member had misrepresented him in one respect. Instead of attributing to the hon. Member a knowledge of the perpetrators of these acts he deliberately disavowed such a thing in his letter; and he was willing to believe that the hon. Member had no knowledge of the perpetrators of the crime.

MR. W. REDMOND said, that he would quote exactly the words used by the hon. Member in his letter to The Times—

"The men who persecute Mr. Blood are well-known. I assume for the present purposes that the Member for the division and the parish priest do not know them. If that be the case, they are the only human beings within a score of miles who do not know them, and for the trouble of asking they could find out who they are to-morrow."

If that statement meant anything at all it meant that he was in a position to find out who the culprits were, and that he refrained from doing so. That statement he called monstrous.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said, that he was obliged to the hon. Member for so correctly stating his views, and he was willing to believe that the hon. Member did not know the names of the men [cries of "Oh!"], but he asserted that the hon. Member could ascertain the names in five minutes. Let him ask the Chief Secretary for them. [Cries of "Ask him yourself!"] The right hon. Gentleman, in answer to a question, said that the names of the men were notorious and known to the police. If the Chief Secretary would not give the names to the hon. Member he would himself. [Cries of "The names!" and "Order!"] If the hon. Member visited his constituency he would find scores of people who could give him the names at once. When a case of this gravity occurred in an hon. Member's constituency it was his duty to make an inquiry which would put him in a position to abate what was a great public scandal. He challenged the hon. Member to ask the right hon. Gentleman, who was responsible for the peace and government of Ireland, on what information he based his answer to the question put to him the other night that these men were known to the police and himself.

MR. J. MORLEY : I do not know the names.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said, the right hon. Gentleman, in his answer, said that these men were known; and he challenged the right hon. Gentleman to say that he could not, within two minutes after arriving at Dublin Castle, that he could not at the Irish Office—that he could not now, after two minutes' conversation with him (Mr. Arnold-Forster)—discover who the men were. Mr. Bindon Blood was living under the most damnable persecution. [Cries of "Order!"] The Chief Secretary told the House the other night that the men were known to the police. If the right hon. Gentleman had no ground for making that statement he ought not to have made it. He was certain that if the hon. Member opposite were to ask the Chief Secretary to find out who the men were he would get the names without difficulty. But if the hon. Member were to say that the Chief Secretary could not inform him, he would be very glad himself to try to put the hon. Member on the track. Hon. Members seemed to be unaware of a notorious fact—namely, that scores and scores of these men, who were perpetrators and abettors of crime, were perfectly well known to the police; but that it was difficult to get evidence on which to convict them, because witnesses and jurors had been openly threatened by hon. Members opposite. [Cries of "Oh!"] He repeated his challenge, and he asked every hon. Member in that House whether he did not feel in his heart—[Cries of "Oh!"]—that it was the duty of a Member of Parliament, as a public servant, to do all that he could, when the facts of a case like this were brought before him, to relieve a fellow-countryman from such persecution as Mr. Blood was now suffering under?

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) said, the hon. Member for West Belfast had delivered a most perplexing speech. It contained a great deal of challenging, a vast deal of declamation, but not a grain or atom of sense. What did the hon. Member say in his letter to The Times? He said that if his hon. Friend above the Gangway (Mr. W. Redmond) or the parish priest were ignorant of the names of the persons who attempted to commit a certain murder, they were the only persons who were so ignorant. What was the necessary inference? That the population of the district knew the names of the guilty parties, and that the hon. Member who represented the district also knew the names. The hon. Member (Mr. Arnold-Forster) conveyed himself more than once that he knew the names, and at one point, before his speech was concluded, he seemed to give a promise that he would state the names. The Chief Secretary said he was unable to state the names, and everybody believed that in the next sentence the hon. Member for West Belfast would himself declare the names to the House. He (Mr. Sexton) now challenged him to state the names to the House. If he did not know the names, then his letter to The Times was a mere delusion. If he did know the names and would not state them, then he (Mr. Sexton) denounced him as an abettor of crime. Let the men be convicted, and let the men be punished. If hon. Members used language in public letters and public speeches implying that others and themselves were acquainted with these names, and if they would not give the names, then the House ought to be spared the annoyance of such mere drivel. He must say that the view the hon. Member took as to the duties of hon. Members of that House was one of the strangest of which he had ever heard. They were sent there to discuss public questions, to make laws for the public good; but the hon. Member appeared to put upon hon. Members of the House the duties which were placed upon the police. If a crime occurred in any constituency it was the view of this hon. Member that the hon. Gentleman representing that constituency should leave the discharge of his duties in that House, proceed to his constituency, and supplement the apathy or ineffectiveness of the local police. Surely that was a reading of their duties which hon. Members of that House would not accept. These crimes in Clare were secret, and they were perpetrated under circumstances which rendered it very unlikely that the perpetrators would be known to the public at large; but there were crimes committed recently in Ireland which were notoriously public. They were committed in the constituency of the hon. Member. They were committed in the open streets, to the knowledge, not of scores, but of thousands of the political sympathisers of the hon. Member. Let him betake himself to his own constituency. Let him find out and state to the House who were the miscreants who wrecked and looted houses in Belfast, and who were the wretched cowards who, in the name of politics, dragged poor girls by the hair of the head. Let the hon. Member who laid down such a rigorous view of the duties of others first discharge the duty of a Member of Parliament according to his own idea, and, when he had identified and exposed these criminals, then let him venture to lecture other hon. Members—but not until then.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) said, that no hon. Member opposite had been led to take this view of the duties of Members of Parliament. Let them see what had recently been done by the hon. Member for East Belfast (Mr. Wolff). After the visit of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour), the hon. Member for East Belfast was despatched by the Conservative Party to Belfast on an occasion when certain persons there were described as "damned fools." The hon. Member for East Belfast knew who it was who threw the bolts and nuts. They (the Nationalists) did not know who committed the outrages and murders in Clare.

SIR T. LEA asked whether the hon. Member was in Order in making this statement about the hon. Member for East Belfast during his absence?

MR. T. M. HEALY said, if the hon. Member was absent he hoped it was on a mission to prevent outrage in Belfast. He rose, however, not for the purpose of continuing the discussion, but for the purpose of asking the Chief Secretary a question. The right hon. Gentleman, in replying to a question, had given his view of the Statute 6 & 7 William IV., referring to the question of the displaying of flags from licensed premises. He would call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that there were cases in which Nationalist publicans had been prosecuted and had their licences taken from them because they had hung out banners on certain occasions. The right hon. Gentleman said his view of the section was that, when a person hung out the Union Jack, he was not breaking the law, so that it seemed that if the guilt depended on the colour of the flag, and not on the question whether a flag was hung out. The words of the section prohibited the exhibition of any flag except the known, usual, and accustomed sign of the house. He would be inclined to agree with the view of the law expressed by the Chief Secretary, only the words of the section were absolute as to all emblems except the known and usual sign of the house. He wished to ask whether the wording of this section did not make illegal all emblems except known and accustomed signs? As Nationalist publicans had been prosecuted for 50 years under the section he desired also to know whether a test case could not be taken to the High Court of Justice, so that the exact scope of the provision might be defined? It was hard if a Unionist was, under colour of his loyalty, to be allowed to hang out a Party emblem, whilst a Nationalist was to be prevented from doing so. Why should a red flag with particular bars upon it be allowed to be used, when a green flag, having no bars at all, was not so allowed? Was the interpretation of the section to be reduced to a question of pigment? He respectfully contended that "any emblem except the known and accustomed sign of the house" did not mean an absolute prohibition of any emblem whatever. He thought that sufficient notice had been attracted to the subject to entitle those who were interested to obtain some valid decision upon it.

MR. J. MORLEY: I do not know whether it is possible to take the course my hon. and learned Friend suggests; but I will consider the question with the Law Officers. In the meantime I may say that the clause as he read it, taken by itself, undoubtedly seems to point to the illegality of the exhibition of bunting of any sort—Union Jack or anything else. But when, along with the Law Officers, I read the whole of the Statute, it appeared to me that its intention was to prohibit the meeting in licensed houses of secret or other obnoxious Associations. It seems to me that it would be impossible that the Statute could have meant the prohibition of such an emblem as the Union Jack, because one section empowers constables to take down a flag and to destroy it. I do not believe that Parliament ever meant to give constables power to haul down the Union Jack and destroy it. My impression, which is not contradicted by the Law Officers whom I have had the opportunity of consulting, is that the intention, as disclosed by the context, was to limit the prohibition to pieces of bunting which might be taken as symbols or ensign of one of those Associations whose meetings within a licensed house was prohibited. What my hon. and learned Friend has said as to the apparent inequality of the views taken by different Administrations is quite true. Certainly there is a great difference between the view we take of what occurred last week and the view that has been taken of events that have occurred in the South and West of Ireland. In 1889 two publicans were brought up for having banners hanging out of their windows during Father M'Fadden's march. In the first of these cases the Magistrates made no order, and in the second they inflicted a small fine. When the Prince of Wales visited Dublin in 1885, during the Viceroyalty of Lord Spencer, publicans wished to hang out flags of various kinds; and the authorities of the day felt most sensibly that it would be absurd to punish publicans for welcoming the Heir to the Throne by putting out decorations and flags. They, therefore, took no notice. Though the constables who were concerned in the affair at Derry the other day did nothing but that for which perfectly good reason and excuse may be found, I think it was one of those cases in which the apparent breach of the ordinary reading of the section might well have been winked at. As it is, I think the time has come when we might have an opinion and perhaps a decision taken on the question, and to that point I will give my best consideration.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) said, he did not think the speech made a little earlier by the Chancellor of the Exchequer should be allowed to pass without protest. The right hon. Gentleman said there was no time to discuss these matters, whether they were important or not, because the Vote must be passed at that Sitting in order that payments might be made on the 1st of June. The discussion and the redress of grievances were among the oldest and certainly the most valuable privileges of the House; but the Government were practically, by a side wind, destroying these privileges. They had put forward the Vote on Account on the last available day, so as to leave no time for discussion; and, as the Vote was for two months, it would carry them on to the ordinary end of the Session. They had, consequently, practically destroyed the privilege of discussing and obtaining redress of grievances before Supply was granted.

Question put, and agreed to.

[TENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Legislative Authority.

Clause 3 (Exceptions from powers of Irish Legislature).

*VISCOUNT WOLMER (Edinburgh, W.) said, he desired to move, as an Amendment, to insert after "laws," the words—

"Or to entertain or grant Votes in Supply except on the recommendation of the Crown signified by a Minister of the Imperial Parliament."

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): I wish to raise a point of Order. I desire to know whether this Amendment, which deals with Votes in Supply, ought not properly to be moved on Clause 18, which relates to Money Bills and Votes, and devolves certain powers on the Lord Lieutenant?

*VISCOUNT WOLMER: That point has also presented itself to my mind. I therefore propose only to move the insertion of the words "or to grant Votes in Supply." Will not that be in Order?

THE CHAIRMAN: I think the Amendment as it appeared on the Paper yesterday was not in Order. I have carefully considered this matter, and the bearing of Clause 18 on it has not escaped my attention. I hold that the Amendment, as now framed, is in Order.

*VISCOUNT WOLMER said, he would not trouble the Committee at length with the particular points arising upon this Amendment, which he had dealt with in his Amendment on the previous day; but he would ask them to keep in view, in discussing this Amendment, the fact that the word "laws" governed the whole of this section, and he would also remind them that the Prime Minister had the day before most distinctly and clearly withdrawn from the position which the House and the public understood him to have taken up, both when he introduced this Bill and when he introduced the Bill of 1886. The Committee must bear in mind that when the Prime Minister spoke of withdrawing these excepted matters from the cognisance of the Irish Legislative Body, he meant legislative cognisance, and that when the right hon. Gentleman said that Body would be precluded from doing any act in connection with these matters he meant, not doing an act, but passing any Act. The Amendment would preclude the Irish Legislature from granting Votes in Supply in connection with any of these excepted subjects, and had a very important bearing in at least three cases. It touched the question of the Military and Naval Forces, for he submitted that as the Bill stood the Irish Legislative Body could grant Votes in Supply to any Volunteer Force that might be established in Ireland. Again, the Amendment dealt with the question of the payment of Envoys to Foreign States, even if they were not accredited, inasmuch as under the Bill in its present form the Irish Legislature could pass a Vote in Supply for such a purpose. Lastly, the Amendment raised the whole question of bounties. As the Bill now stood, he submitted that the Legislative Body could grant bounties on Irish produce exported to foreign ports. Whether his contention should ultimately prove to be right or wrong, he thought the Committee would admit that no more important question than that of foreign bounties could be raised in connection with this Bill, as it affected the trade of the United Kingdom. The Prime Minister would probably say in answer to him that the Government agreed that the Irish Legislative Body ought not to grant Votes in Supply in connection with the excepted subjects, and that, as a matter of fact, that was provided for in the Bill, because they could not grant any Votes in Supply that were not included within the Appropriation Act, and which would be void if it included Votes in any of the excepted subjects. But, assuming that the Appropriation Act would cover the point he was now dealing with, he thought the Committee and the country required a great deal more light upon the way in which this safeguard was going to work. In the first place, would the whole of an Appropriation Act which included Votes for a Volunteer Force or for bounties be null and void? Would the whole of the appropriation of the Irish Supplies for the year fall to the ground because one Vote was included that was beyond the purview of the powers of the Irish Parliament? He imagined the answer would be in the negative, and that the Appropriation Act, as well as all other Irish Acts, was covered by Section 33, which enacted that—

“An Irish Act, notwithstanding it is in any respect repugnant to any enactment excepted as aforesaid, shall, though read subject to that enactment, be, except to the extent of that repugnancy, valid.”

If that was to be the answer he would put another question. Suppose an Appropriation Act were passed which included Votes in Supply for some of the excepted matters, Section 3, read in connection with Section 33, would allow the whole of the Act to be valid except the clauses dealing with the particular Votes which were repugnant, and therefore invalid. Who was going to pronounce that those clauses were invalid? How was the point going to be raised, and at what moment? This was not a question of levying taxes, for they would be levied under another Act, but of expending taxes; and when the Appropriation Act was passed, at what moment would the Paymaster General or the official, whoever he might be, who would be charged with the duty of paying to the officials of the Irish Government the money so voted—at what moment would that official be hauled over the coals for allowing money to pass from his hands for purposes beyond the purview of the Irish Legislative Body? How would the question be raised? Not by those who passed the Vote, or who were interested in it. Would the Lord Lieutenant have to send the Appropriation Act to the Privy Council to determine whether and to what extent it was invalid and repugnant? He would ask some Member of the Government to give the Committee a little light on this most important matter, which had been studiously concealed from the country, and as to which absolutely no information had been vouchsafed to the House or to the electors. The Government would probably say that neither the Lord Lieutenant nor any body of aggrieved Irishmen, nor anyone else, would have to raise this question, because it was dealt with under Section 31. Section 31 provided that an officer should be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant, to be called the Irish Comptroller and Auditor General. The Government might say that if the Irish Paymaster paid away money he had no business to pay the Comptroller and Auditor General, who would revise the annual accounts, would disallow these payments; and that the Irish official who paid away the money would have to make it good out of his own pocket. The Government might add that, under those circumstances, no official would be willing to run so grave a risk to his position and pocket, and that he would be careful not to pay money which he was not perfectly satisfied had been legally voted. But that raised another point on which he desired information. In what capacity would the Lord Lieutenant be acting in appointing the Irish Comptroller and Auditor General? Would he be acting as the Queen's Minister, or as the Representative of the Irish Cabinet? Would the Irish Comptroller and Auditor General be an Imperial officer for Imperial purposes to safeguard Imperial expenses? In that case he admitted that such an officer would be a safeguard against and a check upon the voting of illicit Supplies. But what would the Irish Nationalists say if the Comptroller and Auditor General, instead of being their officer, was to be an Imperial officer? If, on the other hand, the Comptroller and Auditor General was to be a mere mouthpiece of the Irish Cabinet, it was quite clear that no reliance could be placed upon him as affording a check upon the voting of these illicit Supplies. What restraint would a Nationalist Comptroller and Auditor General be likely to exercise over Supplies proposed by a Nationalist Cabinet, voted by a Nationalist Parliament, and approved by a Nationalist people? There was no necessity to imagine a case of great wickedness or evil. They need only imagine the very natural case of the Irish Parliament granting bounties to an Irish industry. Would not the whole Nationalist sentiment of Ireland be in favour of these bounties, and would it really be contended by the Government that the bulwark against the Nationalist sentiment in favour of bounties was the Nationalist Auditor General responsible to a Nationalist Parliament by whom the bounties would be voted? If he might be allowed to say so, with pardonable parental pride, this Amendment was a most interesting one, because it afforded Her Majesty's Government such an excellent opportunity for giving the Committee much information with regard to the clause under discussion. The Government might say that Clause 18, Sub-section 2, guarded against the evil he had pointed out. That sub-section laid down—

"It shall not be lawful for the Legislative Assembly to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill for the appropriation for any purpose of the public revenue of Ireland, or of any tax, except in pursuance of a recommendation from the Lord Lieutenant in the Session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill is proposed."

That sub-section raised a very important point indeed. He asked again, in reference to that sub-section, in what capacity would the Lord Lieutenant act?

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N): I rise to Order. I wish to know whether the noble Lord is in Order in discussing Clause 18 while Clause 3 is under discussion?

*THE CHAIRMAN: The noble Lord is in Order in referring to Clause 18 on the point he is raising.

*VISCOUNT WOLMER said, that he was not surprised that hon. Members on the Benches below the Gangway opposite had not the same thirst for information on these questions that Unionist Members had. He wished to know whether, under Clause 18, the Lord Lieutenant was going to act in the Irish Parliament as Her Majesty now acted in this House? No Votes in Supply could be brought forward in this House unless they were proposed on the recommendation of Her Majesty, or, in other words, Her Majesty's Government. That was not a Constitutional provision to safeguard the rights of the Monarchy, but was intended to take out of the hands of private Members the proposal of Votes in Supply. He, therefore, wanted to know, did Clause 18 mean that no Votes in Supply could be proposed to the Irish Legislature except by the Irish Cabinet? If so, that would be no check at all upon the voting of illegal Supply. On the other hand, did that clause mean that the Lord Lieutenant was to have a veto on the Votes in Supply to be proposed, that he could act in quite a different manner from the way in which Her Majesty acted in this House, and that with a stroke of his pen he could strike out such Votes as were proposed by the Irish Cabinet which he deemed were illegal? It was very important that the country should have clear and definite answers from the Prime Minister upon these questions. If the Lord Lieutenant were put into the position he had described he would be a real check against illicit Votes in the Irish Parliament, because he would be an Imperial officer, with the Imperial forces at his back, and with a most imperious command over the Irish Cabinet. He had argued the matter up to this point upon the assumption that an Irish Appropriation Act would be necessary; but he asked the right hon. Gentleman to point out within the four corners of the Bill a single line which absolutely secured, directly or indirectly, that an Irish Appropriation Act must be passed.

MR. J. MORLEY: In Clause 10, Section 4.

*VISCOUNT WOLMER said, that that sub-section of the clause was to this effect—

"Save as in this Act mentioned all the Public Revenues of Ireland shall be paid into the Irish Exchequer and form a Consolidated Fund, and be appropriated to the Public Service of Ireland by an Irish Act."

He admitted that, at first sight, that clause appeared to meet his objection. But he should like to ask whether it would be in the power of the Irish Parliament if it chose to alter that provision by an Act which might or might not be vetoed by the Lord Lieutenant, or by a formal Resolution directing the Irish Paymaster General to pay out moneys in obedience to Resolutions of the Assembly, either of which, for all the purposes of Irish Government and as far as the allegiance of Irish officers was concerned, would be absolutely binding upon the Irish Executive? In fact, why should the Irish Parliament be hide-bound, in matters of financial routine, by an Act of this kind passed by an Imperial Parliament? There was no provision that would prevent the Irish Parliament from passing Acts of Indemnity for acts done contrary to the provisions of the Bill. Acts done in obedience to the will of the Irish Parliament would be done in accordance with the sentiment of the majority of the Irish people, which might be opposed to that of the British people. He admitted that it would be very hard upon the Irish Parliament if they should be rigidly prohibited from voting Supplies in connection with all the excepted subjects, for it might lead to great inconvenience; and if the Committee were to adopt his Amendment he would move consequential Amendments in their proper places, to permit such Votes to be granted on the recommendation of Her Majesty, signified through some Member of the Imperial Cabinet. The Prime Minister had a favourite argument against these Amendments. But it was not sufficient for the right hon. Gentleman to throw it in the teeth of the Irish Unionists that they seemed to suppose that there was nothing human in the Irish except the form. The Prime Minister seemed to forget that in all these matters he was not dealing with his own property. This was not a personal bargain between the right hon. Gentleman and the Irish people. He was simply one of the trustees, though the chief trustee, dealing with the Irish people; and why should not the liability which attached to a private trustee apply also to him? Those who married their children without marriage settlements were considered very foolish; and nobody accused the bride or the bridegroom of having nothing human but the form because they insisted on having marriage settlements. They claimed the same right for themselves. They were trustees for the British people, present and future, and had no right to give away this property as if it were their private property. Was the Prime Minister going to contend, as he did last night, that it was no good to insert provisions which could not be enforced by the Imperial Parliament? He thought that the Prime Minister must regret some of the words which he used yesterday, because he gave away at once the whole case he had been making against the previous contentions of the Unionists.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): What were the words I used?

*VISCOUNT WOLMER said, that he understood the Prime Minister to say—and the right hon. Gentleman would correct him if he misinterpreted him—that it was derogatory to the dignity of Parliament to insert provisions on the lines of his Amendment yesterday, which they would not have the power to enforce. He was glad to find that he had not misinterpreted the right hon. Gentleman. But that had been the contention of the Unionists all along in reference to the figment of the Imperial supremacy and other matters; and they had a right to ask the Prime Minister, was this, or was it not, a binding and honourable compact with the Irish people? If it was an honourable and binding compact, every Amendment of this kind would be honourably observed by the Irish Parliament; if it was not, then none of the right hon. Gentleman's own provisions were worth the paper upon which they were written. The right hon. Gentleman could not pick and choose between his exceptions and restrictions. If the right hon. Gentleman really believed that the Opposition were guilty of gross want of humanity, sympathy, and fellow-feeling in proposing restrictions, he would himself have placed no restrictions upon the Irish Parliament; he would simply have written down the general limits which he wished the Irish Members to observe, and trust implicitly to them. That course would be consistent; but it was not consistent for the right hon. Gentleman to make his own restrictions, and to accuse all others who tried to impose restrictions of insulting the Irish people, and to try to evade answering the Opposition by casting all their Amendments into what might be termed the crucible of his indignation.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 19, after the word "laws," to insert the words "or to entertain or grant Votes in Supply, except on the recommendation of the Crown, signified by a Minister of the Imperial Government."—(Viscount Wolmer.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The question how far an Act of Parliament should be considered a compact is one of great importance in considering the general merits of the Bill; but the point raised by the Amendment is of much narrower scope. I am entirely clear in my own mind that it would be very unwise to introduce any portion of the Amendment into the present clause, which deals with legislative powers. Do not let us, if we wish to have a working measure, introduce into a clause dealing with legislative powers provisions relating to the issue of money which are exceedingly complex. The two things should not be mixed up. Nothing could be more inconvenient and less practical than to introduce into this clause anything relating to the issue of money. If that has to be done, it should be done in its proper place, and after separate consideration and discussion. The main object of the noble Lord is to prevent any appropriation of public money for purposes excluded by the Act. If ever there was a proposal that requires separate consideration and discussion it is this Amendment, which proposes to give the Crown a discretionary power of going beyond the subjects to be excluded from the purview of the Irish Legislature. The words in the Amendment are—

"Except on the recommendation of the Crown, signified by a Minister of the Imperial Government."

That proposition is so large, that to me it is rather staggering. There may be cases in which some power ought to be granted; but I am not prepared to give, and I will not give, a power to the Minister of the Crown to override the purposes of this Act. We should take care that there shall be no issue of money from the Irish Exchequer, under authority of this Bill, except for purposes contemplated by the Bill. The Bill aims at empowering the Irish Legislature to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Ireland. That implies, of course, making Money Laws and granting Votes in Supply. Those laws are defined in the Bill, and in this section their definition is extended by exclusion. The contention of the noble Lord is that there should be no issue of public money for the purpose so excluded. That is a reasonable contention; but, in my view, it has been provided for. If, however, the matter has not been made quite plain, the insertion of a few words at the proper place will make it absolutely clear. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary has already indicated that Section 10, Sub-section 4, will be the proper place. That sub-section provides that—

"Save as in this Act mentioned, all the Public Revenues of Ireland shall be paid into the Irish Exchequer and form a Consolidated Fund, and be appropriated to the Public Service of Ireland by Irish Act."

Of course, the appropriation must be by Irish Act, and the Revenues must be appropriated to the Public Service of Ireland—that is, the Public Service of Ireland as defined and limited by this Act; and the Bill, as it stands, prevents any issue of money except for purposes within the scope and purview of the measure. I hope, therefore, that what I have said is clear—first, that this is the wrong place to introduce any matters relating to the issue of money; secondly, that the power of exception given to a Minister of the Crown, if given at all—and on that I give no opinion—ought to be given most carefully, in most moderate terms, and not in the large manner proposed; and, thirdly, that if there is not a legal doubt, but even a general impression, that the words of the Financial Clauses are insufficient, there is not the slightest objection to make them still more clearly sufficient than they are by saying that no appropriation can take effect except according to the purposes and purview of the Act. It may be asserted by the noble Lord and others that I have said nothing about Votes in Supply; but it appears to me that the proper point is not the voting in Supply, but the issue of the money. No Legislature would ever dream of passing Votes in Supply except with a view to the issue of money. Any Legislature which passes Votes in Supply in regard to matters where it has no power to issue money would be making itself ridiculous; and I have not heard, among the innumerable imputations cast upon the Irish Legislature, the suggestion that it would be in the habit of making itself ridiculous. If we make the question of the issue of money safe, no other matter need be taken into view. I will not enter into the complicated question of the provisions of the law for the issue of money. But the House ought to be aware of two things—first of all, that, under the final Appropriation Act passed at the close of every Session, the money voted by the House is strictly and absolutely limited to the purposes specified by the law; and, secondly, that there are intermediate Appropriations which pass this House under the name of a Ways and Means Bill, and which provide that issues of public money may take place for purposes voted by the House in Committee of Supply. In that case there is no specification; but there is still absolute security in the Royal Order, without which the money cannot be issued. That Royal Order, of course, means in Ireland an Order from the Viceroy, and that brings in the Executive Government.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Executive Government of Ireland or of England?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The Executive Government of Ireland, certainly. I do not dispute the perfect propriety of the action of the Chairman in allowing the Amendment; but I am of opinion that, as a matter of convenience and policy, the plan proposed is clearly inappropriate, when the 4th subsection of Clause 10 is intended to meet the purpose. I hope I have shown that there is really no question of principle at issue between us; in fact, I think I have shown that I am rather more scrupulous in admitting exceptions to the provisions contained in the clause than is the noble Lord himself. If that be so, the question should stand over for consideration at the proper time, when I shall be ready to agree.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am glad to hear that there is no difference whatever between the right hon. Gentleman and the Opposition upon the principle involved in the Amendment. What the right hon. Gentleman relied upon was not the veto of the Lord Lieutenant of the Appropriation Bill, or the provisions of Section 18, by which the Lord Lieutenant shall recommend a Vote before it is considered by the Irish Legislature, but the provision—which he is ready to strengthen—in Section 10, which prevents money being paid out of the Irish Consolidated Fund for any except Irish purposes, as defined by the Act. Therefore, if I am not wrong in the interpretation which I put on the right hon. Gentleman's speech, the one foundation and the one machinery which he has provided for preventing illegitimate and illegal payments out of Irish taxation for prohibited purposes is the action of the Paymaster General dealing with the Irish Consolidated Fund.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Perhaps I ought to have explained more clearly that, as regards the final appropriation of money, I believe the machinery of the Bill to be so perfect that we cannot possibly amend it. But, as I have stated, we have in this country issues by intermediate Ways and Means Acts. Whether that system will be introduced into Ireland I cannot at the present moment say; but it is a convenient system, a good system, and almost a necessary system. It is solely with regard to these intermediate issues of money, in my opinion, that any possibility of difficulty can arise; and with regard to that, I say the matter is clearly brought within the responsibility of the Viceroy by the absolute necessity for having a Royal Order. I think, however, the intention of Parliament ought to be made perfectly clear, so that the issue of money for a prohibited purpose under any intermediate Ways and Means Act might be as clearly a breach of the law as it would be under the final Appropriation Act.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I quite understand the point which the right hon. Gentleman has explained with his usual clearness, but I should like to know in what capacity the Lord Lieutenant is to act. The Royal Order in this country is merely, so to speak, the expression of the will of the Executive Government. Therefore, if the Irish system is framed, as I imagine it will be, on the model of our own, the Order of the Lord Lieutenant in Ireland will also be merely an expression of the will of the Irish Executive Government. There will, therefore, be no check upon the Irish Executive Government; and there being no check on the Irish Executive Government, it will not carry out the wishes of the noble Lord, which were to check not the Irish Parliament alone, but the Irish Parliament acting through the appropriate organ—the Irish Executive. So I gather from the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman that, so far as these intermediate issues of money are concerned, our only safeguard is the necessity of having an Order from the Lord Lieutenant, who himself will be acting on the advice of the Irish Executive, who are the very people that we desire to keep in order. So I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in addition to the words which he proposes to introduce into Clause 10, if he will consider some method by which the object he has in view may be carried out, and the system which he himself described as perfect—by which money can only be issued in accordance with the law under the final Appropriation Act—may be extended so as to cover the case of preliminary and intermediate issues. I understand from the assent which the right hon. Gentleman has given, that he is prepared to consider, not unfavourably, the suggestion which I have thrown out; but there is another question. Even in the case of the final Appropriation Act I want to know how, as a matter of practical politics, you can prevent effectively illegal issues in accordance with the will of the Irish Legislature by the Irish Paymaster General? The case put by the noble Lord is that of the Irish Legislature and the Irish Executive being desirous of fostering Irish industries by means of the payment of bounties. That certainly is in accordance with all we know of the sentiments of a section of the Irish community, and it is not disgraceful to the Irish Legislature that it should try to do it. But then if that is a thing the Irish Legislature are likely to do, the question arises, Is it a thing they can do under this Act? The right hon. Gentleman said they could not, at all events with regard to the final appropriation of money, because that was fenced round by all kinds of safeguards. But might it not be done in defiance of safeguards? The Irish Paymaster General is likely to be at one with the Irish Legislature and the Irish Executive; at all events, he will be absolutely dependent upon them, as he will be their servant. Suppose all the necessary machinery were gone through—the passing of a Vote in Supply and an Appropriation Act—would not the Irish Paymaster General, whatever the legal safeguards, carry out what he knew to be the will of the Irish Legislature, acting in accordance with the wishes of the Irish people? It appears to us that this is a real practical danger, and therefore I would further ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will not also do his best to enable a British Minister, or somebody not dependent upon the Irish Executive and the Irish Parliament, to control the issues of money from the Public Treasury, which we fear might be made in spite of all safeguards. If the right hon. Gentleman will answer that question, he will go even further than he has already to meet the objections that have been raised.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : It is obviously impossible for me to deal with the question the right hon. Gentleman has raised with regard to the Irish Paymaster General further than to say that if the Paymaster General was so devoid of principle and of prudence as to sign orders for the issue of public money in defiance of the law and so make himself liable for disobedience to the law, he would be brought up like any other criminal. All we can do is, first of all, to indicate the duty of such public officers; and, secondly, to make the machinery of the law as effective as possible to punish them if they disobey it. The noble Lord asked me to say whether the payment of bounties is to be made illegal or not. I entirely decline to discuss the question of bounties. It has been said that there is a section of the Irish people who are given to view with favour the theory of Protection; but there is a section of the English people of whom the same may be said. Some time ago there was a meeting of the Conservative Associations of England, and on that occasion, with three or four exceptions, all those Associations determined that Protection ought to be restored. I hope the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who is so afraid of the protectionist tendencies of the people of Ireland, will use his influence to prevent effect being given to the nearly unanimous desire of the Conservative Associations of England. I think it is quite right that we should have words in this Act showing that under no circumstances can any issue of money take place in Ireland except for the Irish Public Service, and defining the limits of this Act. The right hon. Gentleman said the Viceroy would be the servant of the Irish Executive Government. That is, in my opinion, an exact inversion and an absolute contradiction of the whole meaning of the Act with respect to Imperial purposes. There will be no Executive in Ireland for Imperial purposes. The Viceroy will be the only Executive for Imperial purposes; and if you told me that the Viceroy might give his assent to an Act or might authorise the issue of a Royal Order for an illegal purpose, I can only say that, in my opinion, this House would soon put an end to the existence of such a Viceroy and to any Government that attempted to maintain him. The right hon. Gentleman has failed to comprehend the dual capacity of the Viceroy. For the purpose of guarding, within the entire range of his office, against the infraction of the prohibitions contained in this clause, the Viceroy is strictly and absolutely an Imperial officer. The Viceroy's relations to his Irish Executive are for Irish purposes, as defined by this Act, for Irish purposes, not excluded by this Act.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I entirely apprehend the fact that the Government desire the Viceroy to act in a dual capacity, but one of my complaints is that in none of the clauses is it clear in which of his two capacities he is to act. Sometimes he is represented as the Constitutional Monarch of Ireland acting through the Irish Executive alone, for Irish purposes, and at others as the Representative of the Imperial Government, dependent on the majority in this House, and checking, when it seems good, the action of the Irish Legislature. It ought to be made clear in which of his two inconsistent personalities the Irish Viceroy is to act. It is one of the great blots of the drafting of the Bill that it is impossible to discover what the views of the Government are in this matter, and what the view of the Courts called upon to interpret the Act in the future may be. The hon. Gentleman has let it be seen that even in his view the checks in the issue of money before the final Appropriation Act may be insufficient. The only check that exists is the necessity for a Royal Order in England and the Lord Lieutenant's Order in Ireland.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: What I meant was that any Royal Order for the Irish Service would clearly fall within the category of the Irish Service; but with respect to a Royal Order for the issue of money for the purposes excluded by this Act, it would be the absolute and primary duty of the Viceroy to refuse the Order, and in that respect he will be acting as an Imperial officer. There is not a Colony in the Empire in which the Governor has not a dualism of this kind, in which the Governor has not to discharge duties from time to time as an Imperial officer, and there is not a single Act which attempts to define the distinction.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This might be a workable system when you are dealing with a Colony, but here you are going to deal with a country in which by hypothesis the Lord Lieutenant is constantly to act, and as to whom it has not been settled whether or not he is to be the Representative of the British Cabinet or a Representative of the Irish Executive. The right hon. Gentleman, therefore, has not given the Committee any substantial consolation. The Government have not met what was the principal point of the noble Lord's contention. The right hon. Gentleman complained because the case of bounties had been cited as an illustration, and he had referred to the former action of Conservative Associations with reference to Protection. I make no complaint on that score; I only say that the House of Commons does not mean to concede the power of conferring bounties to the Irish Legislature, because it is a power which that Body might presumably desire to exercise? and the question to consider is whether the Government have effectually provided against its use? If the noble Lord's Amendment is not adopted, it will be in the power of the Irish Legislature to pass Votes of Supply; and the Irish Paymaster General, having behind him the express opinion of the Irish Legislature, cannot be effectively prevented from carrying out its intentions or from paying money out of the Irish Consolidated Fund, even if those payments should be illegal. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Paymaster General, if he did so, would be a criminal, and could be prosecuted. But who is to prosecute him? The Irish Attorney General? The Irish Attorney General was a Member of the Irish Government representing the two Houses of the Irish Legislature, and is it seriously suggested that he should prosecute the Irish Paymaster General for carrying out the wishes of the Irish Legislature?

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar) said, that the Attorney General was not the only person who could prosecute. Any one of Her Majesty's subjects could prosecute.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will not enter into a legal controversy with the learned Gentleman, who, I am quite sure, in addition to his other qualifications to instruct us, is a more capable authority on the legal point than I can be. But at this moment the immemorial custom in Ireland is that the whole of the Criminal Law has to be set in motion at the instance of the Attorney General. That duty, you will admit, will not be performed in the case, I suppose by the Irish Attorney General, but by some private individual in Ireland, against the wishes of the Attorney General, at his own cost and with the certainty of obtaining a kind of reputation in Ireland which will certainly not conduce to his personal comfort. If the learned Solicitor General knows something of law, I know something of Ireland; and I can assure him that if he relies for the maintenance of the law in Ireland upon prosecutions against the publicly expressed will of the people by a private individual at his own cost, the trial ultimately to come before Judges appointed by the Irish Executive, and jurors appointed under the amended Jurors Act, all I can tell him is that the law he thinks will be adequately maintained by such a procedure has no more chance of being put into operation than if it was in Lapland. The Committee will now see that the question before us is not one of drafting, or of a particular place where an Amendment should be put in, or of the particular legal safeguards you are going to place round your Appropriation Act, but it is a question of practical politics which the right hon. Gentleman has not endeavoured to meet; and for that reason, and as long as this practical point remained unanswered, I shall feel obliged to support my hon. Friend if he goes to a Division.

SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): The Prime Minister has made an important statement, and I hope he will forgive me for asking him for a little more information. He has informed the Committee that the Lord Lieutenant, as head of the Executive in Ireland, will exist in a dual capacity—that he will represent the Imperial Government in some capacities; in other capacities he will represent, and be guided by, the Irish Executive; that, being a Constitutional officer, the Lord Lieutenant will on certain occasions be instructed by the Imperial Executive; on other occasions by the Irish Executive. Until to-day I thought that, when the Lord Lieutenant was receiving instructions from the British Ministry, it was so stated in the Bill, and on all other occasions he was receiving advice from the Executive in Ireland. For instance, in Clause 5, which I thought gave us the true position, an instance is given where the Lord Lieutenant is not to act on the advice of the Executive Committee. He is, however, to be guided by the Executive Committee, who should aid and advise the Lord Lieutenant in general circumstances. In Sub-section 3 he could veto certain Bills, but he is there to be guided by the Irish Executive and to act subject to any instructions given by Her Majesty. In Clause 18 no Appropriation Act is to be passed, or Resolution, or Bill, for the appropriation of money except in pursuance of a recommendation from the Lord Lieutenant. When the Lord Lieutenant acts under that section is he to act in pursuance of advice from the British Minister or from the Irish Executive? If from the Irish Executive, then the Lord Lieutenant does not check them, because they will advise him to act in regard to their own action; if the Central Executive is to be understood, then in respect of money that is to be devoted to Irish objects only the Lord Lieutenant is not to receive the advice of the Irish Ministry, but of the British Ministry. In Clause 31 the Lord Lieutenant appoints the Irish Comptroller and Auditor General. In making that appointment under whose advice is the Lord Lieutenant to act? With reference to what has been said about prosecutions of the Paymaster General by a private individual, I think that the Solicitor General is reducing the administration of the Criminal Law to an absurdity. If the Paymaster General acted in the way described he would act with the sanction of the Irish Ministry, among whom would be the Attorney General, who could enter a nolle prosequi at any moment and stop the prosecution at his own will, and no private individual could proceed with it unless the Attorney General approved of it, and whether he has to institute or bear the expenses of the prosecution, he has the control of it as much as if he was the prosecutor. If the Criminal Law has to be carried out at all, it is virtually at the will of the Attorney General.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) asked whether in England, in the case of a private prosecution, the Attorney General could enter a nolle prosequi?

SIR H. JAMES replied that at any time the Attorney General could stop such a prosecution.

Sir H. James

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE, whose remarks were almost inaudible in the Reporters' Gallery, was understood to speak as follows: It is not in accordance with usual order or convenience to discuss every clause in the Bill on any particular Amendment. I therefore decline to follow my right hon. Friend, and refuse to discuss any clause except the one immediately under consideration. The case, as presented to the Committee, is that the Paymaster General might act in flat contravention of the law. Supposing that officer to be prosecuted by a private individual, the supposition carefully put forward by my right hon. Friend is that the Attorney General would interfere. I cannot help thinking that suppositions, which appear to be something entirely extravagant, are indulged in. I can assure my right hon. Friend, without any discourtesy, that I cannot enter upon the subject, for I know well that that would be to give ground for the further development of argument and discussion. When we come to the clause we shall deal with it. At present I am not defining the duties of the Viceroy, and I think it would be absurd on this clause to justify Clause 5. What I have stated is that absolutely the Viceroy must be bound, under all circumstances, to refuse to do any act which is in contravention of the Statute. It might be said that the phraseology is insufficient; it might be thought so; I do not admit it is. I have done all in my power to give every reasonable explanation, and I have done everything that reason or equity demands for the purpose of avoiding unnecessary debate.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I do not rise to continue the discussion in any controversial spirit. I am sure no one will charge my right hon. Friend with intentional discourtesy in this or any other Debate; but I think he has misapprehended the point of my right hon. and learned Friend. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said that it was not convenient, in discussing Clause 3, to deal with the subsequent clauses in the Bill. But it is impossible to avoid that, and he himself is an instance of it, because when we proposed to deal with this particular point on Clause 3 my right hon. Friend referred to Clause 10, and he explained that in Clause 10, Sub-section 4, they would find the provisions which they desired. The sub-section of Clause 18 states—

“It shall not be lawful for the Legislative Assembly to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill for the appropriation for any purpose of any part of the public revenue of Ireland or of any tax except in pursuance of a recommendation from the Lord Lieutenant in the Session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill is proposed.”

Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us whether it is intended in this sub-section to refer to the Irish Executive in connection with the Lord Lieutenant? If it is so, then I think the sub-section is of no value for the present purpose. Until we have that information we cannot properly decide whether or not it is necessary to insert further precautions in Clause 3. We only want to know what it means? [Laughter.] I know it is thought a most unreasonable contention on our part that we should wish to understand the meaning of the discussions. It is the opinion of some hon. Members that we are not here to discuss; that we are not wanted to understand; but that we are simply here to vote. I do not think that is the view taken by my right hon. Friend. If the Lord Lieutenant, mentioned in Clause 18, is the Lord Lieutenant acting on the advice of the British Government, then I should advise the noble Lord to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I have no hesitation in saying, in respect to any charge which is in violation of the provisions of this Act, no advice of the Irish Executive would have the smallest influence on the attitude of the Lord Lieutenant, who would be bound to obey the instructions of the Imperial Government.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley), whose remarks were interrupted by constant cries of “Divide!” said, he did not rise for the purpose of occupying time, but simply for the purpose of getting some information. Up to now this Debate had been carried on between eminent lawyers on legal points, and these eminent lawyers were diametrically opposed to each other. The other part of the Debate had been carried on across the Table of the House, appearing to hon. Members like an afternoon tea-table conversation, scarcely a syllable of which they had heard. He wanted to know something from the point of view of the practical politician, and from that point of view they had had no light whatever. The further they got with the Bill only tended to show what a tremendous leap in the dark the Government were prepared to take and their supporters to back up. As far as the speeches from the Government Benches went, they were to have a small tribute-paying Province under this Bill; but as far as the Bill itself went, they were to have, if not an independent Parliament, yet everything in the Bill to enable the Irish Legislature to become an independent Parliament. What they wanted was to have the substance of the speeches they had heard embodied in the Bill. They gained nothing from these discussions except a further conviction of the utter hopelessness of the whole of every clause of this Bill, and the great difficulty which Parliament was unnecessarily undertaking for itself in creating this Legislature in Ireland.

Mr. Byles rose in his place, and claimed to move, “That the Question be now put,” but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS expressed the hope that there would be no more accusations against the Unionists of being opposed to the Irish people. If they wanted imputations against the Irish people and Irish Representatives they could find them made in their strongest aspect and strongest language by right hon. Gentlemen on the Government Bench.

Mr. J. Morley rose in his place, and claimed to move, “That the Question be now put.”

Question, “That the Question be now put,” put, and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, “That those words be there inserted.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 188; Noes 240.—(Division List, No. 103.)

*MR. G. BALFOUR (Leeds, Central) said, he was not without hope that the Government might be induced to accept the Amendment which stood next on the Paper in his name.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present, *MR. G. BALFOUR said, his Amendment was to insert, in line 21, after the first "Crown," the words "or the prerogatives, or other executive power of the Crown." It was possible that the restrictions he desired to add were already included implicitly in the language of the Bill. He did not know whether that was so, and whether the word "Crown" was intended to cover "the prerogatives or other executive power of the Crown." Perhaps he might receive some intimation from the Solicitor General as to whether the words he proposed to add were regarded as already included, because, if so, he had no desire to take up the time of the Committee unnecessarily. If the hon. and learned Gentleman gave him that intimation it would relieve him from the task of showing that the power to legislate on the prerogatives of the Crown should be withheld from the Irish Legislature.

*SIR J. RIGBY said, that to a certain extent the object of the hon. Gentleman's Motion was already attained. He considered, for instance, that the word "Crown" included different prerogatives. But with regard to the words, "other executive power of the Crown," he doubted whether the hon. Member had quite thought out what their effect would be. These were not words known to the Courts, or used in the processes of the law. Where, for example, the Sheriff acted in levying upon goods, he did it by virtue of the executive power of the Crown. Words of such wide extent as these would have the effect of cutting down the power of the Irish Executive in relation to the most ordinary matters within its jurisdiction. If, however, the hon. Gentleman's intention was to deal only with such matters as were outside the jurisdiction of the Irish Legislature, it would be seen that that object was already attained. The Amendment had a much wider scope than he believed was intended by the hon. Gentleman. He was afraid the Government could not accept the Amendment as it stood.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question has not yet been proposed.

Amendment proposed,

In Clause 3, page 1, line 21, after the first "Crown," to insert the words, "or the Prerogatives or other Executive power of the Crown." —(Mr. G. Balfour.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. G. BALFOUR said, there might be a certain objection to the words, "or other Executive power of the Crown," arising from the fact that some portions of the Executive power of the Crown were of minor importance, and that it would be unwise to withdraw them from the jurisdiction of the Irish Legislature. Supposing the words of the Bill were to stand as they were now, without the addition of the word "Prerogatives," he wanted to know whether it would be competent for the Irish Legislature to pass a law enabling them to interfere in the appointments to such Executive offices as, under the Bill, would give a title or claim to the holders to sit on the Executive Committee of the Privy Council; and whether, under the Bill as it stood, it would be competent for the Irish Parliament to pass a law withdrawing the appointment of the Judges from the Executive and vesting it in the Legislature or leaving it to a popular vote? Those were the kind of powers he wished to withdraw from the competence of the Irish Legislature.

*SIR J. RIGBY said, that with regard to the first part of the question—that was to say, whether the Bill as it stood would enable the Irish Legislature to deal with those officers who would form part of the Executive Committee—a clause later on clearly provided that by an Irish Act alterations of that kind could be made. As to the appointment of Judges, certainly the appointment of Judges, other than Exchequer Judges, was treated as within the power of the Irish Legislature; and as the Bill stood it would appear not to be outside the functions of the Irish Legislature to provide some method of appointing them other than on the responsibility of the Executive of the day. He did not think the Amendment of the hon. Member would really touch these points at all.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : Hear, hear !

*SIR J. RIGBY : It would leave matters just as they were. The words "Executive power" would scarcely cover the appointment of Judges—to suppose that they would, would be a very wide stretch of the words "Executive power." What he would suggest was, not that these were matters so unimportant that they should not for that reason be excluded from the jurisdiction of the Irish Legislature, but rather that they were matters so plainly mixed up with the powers given to it, so plainly involved in the legislation permitted, that there ought not to be general words inserted in the Act to cripple and prevent the Legislature from carrying out the legislation entrusted to it in the most practical and reasonable manner. He therefore objected very much to the generality of the words proposed, believing that they would create serious dangers and difficulties. The Bill, he would suggest, was at present quite clear enough as it stood in the definition of matters which were of Irish import and which related to Ireland only, and he did not think any further words were required to establish greater certainty with regard to the limitations of the legislative power.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : The words of the Amendment are far too large. I take it that everything that is entrusted to the Crown by an Act of Parliament becomes, pro hac vice, an Executive power. Every farthing of public money which is expended is given to the Crown by grant of Parliament ; and, having been given to the Crown, the expenditure of the money in the manner directed becomes a matter of Executive power. Suppose a sum of money is granted out of the Consolidated Fund for the purpose of a particular salary, it is the duty of the Crown to expend the money on that salary. Surely the hon. Member does not intend to say there should be change, or power of change, in respect to that salary. I repeat, that the words "Executive power" are far too wide.

*MR. G. BALFOUR said, he appreciated the objections urged against the Amendment ; and perhaps it would be better, in view of them, that he should draft particular Amendments dealing with the points where he thought the interference of the Irish Legislature with the Executive power would be dangerous. That being so, he begged leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith) said, he desired to move, in line 22, to leave out the words "Lord Lieutenant as." His object was to give effect to a view he had long entertained—namely, that Ireland should not have exceptional treatment in the matter of a Lord Lieutenant. He saw no reason whatever why Ireland should have a Lord Lieutenant, when no such functionary was appointed for England and Scotland. He considered, further, that Ireland should have a Royal residence, and that Members of the Royal Family should visit that country. He knew that this opened up a very large question, and he should like to assure the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister that his Amendment was not put down with the view of damaging the Bill ; but it was really his confirmed opinion that a Lord Lieutenant was detrimental to the best interests of the Irish people. He did not believe this Bill would become law—nay, he did not think it would ever pass the House of Commons—still, this was a good opportunity for calling attention to a subject on which he felt strongly. Having been Adjutant General in the South of Ireland for five years, having seen a great deal of the Irish people, and having served in an Irish regiment for years, he had had a good opportunity of forming an opinion as to the Irish character. He considered that the Irish people were easily led. But, at the same time, it was necessary to lead them in the right way. He did not believe in parties in Ireland. He did not belong to Ulster nor to the South, but he practically occupied an independent position; and his view was that the Office of Lord Lieutenant was detrimental to the interests of the Irish people, and that it was a mark of inferiority. He had been told that the abolition of the Lord Lieutenantcy would render the Home Rule Bill inoperative; but though he believed that difficulty might be met, he did not think the Bill as it stood would be workable under any circumstances. He was of opinion that eventually it would be necessary to delegate some of the powers of that House to Local Legislatures. That House was overburdened with work, and to relieve it it would be necessary to give to the various parts of the Kingdom the management of their own local affairs. At the same time, he wanted to see a Bill introduced that would be workable. When such a measure was introduced it surely would not be proposed to give England a Lord Lieutenant; and, if that were so, why should they, solely on account of the narrow strip of water separating her from the rest of the country, put this inferiority upon Ireland? He desired to see a Secretary of State appointed for each part of the United Kingdom, believing that, under the existing system, they hurt the feelings of the people of Ireland without pleasing the English people. A great deal of the outcry for Home Rule and the expression of discontent in Ireland had been due to this exceptional treatment, and to the fact that the Irish people had been denied the privileges of Local Government which had been given to the rest of the United Kingdom. They also wanted to see Royalty more actively associated with Ireland. He could not help thinking, whilst witnessing the ceremony of the opening of the Imperial Institute the other day, that displays of that kind were needed in Ireland. It was said that the Irish people did not wish to see the Lord Lieutenant abolished, for the reason that the Viceregal Court brought money to Dublin. But he did not wish to do away with any expenditure of money in Ireland. He was only against Ireland being treated differently to the other parts of the United Kingdom in this matter, and he hoped in the future to see the residence in the country of a Member of the Royal Family as a

General Goldsworthy

Representative of the Sovereign. The presence of Royalty, with a real ceremonial, was what he wished to see, and not a tinsel show of the Lord Lieutenantcy. That, he believed, would appeal to the sense of loyalty of the people, and would conduce to the welfare of the country in many respects. Notwithstanding that he had lived five years in the South of Ireland he had never attended a levée in Dublin, though, of course, he did not mean that he sympathised with the policy of boycotting the Lord Lieutenant, whatever Party might happen to be in power. He had attended Her Majesty's Drawing Rooms in England; and if any Member of the Royal Family had held a levée in Ireland whilst he was there he should have considered it his duty to attend. He hoped the Irish Members would not think that he was moving his Amendment in a spirit of hostility to them. He had made it a rule since he had been in the House never to do or say anything which could unnecessarily irritate those hon. Members; but he believed he was making this proposal for the best interests of the Irish people. He desired to see an end put to the present system, whereby one section of Irishmen showed antipathy to a Lord Lieutenant, whilst another section sympathised with him. He wished to see the Irish people treated with the consideration they had a right to demand, whether they resided in the North or the South of the Island. For those reasons he begged to move the Amendment standing in his name on the Paper.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 22, to leave out the words "Lord Lieutenant as."—(General Goldsworthy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: There are but few consolatory features in this Debate, and therefore the rare consolations which it affords are very welcome, and we must make the most of them.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: We cannot hear. Speak up.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It is a real consolation to hear an hon. Gentleman sitting on the opposite side of the House make a speech in the spirit of the speech which the Committee has just heard. I am convinced of the sincerity of every word which the hon. and gallant Gentleman has uttered; and if I cannot accede to the Amendment, it must not be inferred therefrom that I do not sympathise with a very large portion of what has fallen from the hon. and gallant Member. Go back to the history of this subject, or take the Lord Lieutenant as he is. There has been a difference of opinion amongst persons very honestly disposed in connection with Irish politics as to the expediency of maintaining the Lord Lieutenancy. I remember one nobleman who earned a reputation in Ireland—Lord Carlisle—who was at one time Chief Secretary and at another Lord Lieutenant, was of opinion that the Lord Lieutenancy on its present footing tended to maintain Party spirit in Ireland, and, as tending to maintain Party spirit, should be abolished, and Lord J. Russell went so far as to bring in a Bill for that purpose. There was no Party opposition to the Bill. It was received without prejudice; but the first impediment that appeared in its way was the great authority of the Duke of Wellington, who contended that to have some Representative of the Executive power residing in Ireland was a thing indispensable. But now I do not quite understand how far the hon. and gallant Member intends to express dissent from that opinion. The hon. and gallant Gentleman has expressed a strong desire that a Member of the Royal Family should reside in Ireland; and, speaking in the abstract without reference to this or that person, I agree with him that it would be a very desirable thing indeed. The custom which the hon. and gallant Member wishes to see established has prevailed in other countries in ancient times, quite apart from questions of democracy, of nationality, or other agitating questions. I will give an example. At the period when Flanders was attached to the German Empire, before the German Empire became simply an Austrian State, the rule—the general rule—was to have a branch Court at Brussels, presided over by a Member of the Royal Family. A symbol of Royalty is important in most countries, and is highly important in a country like Ireland, where, as the hon. and gallant Gentleman said in a kindly and generous spirit, the people are easily led. In other words, they are a people who, if you give them fair play, and do not bar the way to mutual understanding, would be easy to govern. Even under the present system, when the Viceroy is undoubtedly liable to be associated to too great an extent with this or that particular Party, it has been found impossible to abolish the Office, and the impartial opinion of those best qualified to form a judgment is that it cannot be got rid of. The question whether the Viceroy should be a Royal person or not is a totally different question. I am convinced that when what we call Home Rule becomes the law of Ireland a Party character will cease to attach to the Viceroy. There is no Party character in Colonial Governors; they are not representative of Party, and that, I hope, will be the case of the Irish Viceroys under the new system. We cannot part with the Viceroy any more than we can part with Colonial Governors. We cannot say to the Colonies—"Matters affecting you shall be referred to Secretaries of State, and they shall decide whether or not the Royal veto shall be exercised." To withdraw from Ireland the representation of the Imperial power that exists there now—although under very unfavourable circumstances—would be a retrograde step. We cannot part with the Lord Lieutenant; Ireland, even under the present system, could not be governed by a Secretary of State residing in London. Still less would it be possible so to govern it when you have a Home Government established, for the ordinary transactions of that Home Government would be Irish and not Imperial transactions, and with regard to them an officer resident in London would labour under enormous disadvantages. Consequently, although I sympathise with the feelings of the hon. and gallant Member, and agree with what he has said as to the immense moral power even in this sometimes called democratic age of what may be called Royal association beneficially exercised, yet I am sorry to say we are obliged to object to the Amendment, because, even under the present system, it has not been found possible to dispense with a local head to the Executive Government, and because under the new system, when Irish affairs will be separated from Imperial affairs and transacted on the spot, even if the Office were held by a Royal person, it certainly will not be possible to do so.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The discussion the hon. and gallant Member has initiated is of the greatest interest. I have never myself strongly advocated the retention of the Lord Lieutenant. The question, indeed, never came formally before us, but it has been frequently raised in an informal manner on the Vote in Supply for the Lord Lieutenant's Household; and I have never committed myself, nor have my Colleagues, to any view as to the propriety or impropriety, the expediency or in expediency, of retaining the somewhat anomalous Office of the Lord Lieutenant. That Office is now divided really into two different portions. It has two quite separate spheres of activity. It is a great Ceremonial Office, and it is in name, at any rate, a great Executive Office. My hon. and gallant Friend admits that in Ireland there ought to be a great Ceremonial Officer representing the Crown—if possible a Member of the Royal Family—but he thinks that the Executive duties of the Lord Lieutenant may properly be given over to some other officer, a Secretary of State. Without committing myself to the plan of my hon. and gallant Friend, I agree with him that under the existing system we are drifting into the division of the ceremonial and Executive functions of the Viceroy, and that under the new system that is proposed we ought officially and formally to accept that division. The right hon. Gentleman opposite, dealing with the present system, said that it was impossible to govern Ireland without having on the spot an Executive Officer like the Lord Lieutenant to carry out Executive functions. I wish he would ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland how many Executive functions are now really carried out by the Lord Lieutenant in Ireland. Every one acquainted with the government of Ireland knows that the whole tendency in modern times has been to throw more and more into the hands of a gentleman who is in everything but name a Secretary of State the real Executive functions in Ireland, and to reduce the Lord Lieutenant to the position of a great Ceremonial Officer. I do not say that this division of functions has ever been carried out completely, but the stream of tendency has been in that direction. That being the existing state of things; what do the Government propose to substitute for it? They propose to abolish the Secretary of State, and to throw upon the shoulders of one man the ceremonial functions and the Executive functions, and to divide the latter into two different classes, in one of which the Executive functions are to be exercised by the Lord Lieutenant on the advice of the Irish Government, and, in the other, the Executive functions are to be exercised practically according to the instructions of the British Cabinet. That system, I confess, I think must break down. I think it will be found impossible—the more we discuss the clauses of this Bill the more it will be found impossible to exercise the proposed double Executive functions of the Lord Lieutenant satisfactorily, and when ceremonial functions are added to them the system will, I believe, fall to pieces by its own weight. The right hon. Gentleman appears to hope that if Home Rule should ever be carried the Lord Lieutenant will be a great Executive and Ceremonial Officer disconnected from Party. I do not understand on what the right hon. Gentleman bases that expectation. Under this Bill, as we know from a speech of the President of the Local Government Board, the great safeguard against the misuse of power by the Irish Executive resides in the veto of the Lord Lieutenant, acting upon the advice of the English Government; and if these functions are to be a reality the Lord Lieutenant in future will be ten times more a partisan than he is at the present time. No doubt, at the present time, owing to the position which the Irish controversy has occupied during the last 10 years, the Lord Lieutenant has found himself looked at askance by one Party or the other. But that was not always the case; and if, as I hope and believe, the Home Rule Bill is not passed and the Irish controversy gradually fades, we shall find that the Lord Lieutenant will practically cease to be mixed up with Party politics, and will have at his Vice-Regal Court members of all Parties, all interests, and all sections alike. But to suppose that such a result can possibly follow if you pass this Home Rule Bill and hand over to the Lord Lieutenant the enormous responsibilities which the measure will cast upon him, appears to me to show a sanguineness of disposition which throws the lessons and results of experience absolutely to the winds. I do not know whether my hon. and gallant Friend will think it necessary or desirable to take a Division. If he does, I shall certainly vote with him, and for this reason: that it appeared clearly when we were discussing the last Amendment, and will appear, I am convinced, more and more clearly as we make our progress through this Bill, that the functions you propose to throw on the Lord Lieutenant are functions which he cannot possibly carry out. You had better make up your mind, if you must keep up ceremonial functions in Ireland, to have two officers—one representing Royalty, and being above and altogether removed from Party politics, and the other being a great official who shall endeavour, as far as he can, to carry out the double rôle which you allot to the Lord Lieutenant in this Bill and do his best during half the week to act as the Representative of the Irish Cabinet, whilst during the other half-week he tries to act as the Representative of the British Cabinet.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): There are one or two points which the right hon. Gentleman has raised that need a word or two's reference from me. First of all, as to the recent history of this question, the right hon. Gentleman said there had been no formal invitation given to this House in recent times to express its opinion respecting the Office of Lord Lieutenant. The right hon. Gentleman is mistaken. Very soon after I came into the House, in 1887, the present Leader of the Irish Nationalist Party—the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. J. M'Carthy)—moved the Second Reading of a Bill for the abolition of the Office of Lord Lieutenant. The discussion took place on a Wednesday afternoon, and there was no Division. The curious thing is, however, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Plunket) made a very strong speech in favour of the maintenance of the Office, and he did so, in some degree, upon Home Rule grounds. I do not mean in the least with reference to an Irish Legislature; but what he said was—

“He would have no hesitation in saying it would be impossible for the then Lord Lieutenant to perform his difficult duties as he had done during the last year if he were a Minister obliged to be in attendance in the House of Commons.”

I only refer to that as showing that the House was invited to express an opinion upon the maintenance of this Office, and that the only gentleman who spoke from the Conservative Benches was in favour of retaining that Office. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down seems to suppose that it is only in recent years that the Office of Lord Lieutenant has been a Party Office.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I recognise, of course, that it has always been a Party appointment, but I rather intended to imply—I may be wrong historically—that it has only been within the last 10 or 15 years that, as a rule, the Lord Lieutenant was “boycotted” by one or other Party in the State.

MR. J. MORLEY: I believe my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, who knows these facts better than he or I know them, is confident that during the last 15 years the state of things has not prevailed to which the right hon. Gentleman has alluded. As to the existing system, it is, no doubt, quite true that in a general way, certainly for the last 15 years, the Chief Secretary has had more to do with Executive duties than the Lord Lieutenant. I must, however, remind the right hon. Gentleman of the exception of Lord Spencer. Lord Spencer, of course, being a Cabinet Minister, had the most immediate and direct control of the Executive work. But, however that may be, the right hon. Gentleman is right in saying that the stream of tendency has been, and is, that the Chief Secretary should sit in this House, and because he sits in this House should have the control of, and be responsible for,

Executive action which does not belong to the Lord Lieutenant. The precise degree to which the Lord Lieutenant confines himself to ceremonial functions and takes part in Executive acts will, of course, vary with circumstances; but in a general way it has been proved that since 1880 the Chief Secretary has had more to do with Executive action than the Lord Lieutenant. One reason for that is that it is during the last 13 years that the Irish Question has entered into one of its very acute phases, and, that being so, it is perfectly natural, and indeed inevitable, that the Minister responsible for Ireland should sit in this House, which, whatever view we may have on the question of a Second Chamber, is the Body through which public opinion can be best consulted. As to the remarks that have been made on the system proposed by the Bill, of course a great deal more will have to be said on that question when we come to the 5th clause, and I think we had better reserve discussion upon the matter until we reach that clause. I think the right hon. Gentleman must feel himself that, as the Government believe that the policy on which the Bill rests is sound, and that our plan or some such plan is inevitable and indispensable, it is necessary to have an officer resident in Ireland, in constant touch with Irish feeling, and in constant relation with Irish Ministers in a way and to a degree that no Secretary of State residing in London practically for six months in the year could possibly be. I consider that the whole of this fabric, whether it be sound or unsound, would fall to pieces, because you would remove the keystone from the arch if you took away this Executive officer and set up in his place two officers to perform two sets of functions. On these grounds we must resist the Amendment.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, the right hon. Gentleman might have made a most interesting speech, and might have answered everything that had been said by the supporters of the Amendment; but, as far as those who sat in his (Mr. Heneage's) part of the House were concerned, they had not heard a single syllable—[Cries of "Oh!"] Well, he supposed he knew best. Of course, hon. Members did not like to interrupt the Prime Minister;

but they really thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary might make himself audible. With regard to the Amendment, he had always been opposed to the maintenance of the office of Lord Lieutenant, whom he had always looked upon as a species of political dummy. The Lord Lieutenant had nothing whatever in the world to do apart from those things which appertained to a Ceremonial Office. Except in the case of Lord Spencer, and during the short Lord Lieutenancy of Lord Carnarvon, the Lord Lieutenant's Chief Secretary had been his master. He (Mr. Heneage) objected to the maintenance of any office in which the man who was nominally responsible had under him someone who was really his master and who always pulled the strings. To continue the system under the new state of things it was proposed to inaugurate would be an absurdity. He did not think that "Lord Lieutenant" was a good name to preserve in Ireland, the Lord Lieutenant being associated with what was popularly known as "the Castle"; and, that being so, he did not think the retention of the title would commend itself to Irishmen. What was the Lord Lieutenant to do under this Bill? He was to be at the bidding of the Irish Executive on some occasions and of the Imperial Executive on others; he was to be a sort of administrative "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," and was never to know for two minutes together which character he was to assume. Was the Lord Lieutenant to be used merely for ceremonial purposes, or was he to be an Executive officer? It appeared to him (Mr. Heneage), from what had been said in the course of the discussion, that he was to be a most important administrative officer. At the same time, he was to be under the control of the Chief Secretary. Who was to represent Irish affairs in the House of Commons—the Home Secretary, the Colonial Secretary, or the Foreign Secretary? Occasionally, it must happen that the Lord Lieutenant, acting as the Representative of the Imperial Parliament, would exercise the veto in regard to some Vote in Supply, and in that event who was to defend his action in the House? What was to be the position of the Lord Lieutenant? Was he to continue to be entirely under the control of some British Minister, or was he to act under the direction of the Irish Executive? Was he to have control over the Naval and Military Forces of the Crown? What was he to do? Unless they received some more specific answer to these questions he should vote for the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) said, he believed there was no question on which Irish Unionist opinion was so unanimous as on the abolition of the Lord Lieutenancy; and having listened attentively to the Debate, he was bound to say he had heard nothing to lead him to assume that the position which the Lord Lieutenant would occupy under an Irish Administration would materially differ from that which he held under the present system. Irish Unionists believed that the Lord Lieutenant was a mischievous element in the Irish Government; for under our modern arrangements he really exercised no political power, and had practically no influence on the Government of Ireland as an Executive officer. There was a great deal in what the Chief Secretary said with regard to the fatal effect which the Amendment, if carried, would have on the Bill. That in itself was a strong inducement to him to support the Amendment; and it also showed clearly how precarious was the Constitution to be given to Ireland when the withdrawal of a simple ceremonial officer would destroy the whole fabric. The Prime Minister had indicated that the Lord Lieutenant would merely be the ceremonial head of the new Government, and it did seem absurd to say that the suppression of the office would destroy the whole Bill. He thought they had good reason to complain that they were left completely in the dark as to when the Lord Lieutenant would exercise his duties as ceremonial head of the Irish Government and when he would begin to act as guardian of British interests. Did the Government propose in any future clause to add machinery which would assist the Lord Lieutenant in distinguishing between those two phases of his character? for it was evident from what had been said that afternoon that he might be called upon at any moment to decide most delicate questions which might arise between the Irish Legislature and the Imperial Parliament. If the Lord Lieutenant was to be called upon to decide intricate questions, they would have to create a supply of hereditary Constitutional lawyers which up to the present time this realm had not produced. He believed the policy embodied in the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend was one which had the unanimous support of Irish Unionists. They submitted to having the Lord Lieutenant as the head of the Government, because they had not yet had an opportunity of getting rid of a system which they believed to be mischievous in the extreme; but he was convinced that when they did get a chance of again proposing legislative measures for the better government of Ireland, one of their efforts would be to promote a Bill for the abolition of the Lord Lieutenancy.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.) said, he rose in consequence of the statement of the Government that it would be impossible to conduct the Government of Ireland if the head of the Government were not resident in Ireland, as it was insisted he should be. But he wished to remind the Committee that at one time Scotland had a separate Government and Parliament. Scotland never had a Lord Lieutenant, but a Secretary of State, who was generally with the King in London. There were several chapters in Macaulay's History which described the state of the Government of Scotland shortly before the union of the two Parliaments. He was acquainted, too, with the correspondence that passed at the end of the 17th century between the Secretary of State for Scotland (Lauderdale), who was resident in London, and his deputy in Edinburgh, and bore out his statement. If that was the case at the time when Scotland was practically further from the centre of Government than Ireland was in the present day, there could be no difficulty in the way of having a Secretary of State often in London responsible for Irish Government. It all turned on whether the Imperial control was to be a real one or not; if it was to be real, then it could not be wielded by the Lord Lieutenant as proposed. He recognised a strong family likeness between the Lord Lieutenant's position under the Bill and that of a Colonial Governor. They were both appointed for a period of six years; and now the Committee had learnt that the Lord Lieutenant was to exercise the prerogatives of the Crown on the advice of the Irish Ministers, and was therefore to be a mere figurehead. Like the Colonial Governors, he could only act through Constitutional advisers, and would have no more direct power than the Sovereign.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I entirely dispute the historical reference of the right hon. Gentleman. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to maintain that all the persecutions of the Covenanters in the reigns of Charles II. and James II. were directed by a Secretary of State in London? [Sir J. FERGUSSON: No.] Certainly they were not. They were conducted by the Council of State, and under a totally different system. If the right hon. Gentleman means to propose a Council of State in the same sense, there may be something in his argument; but otherwise his reference fails totally to sustain his point.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I was not describing the state of things under Charles II. or James II., but under William III., and the correspondence shows that the Minister who resided near the King was to have the chief direction of affairs. Matters in Scotland were managed by a deputy.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I beg your pardon.

MR. PLUNKET (Dublin University) said, that as the Chief Secretary had referred to some arguments which he used 10 or 12 years ago, he might perhaps be permitted to say a few words in explanation of his views. He did not altogether agree with his hon. Friend the Member for South Antrim that there was an entirely unanimous feeling in Ireland in favour of the abolition of the Lord Lieutenancy. His views on the subject were formed in happier days in the recent history of Ireland before the Home Rule Question had come upon the stage; and certainly in the part of the country in which he lived there was by no means a unanimous opinion among Conservatives against the Lord Lieutenancy. He believed that at that time the Lord Lieutenant's office was popular with both political Parties; and he desired most strongly that it should be held, if possible, by some member of the Royal Family. He was not prepared to say how far the circumstances of the last 12 years might not have altered the conditions of the case, but he hoped and believed that when this insane Home Rule agitation and policy had passed away, the old traditions would revive again in Ireland; and he should then be prepared to vote for the retention of the Lord Lieutenant's office, to be filled by as distinguished a personage as possible. But what on earth had these reasonings to do with the case that was before the Committee? What kind of an office was to be filled under the Bill by the Lord Lieutenant? Imagine a Royal personage being asked to undertake such an office! The position of the Lord Lieutenant as described by the Government—an official responsible to-day to the Nationalist Parliament in Dublin and to-morrow to the Imperial Parliament in London—reminded him of a very clever caricature which he had seen on the stage not long ago in this City. A very able actor personated in one performance an Irishman and a Scotchman at the same time. On one side he was dressed in a Scotch kilt and on the other side in Irish costume; and he managed to change the expression of his face in accordance with the side of him that was presented to the spectators. When the band struck up a Scotch reel he danced it to perfection, with the Scotch leg exposed to view, and when an Irish jig was played he was equally good with the other leg as "Paddy." The performance of the Lord Lieutenant would be of a similar nature, if he were to be called upon to-day to dance to the tune of an Irish jig and to-morrow to follow the strains of "God Save the Queen."

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, the Prime Minister had referred to the Bill, brought in by Lord John Russell, for the abolition of the Lord Lieutenancy, and to the views of Lord Carlisle in favour of the abolition of the Office which he once held. That Bill he found, by the Records of Parliament, was actually read a second time; but it then mysteriously disappeared, and had not been heard of since. With regard to the abstract question, he thought that the difference between the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University and the hon. Member for South Antrim as to the retention of the Lord Lieutenantcy was accounted for by the fact that one represented Dublin opinion, which was favourable to the Lord Lieutenantcy, and the other a part of the country which was not so much brought into contact with the Lord Lieutenant. The real question before the Committee, however, was, what was to be the position of the Lord Lieutenant under the Bill? The Chief Secretary had given him a very excellent reason for voting for the Amendment when he stated that to take the words out of the Bill was to take the keystone out of the arch. It was to do that very thing that he was in the House of Commons, and he should most certainly support the Amendment, and press it to a Division, whether the hon. and gallant Member liked it or not. Assuming the Bill to be carried and in operation, and supposing a disorderly state of affairs to have arisen in Kerry, Clare, or Limerick, with which the Irish Government were unable to cope, would the Irish Members be allowed to raise the question in the British House of Commons? And, if so, who was to answer them, as being responsible for the government of Ireland? At present, it appeared that the House would not be able to fix anybody with the responsibility. There would be an ornamental gentleman in Dublin, where he could not be reached. Anarchy might be reigning in Ireland, and Parliament would be powerless to stop it. He hoped the Chief Secretary would tell them who was to be responsible for Irish affairs in the Imperial Parliament.

Earl Compton rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

SIR T. LEA (Londonderry, S.) said, the Members who represented Unionist constituencies must press for an answer to the important question which had been put by the hon. Member for South Tyrone. The Irish Members were to remain in the House of Commons; Irish discussions were bound to be raised, whether the Prime Minister liked it or not; and who was to be responsible for Irish government in the House? Irish Land Legislation was to be reserved from the Irish Parliament for three years. During that time, what British Minister was to take up the question in which Irish tenant farmers were intensely interested? If hon. Members from Ireland brought in a Bill dealing with the land, which Member of the Government would deal with it? This was a very serious point.

MR. J. MORLEY: The Government quite agree that the point is a most serious one; but I submit that this is not the clause on which to raise it. The Government are quite prepared to make provision for the representation in the House of those responsible for what goes on in Ireland, just as there is representation of those responsible for what goes on all over the Empire. When the proper time comes—on Clause 5, for example, which concerns the Constitution and functions of the Executive power—the Government will be willing to discuss the matter.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 265; Noes 219.—(Division List, No. 104.)

*SIR A. SCOBLE (Hackney, Central) moved to amend the clause by inserting on page 1, line 22, after the second word "or," the words—

"Which may affect the authority of Parliament, or any part of the unwritten laws or Constitution of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, whereon may depend in any degree the allegiance of any person to the Crown of the United Kingdom, or the sovereignty or dominion of the Crown within the same; or."

He said that, instead of laying down specifically the things with which the Irish Legislature should be allowed to deal, the Bill enumerated certain matters which were withdrawn from the cognisance of the Legislature in Ireland. It followed that every subject which was not withdrawn was left to be dealt with by the Irish Legislature; and, therefore, in fixing the limits great care should be exercised to leave out nothing which it was intended that the Irish Parliament were not to have power to control and command. This Amendment was not a new-fangled one. It was introduced into the Indian Council Act of 1861, and had the approval of such eminent statesmen and jurists as the late Lord Derby and Sir Henry Maine. He thought he was justified in asking the Committee to insert the same words in the present Bill. The principle embodied in the first part of the Amendment had already been affirmed by the acceptance of the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Member for Bury. He had given notice of his Amendment before the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Member for Bury, and what he proposed was nothing more than a natural corollary of the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and it would give to those who were entrusted with the Executive Government of Ireland a practical remedy against possible mistakes which might be committed by the new Irish Legislature. Under the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Member for Bury it would be competent for the Imperial Parliament to repeal Acts passed in error by the Irish Legislature; but, under the Amendment he suggested, it would be impossible for any measure which contravened the authority of the Imperial Parliament to come into operation, even if passed by the Irish Legislature, because those who advised the Lord Lieutenant, whether they resided in Ireland or in this country, before giving assent to any Bill in contravention of the authority of the Imperial Parliament, would be bound to tell him that he would be justified in refusing assent to that Bill, and in that way all conflict with the Irish Legislature and the Imperial Parliament would be avoided. The second part of his Amendment related to a matter as to which there could be no difference of opinion in the House. He had been struck by the absence in the Bill of any direct reference to allegiance to the Crown. Of course, it might be suggested that, by introducing the Queen as one of the constituent elements of the Legislature, there was an implication of allegiance to Her Majesty; but he was desirous of having in the Bill something more definite than an implied allegiance. When Members of Parliament entered the House they took the Oath of Allegiance. No similar obligation was imposed by the Bill on Members of the Irish Legislature. But he did not think it necessary at this stage to put upon the Paper any Amendment imposing a statutory obligation upon the Members of the Irish Legislature to take the ordinary Oath of Allegiance to the Crown. He wished to have a recognition in the Bill of those unwritten features of the British Constitution, whereon the allegiance of the subjects of the Crown in this country depended. He did not think there was any need for him to press this upon the other side of the House. He did not suppose that anyone who was anxious that the Monarchical Constitution of our country should be maintained would be desirous of loosening the ties of allegiance of any of Her Majesty's subjects. All he asked for was a recognition of it on the face of the Bill, and with that object he begged to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 22, after the second word "or," to insert the words "which may affect the authority of Parliament, or any part of the unwritten laws or Constitution of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, whereon may depend in any degree the allegiance of any person to the Crown of the United Kingdom, or the sovereignty or dominion of the Crown within the same; or."—(Sir A. Scoble.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar): I do not know that there is anything in the Amendment which can be objected to except this—that it has all been fully provided for already. The hon. and learned Gentleman proposes that we should take note in the Bill of one point only of our Common Law. That is a proposition of a dangerous tendency. If we are to take note of that one point, we had better at once include in the Bill the whole of Stephen's Commentaries, or some other book of authority on Common Law. The authority of Parliament, as the hon. and learned Gentleman has already pointed out, is provided for by the acceptance of the Amendment of the right hon. and learned

Member for Bury, so far as the supremacy of Parliament is concerned. The words which have been borrowed from the Indian Act are quite proper to be inserted in a Statute for a country in which questions may arise as to the particular position of the subjects of Native Princes with whom we are in alliance; but these are questions that cannot possibly arise under this Act. The principle of the Common Law is clear that every person born a subject of Her Majesty must continue, without taking any Oath of Allegiance, to bear allegiance to the Crown all his life. The only way in which he can get rid of that allegiance is by complying with the provisions of the Naturalisation Act, 1870; and the Bill expressly provides, in Clause 3, Sub-section 6, that treason, treason-felony, alienage, and naturalisation shall not be dealt with by the Irish Parliament. A Legislature that cannot make laws as to alienage and naturalisation cannot make laws dealing with the allegiance of any of Her Majesty's subjects. It should be also remembered that nothing can be dealt with by the Irish Parliament that does not exclusively affect Ireland or some part of Ireland. It would be impossible to suggest that making a subject of Her Majesty not a subject of Her Majesty is a matter affecting Ireland alone.

CAPTAIN NAYLOR-LEYLAND (Colchester) said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had given them the answer which he invariably gave when he made a speech in this House. He either told them that what they proposed was already provided for, or that it was going to be provided for. He was led to think that occasionally the Solicitor General forgot that in this House he represented the chief Law Officer of the Crown. They did not want playful frolicsome banter from the hon. and learned Gentleman, but the views of a Constitutional lawyer, which they had a right to expect. The Amendment approximated to one which he had on the Paper which was ruled out of Order. He supported the Amendment, because he thought the supremacy of Parliament ought to be inserted in clear and definite terms, not only in every clause, but in every line and every sentence of the Bill. The supremacy of Parliament had been acknowledged by the Irish Members in the House; but what guarantee had they that it would be recognised by the Members of an Irish Parliament? If they divested themselves of Parliamentary authority as regarded a part of the Empire they ceased to be a Sovereign Power so far as affected that part. It might be argued that that was the relation of this country to the Colonies at the present time; but it was their love and loyalty, and not the Parliamentary sovereignty, that bound the Colonies to this country.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.), rising to Order, asked if the hon. and gallant Gentleman was discussing the Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Member is rather discussing an Amendment which has already been settled by the Committee.

CAPTAIN NAYLOR-LEYLAND said, as he read the Amendment, it dealt with the allegiance to, and Sovereignty of, the Crown.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is so. The hon. and gallant Member will be in Order in discussing that part of the Amendment, but he was not discussing it.

CAPTAIN NAYLOR-LEYLAND said, he was attempting to discuss the supremacy of Parliament.

THE CHAIRMAN: That has been settled, and is not the question raised by the Amendment.

CAPTAIN NAYLOR-LEYLAND said, his contention was that if the Amendment was not accepted the Imperial Parliament would not be a Sovereign Parliament. [Cries of "Order!" "Divide!" and "Question!"] The three strongest arguments of hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to him to be concentrated in the words, "Divide!" "Question!" and "Order!"

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): Is the hon. and gallant Gentleman in Order?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Member must confine his remarks to the Amendment.

MR. CONYBEARE: Make him sit down.

CAPTAIN NAYLOR-LEYLAND, resuming, said, that unless the supremacy of Parliament were clearly defined in every clause of the Bill it would be in the power of the Irish Members in the future to be able to say whether or not the Imperial Parliament was a Sovereign Parliament. [Cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Member must confine himself to the question raised in the Amendment. The matter to which he refers has already been settled by the Committee.

Mr. Conybeare rose in his place and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put"; but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

CAPTAIN NAYLOR-LEYLAND said, he accepted the Chairman's ruling, though it seemed to him that the questions of Allegiance and the Sovereignty of Parliament were inseparably connected. He hoped the Government would yet accept the Amendment, which could do no harm and would save much public time. He appealed to the First Lord of the Treasury to leave our Parliamentary Sovereignty as it was, unimpaired and unquestioned.

Mr. Conybeare rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put"; but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

*SIR A. SCOBLE (Hackney, Central) said, he desired to remind the Solicitor General, and through him the Committee, that the Common Law could at any time be changed by Statute, and it was to prevent that that he had put the Amendment on the Paper.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 238; Noes 276.—(Division List, No. 105.)

The figures having been announced,

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston), addressing the Chairman, said: I desire to call your attention to the fact that there was an hon. Member (Mr. Wayman) in the Ay Lobby who did not come through.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): The hon. Member was not telling in the Ay Lobby, but in the No Lobby. He would, therefore, have no knowledge of what occurred in the Ay Lobby.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL (Wigton): I told the hon. Member from my own personal knowledge.

MR. TOMLINSON: It is the duty of any hon. Member of this House to call attention to an irregularity which is brought to his notice.

THE CHAIRMAN called Mr. Wayman (Yorkshire, W.R., Elland) to the Table.

THE CHAIRMAN asked whether the hon. Member was within the Folding Doors?

MR. WAYMAN: I was upstairs writing in the Upper Lobby.

THE CHAIRMAN: Did you hear the Question put?

MR. WAYMAN: I heard the Division called, but I did not hear the Question put.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the hon. Member was not entitled to vote.

The following is the Entry in the Votes:—

Whereupon Notice was taken that Mr. Wayman, Member for the Elland Division of the West Riding, had voted with the Ayes, not having been in the House when the Question was put. Mr. Wayman explained that he had been writing in the Upper Ay Lobby, and coming down stairs had been counted in the Ay Lobby, although he had wished to vote with the Noes.

The Chairman thereupon stated that, as the hon. Member had not been within the Folding Doors nor heard the Question put, he was not entitled to vote; and directed the Clerk to correct the numbers accordingly.

The Chairman then declared the Numbers Ayes 237, Noes 276.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick) moved the following Amendment: In Clause 3, page 1, line 22, after "Crown," insert "or the altering of their own name or style." He said the Amendment, if carried, would stand as a separate sub-section. The object of the Amendment was to provide that this Irish Legislature, if it was created, should not have the power of forthwith calling themselves an Irish Parliament.

This question was raised by the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Clare, to substitute the word "Parliament" for "Legislature," and he supported that Amendment not because he desired to see a Parliament in Ireland, but on the ground that if that Bill created a Parliament it was only right to call it so. He supported that Amendment on the further ground that if that Legislature were created, and they in England called it a Legislature, the very first thing it would do would be to call itself a Parliament. He gave as a precedent where that very thing was done the case of Victoria. The Act which gave a Legislature to Victoria called it a Legislative Assembly, but in the very first Session, and in the very first chapter of a Statute which they passed, the Legislature of Victoria had a clause enacting "That the Legislature of Victoria shall be and is hereby called 'the Parliament of Victoria.'" The House of Commons, however, was practically unanimous in rejecting the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Clare, and, on the whole, he (Mr. Smith) was well pleased with that conclusion, and satisfied that the House should by such an overwhelming majority have declared that there should not be a Parliament in Ireland. The only question that really arose regarding this sub-section was the question whether the Irish Legislature under this Bill would have the power to give itself the name of Parliament, and, of course, under the 10th section of the Bill the Irish Legislature had only the power to repeal or alter any provisions which by this Act were alterable. That seemed to him not to make the matter explicit or certain. It left it an open question whether it was a repeal or alteration for the Irish Assembly to add, as it were, a provision to the Bill when it became an Act; that that Assembly should in future be called a Parliament, and it was important that the matter should be made clear and certain now. If the Bill as it stood would prevent the Irish Legislature from altering its title and taking the title of Parliament, and if Irish Members were prepared to acquiesce in that view, the greater part of his object would be attained; but it would be well if a point on which all were agreed could be made certain by adopting the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 22, to insert the words "the altering of their own name or style."—(Mr. Parker Smith.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE said, the first objection to the Amendment was that it was in the wrong place; secondly, the provision it would make was absolutely made already. The Irish Legislature could not alter anything in the Bill except in virtue of express power conferred upon it for that purpose. If the words used were not the best for the purpose—and it was his belief that they were—the time for amending them would be when dealing with the clause itself. His third objection to the Amendment was that it was objectionable to select, in a measure which was not intended to be alterable unless by express enactment, one particular point, and to say that that should not be altered. The plain effect of an Amendment to attach inviolability to a particular provision was to reduce the inviolability of others. From the point of view of the hon. Member, the Amendment was unnecessary and inexpedient, as it raised doubts as to other provisions of Acts of Parliament.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 234 ; Noes 278.—(Division List, No. 106.)

It being half-past Five of the Clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

PLUMBERS' REGISTRATION BILL.

(No. 91.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 20th February.]

Order for Committee read.

MR. S. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid) : I object.

MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.) trusted the hon. Member would not object to progress being made with the Bill, which was a measure clearly in the interest of the public. There was hardly a person in the country who had not suffered from bad plumbing work. The Bill would also be to the interest of the plumbers themselves. He would ask that the Order for going into Committee might be discharged, so that the Bill could be referred to the Standing Committee on Trade.

MR. S. EVANS : I object.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside) : I hope the hon. Member will not persist in his objection.

MR. S. EVANS said, there was a Bill on the Paper in which the Welsh Members were interested which ought to have been taken to-day in the ordinary course. They had had no assistance from the Government in regard to it; therefore, they could not consent to the Motion now made.

Committee deferred till To-morrow.

LICENSED PREMISES, DISPLAY OF FLAGS, &c.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to repeal the provisions of the Act of the sixth and seventh years of William the Fourth, chapter 38, relating to the display, on licensed premises, of flags and other decorations."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

MR. TOMLINSON : I object.

MR. T. M. HEALY : This is a Bill to enable the Union Jack to be waved on every public-house in the North of Ireland.

*MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) : It is not illegal to display the national flag of our country—the Union Jack—on any building in the United Kingdom, and I hope it never will be. Does this Bill propose to remove the St. Patrick's Cross from the Union Jack? The law in Ireland does not affect the Union Jack, which is a national flag, and simply prevents the display of local Party emblems on licensed premises.

MR. T. M. HEALY : It will repeal the Act which forbids the display of flags on public-houses in Ireland. Great inconvenience has lately been experienced by the Orange Party in Dublin and Belfast owing to their inability to display the Union Jack on public-houses. I am anxious to remove that disability, and to prevent policemen making raids on the public-houses which display these decorations.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Sexton, and Sir Thomas Esmonde.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 379.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PRO- VISIONAL ORDER (NO. 8) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. John Morley, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Local Government Board for Ireland, under "The Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878," relating to the town of Bangor, ordered to be brought in by Mr. John Morley and Sir John Hibbert.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 377.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PRO- VISIONAL ORDER (NO. 9) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. John Morley, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Local Government Board for Ireland, under "The Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878," relating to the town of Lisburn, ordered to be brought in by Mr. John Morley and Sir John Hibbert.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 378.]

CONSOLIDATED FUND (No. 2) BILL.

Read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

CIVIL SERVICES (EAST INDIA) BILL. (No. 243.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (BLIND AND DEAF CHILDREN) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Arthur Acland, Bill to make better provision for the Elementary Education of Blind and Deaf Children in England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Arthur Acland and Mr. Mundella.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 380.]

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Twelfth Report brought up, and read; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

WILD BIRDS PROTECTION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD BALFOUR: My Lords, I do not think I need detain your Lordships very long in moving the Second Reading of this Bill. The object of the promoters of the Bill is a very simple one, and one which will, I think, when stated, command the respect and support of the great majority of the House. The object of the Bill is to afford better means of protection by law than exists at the present time for certain species of wild birds which, from various causes, particularly require protection. My Lords, if I were asked to state what test I would apply in order to see whether any species of wild bird required protection or not, I should say you could determine the question by the test whether or not that species of bird was or was not largely decreasing in numbers. The necessity for the Bill arises from the increase of a certain class of persons who make a business, mainly for profit, of collecting birds' eggs in places where they are more or less easily got, and of species which are somewhat rare. I do not know whether any of your Lordships noticed in the Spring of last year that some of those to whom I have referred went so far as to ask for subscriptions to a sort of Syndicate or Company in the Midland Counties for the purpose of employing persons in their interest to go to places in the North of Scotland, where some of the rarer kinds of wild birds' eggs are found, and to collect them wholesale. I do not think I am using too strong a term, from the contents of a circular which has been sent to me, when

I say it really amounts to a wholesale depredation of the eggs of certain kinds of birds which are not by any means too plentiful. There are other places all over the country where birds congregate in considerable numbers and where they breed, and the scale of prices at which the eggs can be sold is held out as a temptation for taking them during those times of the year when they can be obtained. And not only do the eggs require protection, but certainly during the breeding-season the adult birds ought also to be protected. My Lords, it is said that the Bill as it stands is open to various objections. Noble Lords opposite and others have pointed out to me that as the Bill stands a County Council and the Home Secretary, working together, could, if they chose, pass a bye-law which would, in fact, prohibit all shooting of game in the administrative county under their control. Of course, such a result as that, I need hardly say, is very far from the wishes or desires of the promoters. Again, it is objected that as the Bill stands it would be theoretically possible to punish schoolboys for taking the nest of black-birds or sparrows. Of course, no such result as that is desired, either by myself or by those who have been most active in promoting the Bill. My Lords, I am not responsible for the drafting of the Bill. The Bill was introduced into, and has passed through, the other House of Parliament. If it was not introduced into the other House, in the shape in which it now comes to your Lordships, it has at any rate passed through the other House of Parliament in the shape in which it now stands; and until your Lordships have read the Bill a second time—if you will be so good as to read it a second time—there are no means of making known the Amendments which I dare say more than one noble Lord will be anxious to see introduced into it. I may say that I am prepared to move some Amendments myself, and I have knowledge that some of your Lordships are desirous of putting down Amendments with the view to making the Bill more useful and practical than it is at the present time. There is one point to which I ought, perhaps, to call attention. It may be thought desirable not to protect all species of birds, and not to give the Home Secretary and County Councils the power to shut up all places where birds are found. If it is the wish of the House to protect certain species of birds and their eggs by putting them in a Schedule, or, on the other hand, to protect certain places in particular, those are all matters for consideration; and I can only say that I shall be most anxious to accept help in the matter from all quarters of the House, keeping only in view the purpose of making the Bill efficient for the main objects which I have stated. I should be prepared to delay the Committee stage of the Bill for a few days so as to give plenty of time for consideration. I have only to say, in conclusion, that this is a subject which can, I think, be thoroughly well considered in this House. There are many noble Lords who have a thorough knowledge of country life, and who are well aware of the necessity for such a Bill as this; and I am quite certain that after this Second Reading, when we get to the Committee stage, help will be obtained from all quarters of the House for the purpose of making this an efficient and proper measure.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Lord Balfour.)

*THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: My Lords, I do not rise for the purpose of opposing this Bill on Second Reading. No doubt the object of the Bill is one which will commend itself to all noble Lords in this House; but it seems to me to give an additional proof, if one was wanting, of the great advantage which the country derives from the existence of your Lordships' House, because if the measure had not to pass the ordeal of this House we should have had a Bill passed through the other House of Parliament under which not one of your Lordships could shoot a single head of game if the County Council, having the control in that part of the country, with the assistance of the Home Secretary, chose to say so. I see many noble Lords around me who are very fond of shooting, and I think they would be much astonished if they found that the County Councils and the Home Secretary together were to have power to prevent them shooting a single head of game on their own estates during the whole breeding season, that game being their own property just as much as the timber which is grown on their land. With regard to the protection for eggs, that, I know, is a somewhat difficult question, because it has been held by some Magistrates, or by some Judges, that they cannot accept the suggestion that a particular kind of egg belongs to a particular species of bird; and unless the bird has been seen to lay the egg, they deny the possibility of its being proved to be the egg of any particular bird which may be put in a Schedule. I am glad to hear from my noble Friend that the measure he proposes will be referred to a Select Committee, and that he will be prepared to accept various Amendments which may be proposed to it—

*LORD BALFOUR: I did not propose that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee; I said I should be prepared to allow some time to elapse before the Committee stage.

*THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: Then it will be considered in Committee of this House, which will be much better able to deal with it. But, my Lords, the question of protecting the eggs of wild birds might, I think, be dealt with by giving power to the County Councils to declare a certain close time for certain districts in the country. That would not apply to the whole country, but they would only be districts to which the birds usually resort. The fact that for a certain period this would be considered a close time, should be well-known throughout the district, and published beforehand, so that anyone going into that part of the country at that time for the purpose of collecting eggs would know that he was liable to punishment. But I entirely agree with my noble Friend that it would be quite impossible to put an end to the popular amusement of birds'-nesting among the younger members of the community; and I think if the Act was put into force very strenuously, a strong feeling would be aroused against it throughout the country; while, on the other hand, if the Act was very seldom put into force, or only with a slight punishment, it would become a dead letter, and you might just as well not pass it at all. My Lords, I think my noble Friend will do well, as he has said, to get opinions from various parts of the House upon the Bill, and I have no doubt he would do well in striking out that part of it which would prevent those who are fond of shooting from indulging in that sport; and with regard to the question of collecting eggs, I think we should be in a better position by having power in the County Councils to declare a certain close time for particular districts in the country.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of KIMBERLEY): My Lords, I wish to say a few words on this Bill, in which I may say I take great interest. I entirely agree that the principle of it is one of which we should probably all approve; but with regard to the mode in which it is carried into effect, I agree with the noble Duke that it would be impossible to carry it into effect in its present form. I will not touch upon the proposals under which game might be prohibited from being shot; but with regard to the protection of eggs, I was very glad to hear what was said by the noble Duke opposite. I do not profess myself to have any experience in these matters, but it has been brought to my notice that if you simply prohibit the taking of the eggs of particular birds, you will probably altogether fail in the object you have in view. What is wanted is to prevent the destruction of certain species of wild birds which are rapidly diminishing, and which, if not protected, will probably vanish out of the country altogether. The eggs of some species of rare birds are to be found in certain limited localities, and I believe, from what I am told, that it would be possible to define those localities, and to prevent the taking there, during a certain season, of all eggs, and in that way to preserve the eggs of particular birds. They are not localities which are frequented largely by other kinds of birds than those whose eggs it is desired to preserve, and you could, therefore, punish persons who are found in those districts with eggs. Those who are acquainted with the subject say that it is almost impossible to distinguish between the eggs of certain rare birds and those of other birds, and it would, therefore, be impossible to prove before a Court that the eggs taken belonged to the particular species of bird which you wish to preserve. If the taking of the eggs of certain birds alone were prohibited, it would be almost impossible to prove that in any particular case. The Amendment suggested by the noble Duke deserves, I think, careful consideration, and I hope that, as well as many other points connected with the Bill, will be carefully considered in Committee.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL): My Lords, there can be no doubt that this Bill has excited a good deal of interest, and also some alarm, even among those who desire to protect the species of wild birds whose protection is the object of it. I have been favoured with a communication from a very high authority on the subject—Professor Newman, of Cambridge. He has called my attention to the provisions of this Bill, and he is afraid that it will not attain the object desired, whilst it may, on the other hand, lead undesirably, in a considerable number of cases, to the infliction of punishment on those who are merely pursuing the pastime of birds'-nesting. They might suffer in a way which is very undesirable. In fact, when the matter was considered some years ago by a Committee of the British Association, of which Professor Newman was Chairman, one of the conclusions at which they arrived was that the practice of birds'-nesting has been so much followed in England that no Act of Parliament—except one of the most severe character—would stop it, and that such a measure would, by filling the gaols with boys, excite great opposition even among many of those who are at present favourably disposed towards legislation on the subject. There can be no doubt, I think, that any attempt to protect these wild birds by such means would excite hostility, and would lead to results which would tend to defeat the object in view. There is also a considerable amount of opinion in favour of the view that the birds which are decreasing most rapidly in numbers are precisely those the preservation of which is not largely affected by birds'-nesting; and, therefore, the diminution which is so much regretted would not be arrested to any material extent, and would certainly not be got rid of by the prohibition of birds'-nesting. My attention has been called also to the impossibility of dealing with this question in the manner proposed in reference to the eggs. As has been said already by my noble Friend, the eggs of many birds are so much alike that it is often impossible, even for experts, to distinguish the eggs of rare species of birds from those of others which are more common. There is, therefore, a feeling in some directions that if there is to be legislation on the subject, it should be legislation dealing with places rather than with species of birds. But, of course, when you come to deal with places you are met with this difficulty, which I find mentioned in an interesting article written by Mr. Digby Pigott, when a Bill of this kind was first introduced, calling attention to the fact that the Great Stena one of the species of rare birds, which are decreasing in numbers, is found in districts in the Northern Islands, in Shetland, for example, where birds' eggs are largely used as an article of food—gulls' eggs—that it is difficult to distinguish between them, and they would probably be found not far from each other. If, therefore, you were to prohibit the taking of eggs in any place of considerable extent for the purpose of protecting the eggs of birds of this description, you would, at the same time, be preventing people collecting eggs which are to them a valuable source of food. If you were to limit the operation of this Bill to places, you would, therefore, have to see that while the districts were made large enough for the purpose of protecting the particular eggs you desire to protect, you were not, at the same time, making them so large as to deprive the people of the locality of an article of food, where they are accustomed to collect eggs for that purpose, and so cut off a valuable source of food supply. On those grounds I think it is necessary, in the first place, to pay attention to the selection of places; and, secondly, that great care should be taken not to make those districts too large in extent, but to confine them to the absolute necessities of the case. Another question which will have to be considered is that of giving notice of a change in the law—whether the Act ought not to provide for some form of publication which will make it certain that it will come to the knowledge of those who will come under the prohibition with regard to taking eggs from birds' nests. At present the only provision is that such notices are to be published in newspapers circulating in the country, or by such other means as the County Councils shall determine. The only objection is that the notices must be published in newspapers, and that boys who are in the habit of going birds'-nesting would probably not be likely to read advertisements in the newspapers. It has been suggested, therefore, that publication should be made also by putting up notices in the local schools. Those are matters which it will, I think, be very desirable should be considered in Committee; but I thought it necessary to call attention to them at the present time with the view of showing the great care which will have to be exercised in order that the Bill may accomplish the object desired, and may not do considerable mischief.

LORD WALSINGHAM: My Lords, I entirely agree with what the noble and learned Lord has said as to the desirability of protecting places rather than species. As the places where rare birds breed are well known, and are generally of limited extent, I quite agree that the best way of protecting those birds is to deal with the places in which they breed rather than to extend protection to birds' eggs in general. The vast number of wild birds really need no protection at all. I think that was the conclusion that was arrived at by the Committee to which the noble and learned Lord referred, that there are certainly a number of species of birds which need no such protection. Then, with regard to advertising the change in the law, I think more notice, and very clear notice, should be given, so that it should be thoroughly made known to the people in the district from what places they are prohibited taking eggs. That I think will not be made known by advertisements in newspapers as thoroughly as it should be; but I think the necessary publicity would be given if notices were exhibited on houses or in schools as the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has suggested. If in Committee that Amendment were made I think it would meet the difficulty, and would be sufficient to carry out the views of those who wish to protect wild birds. I hope your Lordships will give a Second Reading to this Bill, of which, I believe, many noble Lords have already expressed approval.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday the 13th instant.

† ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION) BILL [H.L.]—(No. 52.)
COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee."

LORD SANDHURST desired to interpose a few remarks upon the Bill before the Committee stage. Lord Colchester, who, like himself, was a member of the London School Board, made a speech the other night in which he seemed to infer that the Bill was very generally desired by that Body. He was not at all convinced that the Bill was desired by those forming the majority of the London School Board who followed the lead of the Chairman. It was true that a small section was extremely anxious to see it passed into law; but, on the other hand, a large number were strongly opposed to the policy of the Bill. He objected to the Bill because he believed it would be found to be unworkable, and would tend to accelerate the strides now being made towards secular education. There were many denominations, and if all were to give distinctive religious teaching, even in a large school, the school building would have to be enlarged for the purpose of affording the accommodation that would be required. The interference with the ordinary work of the school would necessitate a re-arrangement of the time table; and the managers would be tempted to recommend the appointment of teachers, not for their qualifications as such, but because of the denominational views they might hold. He took his stand in opposing the Bill upon the compromise proposed by the late Mr. Smith and supported by the late Mr. Samuel Morley and by Professor Huxley. That compromise he regarded as a settlement of the controversy.

*LORD COLCHESTER said, what he stated on the previous occasion referred to by his noble Friend was that there was a feeling of dissatisfaction in some respects with the present position of things. It could hardly be denied that there were large numbers of people of various religious denominations who were desirous that their children should receive religious instruction of their own denomination in the schools. At the same time, he did not think the inconvenience from the number of different sects to be provided for would be as great as supposed. Many Dissenting Bodies did not attach so much value to religious teaching in day schools, though it was greatly desired by the Church of England, the Wesleyans, and others, who, as ratepayers, were as much entitled to consideration as those who differed from them.

*LORD SHAND regretted he had been unable to be present at the Second Reading, or he would then have supported the Bill. He thought it was scarcely possible to exaggerate the importance of the measure. In London at the present moment there was a considerable agitation on the subject; and as soon as the existence of the Bill and the discussions upon it became known, there was not a School Board in the country that would not be deeply interested, and there were a great many families that would take the deepest interest in its progress and results. Many years ago he came to the conclusion that the only satisfactory solution of the religious difficulty would be in carrying out some such national system as was now proposed in this Bill—namely, that there should be combined secular education supported from the rates and opportunities for separate religious instruction in every school allowed to the different religious denominations as a matter of voluntary action on their part. Much had been said as to the compromise arrived at in 1870 which was embodied in the Cowper-Temple Clause in the Education Act; but, in his opinion, too much weight had been attached to that compromise. With the advance of time the bitterness of the controversy on religious education, which made compromise necessary, had become abated; more of the spirit of tolerance prevailed now, and he submitted that the compromise of 23 years ago was not in any degree to be held binding now. And there was this further advantage, in reviewing the question at the present time, that experience had shown, as he contended, that the provision made for religious education in 1870 had not brought out satisfactory results. The total absence of all religious education in schools was a great injury to the country. What was the system now pursued? All that was done was that for a short time in each school there was a portion of Scripture read. That was not anything like a provision for religious education. Some noble Lords maintained that this was well supplemented by home training. Could anyone seriously say, with any knowledge of the homes of this country, especially of the working classes, where the parents had but little time for such duties, that there was anything like adequate home religious education given to children? It was idle to represent that there could be time for such instruction in the vast majority of working-class homes. He did not deny that without such instruction children might be brought up to speak truthfully, and to act honourably in accordance with the principles of morality; but in the view of those who supported the Bill it would add greatly to the strength of the moral lessons inculcated if they were supported by reference to the sanctions and the motives supplied by the teaching of Christian doctrines. It could not be suggested that the objection which was made to the scheme of 1870 applied to this scheme at all, because here, for the first time, the proposal was that while secular teaching alone should be thrown upon the rates, religious education should be supplied by the different religious bodies themselves. With regard to the objection that such a system was impracticable, he might mention that shortly before 1847 there was a school opened in Edinburgh by a well-known clergyman of the Free Church; but he made it a condition of admission that the children who came to the school should receive religious teaching according to the Presbyterian doctrines. The result was that a great many Roman Catholic children were left in the streets. That was considered by many as a very great injustice, and it was resolved that another school should be established, which should be conducted on quite different principles. Accordingly the United Industrial School was founded in 1847, and ever since, for nearly half-a-century, it had been successfully conducted. By the constitution of that school the subscribers generally were to pay for the secular education of the children; but the religious education which might be given was to be kept distinct, and was to be paid for by those who were interested in the particular denomination whose doctrines were to be taught. The school had subscribers among those who were regarded as extreme Liberals in politics. The late Mr. Adam Black, who was one of the staunchest Liberals in Scotland, was one of the main supporters of the school, and the noble Lord (the Earl of Rosebery), who conducted the foreign affairs of this country, had been, and was still, its President, and took the deepest interest in its welfare. Mr. Donald Crawford, the Member for North-East Lanarkshire, and Mr. Wallace, the Member for East Edinburgh, were also supporters of the school. The various Reports showed again and again, from the day on which the school was founded until the present time, that its Chairman and Directors had expressed the strongest conviction that in the principle of securing for the children common secular and separate religious education, if fairly carried out, would be found the ultimate solution of the educational difficulty. This was no small or recent experiment: the matter had gone beyond the region of experiment. There were 54 schools in Birmingham also, in almost every one of which religious instruction had been carried on for a period of 20 years precisely in the way which was proposed by the Bill, and with general satisfaction. With regard to the objections that had been urged against the Bill, not one of the noble Lords who had spoken against it had denied, so far as he understood, that the measure would be a desirable one if it could be practically carried out. It had been suggested that it would be likely to stir up religious animosity, and thus hinder the work of education; but he believed the tendency of the measure would be in quite the other direction. As long as this whole question was left undetermined there would be contention and agitation about it. But if, by a measure like that before their Lordships, the different denominations obtained the absolute right to have religious teaching in the schools on their own suggestion and at their own expense, an end would be put to the present unsettled and unsatisfactory state of things.

He saw nothing whatever in the measure calculated to foment or raise religious animosity. Another objection urged against the Bill was that, if passed, it would lead to some question or difficulty with denominational schools. He ventured to think that no such question would arise; but, even were it probable, this objection was not a good reason for rejecting a measure good in itself, and any such point could be dealt with when it arose. He appealed to noble Lords who had opposed the Bill to re-consider the matter. He believed it was possible to effectively carry out the scheme proposed, and he thought he had shown this by the illustrations he had given. If this measure was passed they would strengthen the hands of the Education Department in resisting demands for founding denominational schools in future. It might now be said in support of such demands that children could not get the religious teaching they required within the particular district or parish. That plea would be at once taken away by the adoption of this Bill. Public opinion had been maturing for a long time in the direction of the measure. Reference was made on the last occasion when the Bill was before their Lordships to a passage written by Dr. Martineau, in which he stated that he was willing to accept a Bill of this kind, and would hail it; and allusion had also been made to Mr. Huxley's views. It might be interesting to their Lordships to know that his esteemed friend Mr. Huxley, who was opposed to the proposal then before the London School Board, thoroughly approved the scheme of the Bill. It was substantially a Liberal measure, and was supported, as he had shown, by many eminent Liberals. The Bill would confer on Roman Catholics benefits to which they were justly entitled. In due course he presumed the Bill would go to the other House; and it was hardly to be supposed that the Roman Catholic Members, especially the Representatives from Ireland, would refuse on any grounds to support a measure which would give their Church equal privileges with the Church of England and other Churches in the United Kingdom. He earnestly hoped that, for the various reasons he had given, the Bill would be passed. He felt he ought not, in justice to himself, having so long held the views he had now stated, to remain silent in the discussion of so important a subject.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, that, so far from this being a new system or an experiment, it had been carried on, at all events as far as Ireland was concerned, and to a great degree successfully, for more than 50 years. Lord Stanley then established there a National system of education which was founded on the principle of separate religious and united secular teaching, and there seemed no reason why a measure of the kind should not be applied to England. In Ireland it had certainly had the most excellent effect, though, no doubt, some of the most intolerant had refused to accept it. It was extraordinary, with the noble Earl's great knowledge of this question, that he should not have been aware how long this system had existed in Ireland. No doubt the Roman Catholic clergy would like to have no religious teaching but their own; the system had, however, down to this time, been more or less carried out by the School Boards in Ireland; and he hoped their Lordships would adopt it for this country.

Motion agreed to: House in Committee accordingly.

Clauses 1 to 4, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 5.

*LORD LINGEN wished to make a few remarks on this and the previous clause. He said the scope of the Bill appeared to have been misapprehended by some of the noble Lords who had spoken in support of it. It was merely with reference to Board Schools, and no others, to provide for religious instruction being given in them. The distinction should be borne in mind between the object of providing for denominational religious instruction under certain conditions and the means prescribed for effecting that object. Those means he could not but regard as unfortunate, and he believed that the Bill would be received in another place as a challenge. Whatever might be the merits or demerits of the Cowper-Temple Clause, it had produced, on the whole for 23 years religious peace, though he did not desire to stand up as a very ardent advocate of it. In 1870 it was considered that the field was already mainly occupied by denominational schools; and, in the first instance, the Board schools were represented to Parliament as a supplement to the general system. Accordingly, the Cowper-Temple Clause was adopted as a compromise rather than that the schools should provide for united secular education and separate religious instruction. The Report of Lord Cross's Commission on the provision for religious instruction in Boards Schools was, on the whole, favourable. This Bill did not deal, as it might be possible to deal, with the difficulties attending denominational education, which should, as far as possible, he thought, be met by separate schools. He deprecated the interference with the management of Board schools, which would be sanctioned by the clause, and suggested that provision for the religious teaching which the right rev. Prelate in charge of the measure desired to promote should be made in some different way. For instance, the position of denominational schools, as compared with that of Board schools, might be improved, and in that way the extension of religious teaching might be promoted.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL): My Lords, I cannot help saying that I do not recognise, in the instances which have been cited, anything like precedents for the provisions of this Bill. A case has been referred to in which two Committees were appointed, one Protestant and the other Roman Catholic, to see that the children received religious teaching according to which religion they belonged; but, as I gather, there was no provision for separate Presbyterian teaching, and children of that denomination received teaching of a general Protestant character. In the first place, I would point out that this is not a Bill dealing with all schools. It is, if I may say so without offence, an extremely partisan Bill. It insists upon provision being made for religious teaching at the instance of parents of a few children attending at the Board schools, but it makes no such provision as regards the vast number of denominational schools, which in many parts of the country are the only schools to which it is possible for parents to send their children. I venture to say the Bill is a partisan measure, because it deals with Board schools only and does not apply to voluntary denominational schools, which are partly supported out of rates, and in many of which there might be a demand made for religious instruction of a different kind than is supplied. The right rev. Prelate is apparently only alive to injustice when it affects those who belong to the Church to which he belongs himself; he sees no injustice in the fact that in localities where there are no Board schools children whose parents belong to one denomination have often to attend schools where the religious instruction of a different denomination is given. I should not be surprised if the ultimate result of the proposal in the clause were to diminish the amount of religious teaching imparted in Board schools, and make the education secular only. A large number of schools in this country teach, I believe simply and briefly, the truths which are held in common by Churchmen and Nonconformists alike. That instruction is given to all the children. Would it be a gain to religious teaching for many of them that you substitute special religious teaching for those who are not of that denomination, but who, if the parents care enough about it, can receive that teaching at home or on Sundays? While this system might secure to a limited number of children a little more Church-teaching, it would, I think, result in leaving a vast number of children who most need it without religious teaching at all. The children who most need some kind of religious instruction in the schools are those whose parents, as a general rule, care nothing about the character of such instruction. In a vast number of the Board Schools there is, as I have said, religious teaching given, which, though it may not be the religious teaching of any particular denomination, is religious teaching to which a vast majority of laymen, whether Churchmen or Nonconformists, could take no exception. That teaching simply consists of the truths which are held in common by Churchmen and the great mass of Nonconformists alike. The instruction is given to all the children alike, and I ask whether it would be a gain if you were to substitute teaching of the special tenets of any sect. My belief is, as I have said, that in the case of children whose parents care enough about the matter special religious teaching is secured to them by giving it on Sundays rather than on week days. This Bill, therefore, if carried into law would, I believe, strike a vital blow at the religious teaching in schools for the children who most need such instruction.

*THE BISHOP OF SALISBURY expressed surprise that the Bill had been spoken of by the noble and learned Lord as a partisan measure. If it had been drawn specially in the interests of the Church of England, he would have put in "twenty children" instead of "five children" as the number for whom separate provision might be made. But he considered that his position as Bishop required him to be true to the first principles of religion rather than to the special tenets of the Church with which he was connected—that was to say, in this case to freedom of conscience. The noble and learned Lord, in speaking of voluntary schools, said they were supported out of the public rates. That was not the case.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Then I withdraw "rates" and substitute "grants." I believe that 74 per cent. of the cost is defrayed by grants.

THE BISHOP OF SALISBURY said, that those schools had been built at enormous cost, and were kept up at great expense—a burden which fell entirely on the shoulders of the promoters of the voluntary schools, who did not possess the privilege of borrowing capital like the Board schools, when improvements were suddenly demanded.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX thought that the noble and learned Lord could hardly have made himself acquainted with what had recently taken place in the London School Board when he spoke of this measure being extremely injurious to the cause of religious education in Board schools throughout the country. The religious teaching which was given under the London School Board was founded on the compromise arranged by the late Mr. W. H. Smith and Mr. Samuel Morley on the basis of the Cowper-Temple Clause, which was intended to secure the teaching of the Christian religion in Board schools. What was the fact at present? In the case of a very large number of children compelled to go to the London Board schools, it was found that the elementary truths of the Christian religion were neglected in a manner which would surprise the noble and learned Lord. But when, in view of this state of things, certain gentlemen, who believed that the teaching of religion in the schools of the country was a matter of vital importance, asked that the provisions of the Cowper-Temple Clause should be honestly carried out, that the doctrines of the Atonement and the Divinity of our Lord should be taught in the Board schools, they were met by an outcry that it would inflict an injustice on a large number of ratepayers—Jews, Unitarians, and persons of other denominations. It had been conclusively proved, however, that the compromise established as between the members of the Church and the Nonconformists had now drifted into a supposed compromise between Christians and non-Christians. The School Boards throughout the country were professing to give instruction in the Christian religion, but they were doing nothing of the kind. Take the case of Wales, for example; the great majority of the schools there gave no religious teaching whatever, or very little, and we ought not now to refuse to provide that necessary religious teaching should be given under our great national system of education.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE intimated his intention to vote for Clause 5, if it was opposed, though he very much regretted that any occasion had arisen for the revival of this controversy. The existence of dangers had been referred to, but the dangers were not all on one side. Unless something was done to satisfy the religious feelings of the community in the matter of education their Lordships might depend upon it that their whole system of public education, sooner or later, would be endangered. It seemed to him that, as far as it went, the Bill would give relief from this danger. It would relieve the Board schools from what otherwise might be great difficulties in their way. The principle of the Bill seemed to him to be absolutely just. He regretted that this question had arisen; but as it had been raised, he should vote for the Bill, especially as their Lordships had already affirmed the principle of the Bill.

LORD SHAND moved, in page 2, line 13, to leave out from ("teach") to the end of the sub-section. Their Lordships would understand that the Amendments he proposed were of a friendly character, with the view to improve the Bill and not to injure it in any way. The result of the clause as it stood would be to invite inquiry into the competency of the teacher to be a religious instructor, and he was afraid that implied examining him as to his religious belief. That would be objectionable, and would injure the Bill when it got to the other House of Parliament.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 13, to leave out from ("teach") to the end of the sub-section.—(The Lord Shand.)

THE BISHOP OF SALISBURY accepted the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD SHAND moved, in line 18, after ("incompetence"), to insert

("(d.) No part of the expense rendered necessary by any arrangement for giving separate religious instruction shall be paid from the funds of the School Board, but such expense shall be provided for to the satisfaction of the Board by the persons making application to have such arrangement made.")

As provision was made in the Bill that the religious instruction might be given either within or outside the school-house, it might be necessary to pay for separate rooms, and such expense must not fall on the rates; and it seemed only right and proper, also, that where the school-rooms were used for that purpose, it should be in the power of the School Board to make a charge.

THE BISHOP OF SALISBURY asked whether it was really necessary to discuss this point, as it seemed a small matter?

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE said that, if rooms had to be hired, it would be against principle for the expense to be thrown on the School Board, but the Amendment would not apply where the schoolroom was used, unless some extra expense was incurred.

LORD SHAND agreed that the noble and learned Lord had expressed the meaning of the clause, and that the question of payment would only arise if any extra cost was incurred. No injustice must be done to the rate-payers. With regard to the difficulty which had been suggested of getting the children to attend the religious instruction, his information from Birmingham was that all the children in the schools there did attend it. They certainly did not absent themselves by their parents' desire.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I venture to suggest that we are not discussing here the position of the Birmingham schools or School Board. The Birmingham School Board will be in precisely the same position after this Bill has passed, if it does pass, as it is in now.

Amendment agreed to.

THE BISHOP OF SALISBURY moved the following words as a new sub-section (e):—

("No teacher already employed in the school by the Board shall give religious instruction under this section without the consent of the Board or the managers.")

It had been thought that perhaps as a religious teacher there might be nominated, by parents, the master of a school. That appeared to be a serious objection, and it was thought better, therefore, to propose this sub-section to avoid any strain being put on the relations between the managers and the staff. It would serve as an interpretation upon the provision in Section A that the religious teacher might be a teacher in the school provided the Board approved.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: It seems to me by implication to say that you may employ one of the teachers in the Board school for this purpose provided he is not already appointed at the time of the passing of this Act as manager.

THE BISHOP OF SALISBURY thought it conveyed exactly the opposite.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE said, this was intended to meet the objection that there would otherwise be an unlimited power of appointing persons who were teachers in the school; which ought to be subject to the consent of the Board or managers. It seemed to him that this was a distinct improvement.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 agreed to.

Clause 7.

LORD SHAND moved, in page 2, line 36, after ("board") to insert—

("On payment of a charge sufficient to meet the expense of printing such forms, where the same shall be printed.")

This was a trifling matter, no doubt, but it was just one of those trifles which sometimes aroused people.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee: and to be printed as amended. (No. 122.)

IRELAND (COUNTY LIMERICK).

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

*THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY called attention to the condition of County Limerick; and asked Her Majesty's Government what steps they propose to take to deal with the unsatisfactory state of that county? He said their Lordships would remember three months ago he brought under the notice of the House the serious condition of the County of Clare, and called upon Her Majesty's Government to say what steps they proposed to take with reference to the appalling condition of that county. On that occasion Her Majesty's Government did not attempt to soar into the higher regions of anything approaching statesmanship; but they contented themselves with responding to his arguments by the crude and schoolboy retort, the well-known tu quoque. They said the county was not in a more unsatisfactory condition than it had been under the former Government. On this occasion, with reference to the County Limerick, such a tu quoque was absolutely impossible. He defied anyone to say that Limerick was in an unsatisfactory condition when Mr. Morley undertook the government of the country. On that point he would make a quotation from a Charge delivered by Mr. Justice O'Brien at Limerick Assizes on the 11th of July, 1892, a short time before Mr. Gladstone came into power. The learned Judge said—

"Almost all forms of exception to the ordinary state of society in the County Limerick in reference to the violation of the law have, I may say, entirely disappeared. Life is more secure, not only against violence, but against the menace or the apprehension of violence; property is more secure from all forms of invasion or interference; and all forms of social relations are relieved from the burden of that intolerable restraint upon personal liberty with which, unhappily, we have been too long familiar in this country."

It was, therefore, no exaggeration to say that when Mr. Morley undertook the government of Ireland the county was in a satisfactory condition; now it was not in a satisfactory condition, but it was in a state of absolute lawlessness. He read with some surprise a statement made by Mr. Morley in the House of Commons a few days ago. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"Excepting in two bad areas I should regard the state of the Counties of Clare, Kerry, and Limerick as not any more serious, but as less serious at the present moment than it was when the present Government acceded to Office."

With that statement he joined issue; he gave it the flattest contradiction; and he hoped he should, from Mr. Morley's own mouth, make out his case that Limerick was in a most unsatisfactory condition compared with what it was when the present Government came into power. It ought ever to be remembered that Mr. Morley possessed the aid and support of very powerful auxiliaries in his endeavour to maintain law and order in Ireland. He had at his back the priests and both sections of the Nationalist Party, and their Lordships could at once discern where the fault lay when there existed the present state of lawlessness. The machinery was there, but it was not used. The Government were responsible, because, in defiance of warnings and in defiance of the fact that there had been the most palpable miscarriage of justice, they utterly refused to apply the remedy. In proof of his statement that Limerick was at present in an unsatisfactory and lawless condition he quoted from the Charge of Mr. Justice Gibson delivered in March last. Mr. Justice Gibson stated that—

"Although there was no form of the worst crime, such as murder, or attempt to murder, nevertheless there is in the Police Returns evidence of crime, and of a very formidable state of affairs. There has been an increase of specially reported crime of a very substantial character. The number this year was 81, as against 54 last year. His Lordship was by no means an alarmist, and he trusted that the apprehensions he might be induced to feel from reading these colourless Reports might be perhaps shown not to be warranted by the result in the future."

He would deal with the future later. At the time he delivered that Charge the learned Judge was referring to the following crimes committed in the county:—Twenty cases of arson, ten of moonlighting, two of firing at the person, ten of malicious injuries to property, nine of killing, cutting, and maiming cattle, and two cases of intimidation. Since that Charge there had been one murder, seven cases of arson, one of attempted arson, seven cases of moonlighting, including the case of Quirke, whom they beat about the head; his son, whom they shot in the legs; and Brosnan, whom they beat about the head. He found that Mr. Morley stated that—

“The number of moonlighting outrages committed in Limerick between August 22, 1892—that was when Mr. Gladstone assumed the reins of Government—and April 30th, 1893, was 17, of which nine were agrarian and eight non-agrarian. In the corresponding months of 1891-2 there was but one case of moonlighting in the county.”

He wished to know—and here he was addressing himself specially to the noble Earl opposite (Earl Spencer), who on two occasions had represented Her Majesty in Ireland—how many of the men who were concerned in the 17 cases of moonlighting had been laid by the heels; and what was the course the Government proposed to take with them? Also, what was meant by “agrarian” and what by “non-agrarian” moonlighting? He had no doubt non-agrarian moonlighting meant raiding for arms or attacking houses; but, having looked with considerable care through the Returns in regard to agrarian outrages when he (Earl Spencer) was responsible as Viceroy for the government of Ireland, he found that raiding for arms and attacks on houses were included in agrarian outrages. But whether they were called agrarian or non-agrarian, these attacks on houses showed a condition of lawlessness very different to the condition which prevailed when Mr. Morley undertook the government of the country. To say that this lawlessness was confined to one small area was no excuse whatever; because, in that case, if the proper machinery were used, the perpetrators ought to be all the more easily detected and arrested. He knew well that in 1887 the condition of Limerick was very nearly as bad as that with which the Government now had to deal. And here he would again quote a Judge of Assize. Mr. Justice Johnson, on March 4, 1887, said—

“It is quite idle for us to shut our eyes and say there is peace where there is no peace while these things are going on throughout the country. In these nine cases no single person has been made amenable. . . . This state of things is disorder of the worst possible character. I hope it is not sympathy. I believe it is vastly more terror than sympathy, for people whose peaceful homes are invaded in the darkness of the night are probably greatly apprehensive that the next visit may not leave them as it left them before. It is my duty to remark this, not to point out any remedy. I can only say that the lawless state of the county shows no improvement.”

That was about the time when that politician, Sir G. Trevelyan, who, however able he might be, had not shown he possessed the gift either of consistency or perspicuity, enunciated the idea that the game of law and order was up in Ireland. All he could say was—Thank God they had Mr. Arthur Balfour and not Sir G. Trevelyan in power! Mr. Balfour lost no time in introducing a Crimes Act, with the result which he had already described. It was perfectly possible, by judging the statistics of crime alone, to know whether a Crimes Act was in force or not, for the simple reason that when it was not crime increased almost with the regularity of a barometer. In 1880 there were 123 cases of agrarian crime in the County of Limerick; in 1881 there were 190. That was the year of Mr. Gladstone's famous Suspects' Act. In the next year—1882—when Mr. Gladstone brought in his famous Crimes Act, they fell to 126. In 1883 there were 54 cases; 1884, 49; in 1885 they rose to 61, for the simple reason that the Crimes Act lapsed; in 1886 they rose to 67. In 1887 Mr. Balfour introduced his Crimes Act, with the result, although it was the latter part of the year, that crimes dropped to 57 cases; in 1888, to 34; in 1889, to 25; in 1890, to 26; in 1891, to 17; while in 1892 they rose to 26. In the first half of that year, when Lord Salisbury's Government was responsible, the number was less than in the latter half. The reason of that was that convictions were obtained in the Crimes Courts in the county. He did not know why the noble Earl (Earl Spencer), who administered the law with so much courage and impartiality, did not now insist on the law being administered in the same spirit which he formerly displayed. In 1887 he found there were 18 convictions; in 1888, 94; in 1889 there were 33; in 1890 they were 7; while in the last two years of the Marquess of Salisbury's administration of English and Irish affairs not a single Crimes Court was held, for there was no necessity for them, and there was, consequently, not a single conviction. When a Crimes Act was in force in Ireland and administered with firmness and impartiality crime had invariably decreased. Serious crime between 1887 and 1892 was dealt with in the same firm and fearless manner by the Irish Executive taking advantage of the power to change the venue. In Limerick, according to Mr. Morley himself, the total number of cases in which orders for change of venue and special juries were made in that period was 41. These cases, which all proceeded to trial, affected 65 accused persons, of whom 28 were convicted. The noble Lord who represented the Irish Office in that House said that by change of venue you might get special juries, but how would you get better witnesses? There was not a man who had any experience of Ireland who did not know that the evidence given out of the county in which crime was committed was very different from the evidence which would be given in the county, because out of the county the witness was free from surveillance, espionage, and intimidation. The noble Earl opposite (Earl Spencer) knew that most of the crime in Ireland had been stopped because juries in other counties, to which the venue had been changed, were found willing to convict. He would quote various cases in which convictions had thus been obtained. From Clare, in 1890, cases were tried at Sligo, with the result that fair sentences were passed. Timothy Lalor got penal servitude for life for firing at the person; Denis Cooney, James Cooney, Martin Moloney, John Hurst, and Cornelius Howard, convicted of firing at James Donnelan, got 20 years' penal servitude; John Neylan and Thomas Tudhy got two years for moonlighting; and so on. Then with regard to Kerry cases. In his (Lord Londonderry's) Viceroyalty, Kirby and Conmane were found guilty at Wicklow for the murder of Quirke, May 7, 1888; Hayes and Moriarty were convicted at Wicklow of the murder of James Fitzmaurice March 29, 1888; Leulan, found guilty at Maryborough of the murder of Robinson, the schoolmaster, July 18, 1888; while in Earl Spencer's Viceroyalty Patrick Walsh, tried at Dublin before Mr. Justice Lawson, August 21, 1882, for the murder of Martin Lyden, of Letterfrack, was sentenced to be hanged August 22; his brother, Michael Walsh, was sentenced in Dublin to be hanged for the murder of Constable Kavanagh at Letterfrack September 29, 1882; and the Lough mask murderers were found guilty of the murder of the Huddys December 13, 1882. He would be glad to know why Mr. Gladstone had gone back from his own words? Mr. Gladstone said on April 8, 1886—

"In the first place, with certain exceptions, for the case of winter juries, it is impossible to depend upon the finding of a jury in a case of agrarian crime according to the facts as they are viewed by the Government, by the Judges, and by the public, I think, at large."

He should be glad to know why, therefore, Mr. Gladstone did not insist upon Mr. Morley reviving change of venue? Since the O'Hagan Jury Act there had never been a conviction in any important agrarian case before a common jury, and, consequently, the repeal of the jury and venue sections of the Crimes Act was a declaration of immunity for that class of crime. He had proved beyond doubt that the condition of the County Limerick was unsatisfactory and lawless at present, and he now asked the Government to give the House some definite idea of what they were going to do. To restore law and order nothing but a revival of the clauses enabling the Government to change the venue of trials could be of any avail. He asked, were they going to allow the present state of things to continue? Mr. Morley said—

"The only steps I propose to take are to continue those I have already taken—namely, to rely on the vigilance of the police, which has been attended by a decline of agrarian crime in two out of three of the counties mentioned."

A more miserable answer was never given by a responsible Minister. He had been told in March that police were going to be drafted into the County Clare. But what was the use of the police in Clare? Since March 2 there had been in Clare six cases of moonlighting, four of firing at the person (including the case of Mr. Blood, which was fresh in their Lordships' recollection), one of intimidation, one of attack on the person, one of maiming cattle, and four of incendiary fires. He would read a telegram dated Ennis, just received, which had been put into his hands—

"About noon to-day Weldon Moloney, solicitor, Dublin, agent to Moloney trustees in this county, was fired at and wounded near Tullas, close to where Perry was shot."

Were the Government going to take no steps to put an end to such a state of things? Mr. Morley said the other day—

"He thought that denouncing in this case pointed an individual out to public disapproval. If it led to overt acts, or if the denunciation was so directed to the individual in question as to intimidate him in the exercise of his legal rights then the Government would interfere."

Well, he would tell them at once of a case in which they ought to interfere. At a meeting held at Coore, West Clare, a few days ago, the following resolution was passed:—

"That we again call on all good and earnest Nationalists to assist us in putting down land-grabbing."

And the newspaper from which the resolution was quoted added—

"Pat Donnellan, of Dunogan, and Pat Mungovan, of Clounlaheen, were censured—the former for intercourse and intimacy with the grabber Sexton, and the latter for his connection with the aiders and abettors of the grabber. Other matters of an important nature were discussed, the consideration of which was adjourned to next meeting, when it is expected the parties concerned will be present.—Michael McMahon, Hon. Sec."

That was published in the newspaper United Ireland, 20th May, 1893. As he came into the House a paper was put into his hand, in which it was stated that if a certain grabber persisted he would be denounced by name, and a circular would be sent out calling upon all patriotic Irishmen to have no dealings with him. Another meeting was also held at which a so-called land-grabber was denounced, and that meeting was presided over by Mr. J. Clunes, who had been recently appointed a J.P. for Limerick by Mr. Morley. He wished Mr. Morley joy of his new man. What he wanted to know was this: Was Mr. Morley going to redeem his pledge or not? Was he going to prosecute these people or not? He had a right to demand an answer to that question. There was no use in telling him that, in order to restore peace and order in Limerick, the Government were going to draft in a certain number of policemen. The conduct of Her Majesty's Government would be far more straightforward if they got up and said that they intended to take no steps; that they intended to truckle to the Leaders of the Nationalist Party, in the House of Commons, and that they meant to hand over the loyal inhabitants of Clare, Kerry, and Limerick to the tender mercies of the moonlighters and boycotters, and not go through the farce of pretending to do something when they were doing nothing that could be of any use for protecting either their lives or their property. He addressed himself to the noble Earl opposite (Earl Spencer) more especially, because his Lordship was constantly referred to and quoted in the House as a great authority on Irish matters, and because he knew that nothing would be done in Ireland without the noble Earl's sanction. Still more, he knew that without the noble Earl's approbation the Home Rule Bill could never have been introduced. He called upon the noble Earl to reply, either then or on the following day, to the charges and statements he had made. If Her Majesty's Government were content to remain silent, torpid, apathetic, and indifferent to the misery and crime that prevailed in Limerick; if they refused to avail themselves of the powers they had in their hands and could exercise if they had only the courage to do so for dealing with such a state of things as he had shown to exist, then on them must be the responsibility of every outrage and crime that might yet be perpetrated—on their shoulders must rest the responsibility of the blood of every unfortunate victim who might be assassinated. If they refused, they would undertake a responsibility which no honest man would undertake. He thanked God with all his heart that he could look back to the time when he was in office in Ireland and say—as all his colleagues could say—that no weight of responsibility of so horrible, disastrous, and bloodthirsty a character could ever be laid at their doors.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Are we to expect no reply?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: We are waiting to know whether the Debate is to be adjourned.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The noble Earl wants to know whether the Debate is to be adjourned. The speech of my noble Friend behind me no doubt requires a great deal of digestion, and time must, I suppose, be taken for that purpose. Besides, I understand that a discussion on the subject is going on in the House of Commons, and I dare say noble Lords opposite would find it convenient to ascertain before they reply what Mr. Morley has said, so as to avoid any unpleasant discrepancies. Under those circumstances, if noble Lords opposite will not do so, I am prepared to take upon myself the responsibility of moving the Adjournment of the Debate. That would be a convenient arrangement, for I understand there are several Irish Peers who wish to address the House on the question, and I am quite sure that if the reply of the noble Earl opposite is to be measured by the mass of Papers in his hands, it must occupy a considerable time. I move the Adjournment of the Debate, and I suppose that it may have precedence over the Business for to-morrow.

Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned, and that it have precedence over the Business for to-morrow."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My noble Friend is perfectly ready to give the answer now, and we are certainly not open to the remarks of the noble Marquess. Probably, as other Peers wish to address the House, my noble Friend would like to hear more upon the subject. As to the figments of the noble Marquess, they may be very convenient jokes at the moment, but we know that they have no foundation in fact.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I entirely sympathise with the noble Earl, and I think it would be inconvenient that it should become a precedent for one speech to be made and the Debate then adjourned interfering with the business of the next evening. Quite admitting that the practice should not be made a precedent, I think that course would on the present occasion be very convenient.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I do not think the business for to-morrow will throw any obstacle in the way, and I have no objection to the Adjournment of the Debate.

Motion agreed to.

Debate further adjourned till To-morrow.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDER (POOR LAW) BILL (by Order).—(No. 343.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Bill be now read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee of Five Members, Three to be nominated by the House and Two by the Committee of Selection.

That the Petitions already presented against the Bill, and any Petitions presented by the London County Council against the Bill, three clear days before the meeting of the Committee be referred to the Committee, and that such of the Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, Agents, or Witnesses, be heard upon their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill against such Petitions.

That the Committee have power to send for papers, persons, and records.

That Four be the quorum."—(Mr. Benn.)

Question put, and agreed to.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

WATER PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 2) BILL (by Order).

INSTRUCTION TO COMMITTEE.

MR. EDWARDS (Radnorshire) said, he had on the Paper a Motion affecting this Water Order, which was included in a Provisional Order dealing with two other Water Bills. His objection to the Provisional Order passing in its present form was that if the opposition to one of the Water Bills happened to be successful it would involve the loss of all three Bills. It was, therefore, desired that the Llandrindod Bill should be put into a separate Order. The promoters of the Bill had issued a statement against that course being taken; but that statement went into the merits of the Bill itself, which he did not propose to deal with that day, preferring to leave that for a subsequent opportunity, which would arise if his proposal were agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to divide the Water Provisional Orders (No. 2) Bill into two portions, one comprising the Llandrindod Wells Water Order, the other comprising the Maidenhead Water Order and the Newington Water Order, and to report them separately to the House."—(Mr. Edwards.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.) expressed his surprise at the absence of the President of the Board of Trade, there being no one present, consequently, to inform the House what course the Department advised should be taken on this proposal.

MR. EDWARDS: I ought, perhaps, to have said that the Board of Trade offer no objection to it.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he was anxious to know the exact position of the Board of Trade in reference to it. This Provisional Order contained three Bills. On the Second Reading the hon. Member for Radnorshire (Mr. Edwards) objected to one of the Bills. He was perfectly within his right in doing so; but the President of the Board of Trade very naturally told him that that was not the proper time to object, and that the place to discuss local matters of that kind was before the Select Committee. The Second Reading was passed after a Division by a considerable majority, and the Provisional Order had now been referred to a Select Committee. He did not quite understand what was the object of his hon. Friend in making this Motion. If the Government thought it well that the Provisional Order should be separated, and the Llandrindod Bill dealt with by a Select Committee, he could quite understand that that would be a legitimate course to take. But he understood that what the hon. Member wanted to do was to get the Provisional Order separated, so that on the Third Reading he might maintain his objection to the Llandrindod Bill. That, he submitted, was not a fair, nor was it the customary, way of dealing with these local matters. The hon. Member and his friends ought to have petitioned against the Bill, in order that their objections might be dealt with by the Select Committee. But they had not done so. Now, he wanted a clear understanding as to what the Department responsible for the Bill desired to have done; and, in order to secure that, he would formally move the Adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

*THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (Mr. MELLOR, York, W.R., Sowerby) said, he thought he could satisfy the right hon. Gentleman. He could quite understand the desire that the Llandrindod Order should be dealt with separately; and if the Motion, which he believed under the circumstances to be a reasonable one, were adopted, he proposed, under the Standing Order, to move that the Bill should be sent to a Select Committee as an opposed Bill, in order that the objections might be therein-vestigated. He should not allow it to be taken as an ordinary unopposed Bill, as that would probably be unfair to the persons concerned.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.) explained that the President of the Board of Trade was detained on Public Business; but he was authorised to state that the Government concurred in the course which had been indicated by the Chairman of Ways and Means. Their intention was that the Bill should be duly investigated upstairs, and they would deprecate any such course being followed as the right hon. Baronet seemed to think possible under the Resolution. As one or two hon. Members felt strongly about this Bill, it was desirable that it should go before a Select Committee, which would have power to take evidence upon it.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: If that can be done I will ask leave to withdraw my Motion. I understand, however, that no Petitions have been presented against the Bill; and I will ask you, Mr.

Speaker, if under those circumstances the Bill could, as suggested, be sent to a Select Committee?

*MR. SPEAKER: I have no doubt that the course indicated by the Chairman of Ways and Means is one which can be adopted.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: If the right hon. Baronet has any doubt, I am quite prepared to consent to the Motion for Adjournment in order that he may be satisfied.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH; I have no wish to delay the Bill. I am quite content with what has been said, and I beg to ask leave to withdraw my Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee to divide the Water Provisional Orders (No. 2) Bill into two portions, one comprising the Llandrindod Wells Water Order, the other comprising the Maidenhead Water Order and the Newington Water Order, and to report them separately to the House.—Mr. Edwards.)

QUESTIONS.

SPECIAL SERVICE PENSIONS.

COLONEL KENYON - SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the issue of special service pensions has been suspended; and, if so, why, and when it will be resumed; whether he is aware that over 600 cases have been investigated and prepared; whether, in view of the urgent needs of the applicants, he will take steps to at once resume the issue; whether the issue of such pensions to residents in the Colonies has been prohibited; and, if so, why; and whether he will consider the expediency of issuing a warrant which will cover all such cases, and so save the loss of time and the amount of investigation involved in the present system?

MR. LENG (Dundee): I will, at the same time, ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can now state what number of special pensions will be granted during the current financial year to the Crimean and Indian Mutiny veterans in infirm health and indigent circumstances?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): I am glad to say that we have been able to add to the sum already available for the special pensions for the Crimea and Indian Mutiny a further amount of £5,000. This will enable the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital to deal with the more urgent cases among the applications which have been received. I am not disposed to insist upon the exclusion of claims from men resident in the Colonies; but naturally cases at home will have some priority. The pensions being subject to these limits it is not advisable to deal with them by Warrant.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY: How many additional cases will be dealt with under this extra grant?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The £5,000 will provide for 371 pensions; and when all are given it is estimated that 400 cases will remain undealt with. That is including the vacancies under the previous sums.

CHAPLAINS IN THE MEDITERRANEAN SQUADRON.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty how many Protestant Chaplains are attached to the Mediterranean Squadron, how many men they have each under their charge, and what their salaries are; whether it is the case that there is only one Roman Catholic Chaplain attached to the squadron, and that he has about 1,000 men under his charge; what his salary is; whether he lives on shore and only visits the ships occasionally, the men being scattered in different ships, and his work being thus very difficult; what provision there is for the ministrations of the Roman Catholic Chaplain while the ships are cruising; whether the present Chaplain is of Maltese nationality, and whether he is aware that there is a strong desire amongst the sailors for a Chaplain of their own nationality; and whether the Government will consider the advisability of appointing additional Roman Catholic Chaplains of British or Irish nationality?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee): There are 13 Chaplains on the Mediterranean Station (including Malta Dockyard), whose total salaries amount to £3,084, or an average of £237 a year each. The total complement of the ships is 8,721, about 80 per cent. (i.e. 6,976) belong to the Church of England. A Roman Catholic Priest at Malta receives £80 a year for ministering to the Roman Catholics of the ships in that port, and also to the prison. He resides on shore, but Malta Harbour presents no difficulty as regards visiting ships. Another Roman Catholic Priest receives £40 a year for ministrations at the Naval Hospital at Malta, and the Roman Catholic Priest at Gibraltar is paid by Capitation Grant. The total number of Roman Catholics in the Mediterranean Squadron is about 750. When ships are in port elsewhere than at Malta, where facilities exist, on Sundays arrangements are made for landing the men to attend Mass. Since the appointment of the present Roman Catholic Priest at Malta, who is a Maltese, the Admiralty have become aware of the existence of a wish among the Roman Catholic officers and men of the Squadron to have a Chaplain of their own nationality, and consideration will be shown to this desire when an opportunity occurs. There is no intention of appointing additional Roman Catholic chaplains in the Mediterranean.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: May I ask what the hon. Gentleman means by the words "when opportunity occurs?"

MR. E. ROBERTSON: In the case of a vacancy arising.

INOCULATION AGAINST ANTHRAX.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to a statement, published in The Pioneer Mail, of Allahabad, that M. Pasteur has expressed, through the Secretary of State, his willingness to send out one of his experts, with the object of introducing vaccine for the prevention or mitigation of anthrax into India; whether he is aware that Pasteur's vaccine for anthrax has been officially declared, in a Report of the Local Government Board of London, "perfectly ineffective" for the purpose proposed; and whether it is true, as stated in The Times of India, that two animals have been "flayed alive" before a public audience in Calcutta; and, if so, whether there are any means of restraining such proceedings in future?

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL, North Beds): Yes, Sir; M. Pasteur's offer to send out a qualified investigator has been accepted by the Government of India. The Secretary of State cannot trace the words quoted by the hon. Member from a Report of the Local Government Board. As to the alleged flaying alive of animals, the Secretary of State has no information, nor has he been able to find a statement quoted in The Times of India. The attention of the Government of India was called last Autumn to the desirability of legislating on the lines of the English Act of 1876 for restricting experiments on living animals.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD: Will further inquiry be made with respect to the flaying alive?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: Yes, Sir.

SIR H. ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): I wish to ask the Secretary to the Local Government Board a question of which I have given him private notice. It is whether it is not a fact that the Report referred to in the question is 11 years old; that since that time Pasteur's system of inoculation against anthrax has been so much improved that many thousands of animals have been successfully inoculated in France and other countries, with the result that the cattle plague is now rapidly disappearing from places where it had been prevalent for years?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Sir W. FOSTER, Derby, Ilkeston): The Report in question is, I believe, 11 years old. As representing the Local Government Board, I have no official knowledge of the statements made by the hon. Member; but I believe, from personal inquiry, that they are correct.

QUACK MEDICINE ADVERTISEMENTS.

MR. BOULNOIS (Marylebone, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he can take any steps to prevent the face of the country being disfigured by the advertisements of vendors of quack medicines and unguents?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden): I share the views of the hon. Member with regard to the inartistic results of the practice in question; but I have no power to interfere in the matter, and I cannot say that I am surprised that owners and occupiers of agricultural lands should, under existing circumstances, be unable to resist the temptations offered to them by advertisement contractors.

MR. BOULNOIS: If the farmers take to cultivating crops of pictorial and other advertisements, will the right hon. Gentleman consider the desirability of bringing in or supporting a Bill in order that the amenities of rural scenery may be preserved?

MR. H. GARDNER: I am not prepared to admit that the power of the Board of Agriculture extends over the face of the country in that way, nor am I sure that such a duty would properly fall within my province.

COLOUR SERGEANT SLEAP.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the case of J. F. Sleaf, late colour sergeant of the 4th V.B. Royal West Surrey Regiment, who was dismissed the corps after 28 years' service; whether he was guilty of any serious infringement of the Volunteer Regulations, or was only absent from the Easter Manœuvres on account of temporary ill-health; whether he is aware that Colonel Haddon has had inserted in the regimental orders that Mr. J. F. Sleaf should be recommended for honorary rank and permitted to retain his uniform, and why was this order cancelled without any explanation being given; and whether he is prepared to grant a Court of Inquiry, so that the whole question may be investigated?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is the case that Mr. Sleaf was dismissed by his Commanding Officer from the corps in question after having served 28 years in it. The power of dismissal rests absolutely with the Commanding Officer, as is laid down in Section 21 of the Volunteer Act of 1863, the words of which are these—

"The Commanding Officer of a Volunteer corps may discharge from the corps any Volunteer, and strike him out of the muster roll, either for disobedience of orders by him while doing any military duty with his corps, or for neglect of duty, or misconduct by him as a member of the corps, or for other sufficient cause, the existence and sufficiency of such causes respectively to be judged of by the Commanding Officer."

Colonel Haddon, in the first place, called upon Mr. Sleaf to resign, and intimated his intention to recommend that Mr. Sleaf should have leave to retain his rank and uniform; but, on Mr. Sleaf refusing to resign and incurring dismissal, this recommendation was not made, and the order was withdrawn. This is entirely within the discretion of the Commanding Officer. I should have been glad if Colonel Haddon had seen his way to make this recommendation in the case of a non-commissioned officer of so long service, whose dismissal did not imply any imputation on his character. Courts of Inquiry are only allowed in very special cases. They are not in the nature of a Court of Appeal, but are merely intended to ascertain the full facts of a case; and as, in this instance, there is no doubt as to the facts, no occasion arises for inquiry.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his very explicit answer. But do I understand that the War Office can afford no means of redress to this colour sergeant? Is he aware that the feeling in the corps is so strong that for months it was found impossible to induce anyone to accept promotion in order to fill his place?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Everything done by the Commanding Officer was perfectly regular and in accordance with the Regulations.

SIR GERALD PORTAL'S MISSION.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the statement in the Report of the British East Africa Company that the unfortunate position in which it finds itself is due, amongst other things, to the indefinite postponement of the consideration by Parliament of railway construction, to which, assuming the survey to be satisfactory, the previous Government was pledged; and whether there is any record of this pledge in the Foreign Office; if so, whether Her Majesty's present Advisers intend to give effect to it? I wish also to ask a further question, of which I have given private notice—whether any communication has been received from Sir Gerald Portal confirming the statement published in The Times of to-day from its Correspondent in Uganda, that the Soudanese troops have been enlisted in Her Majesty's Service, and that Captain Macdonald has been appointed Resident; also whether the telegram in The Berliner Tageblatt is correct in stating that Sir Gerald Portal has hoisted the British flag and proclaimed a British Protectorate over Uganda; and whether it is competent for Sir Gerald Portal to do that, or to take any steps which would involve this country in the assumption of a Protectorate?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): No information whatever has been received by the Foreign Office since the arrival of Sir Gerald Portal in Uganda either as to the truth of the statements alluded to by the hon. Member or otherwise. As to the Instructions to Sir Gerald Portal, they are before the House, and hon. Members are as well qualified to pronounce an opinion as to their scope as is the Government. With regard to the question on the Paper, the attention of the Secretary of State has been called to this statement; but there is no record of any such pledge beyond what is contained in the Correspondence between the Foreign Office and the Treasury which has been laid before Parliament in Blue Book Africa No. 2, 1892. In answer to the last line of the question, I have to say that the Report by Captain Macdonald of the survey of the route from Mombasa to the Victoria Nyanza has been received by the Treasury, and was presented to Parliament yesterday. No decision upon it will be taken till Sir Gerald Portal's Report has been received and considered by Parliament.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I think the hon. Baronet might have given a more specific answer to that portion of my hon. Friend's question which refers to the competency of Sir Gerald Portal to hoist the British flag in Uganda, or to take any steps which would involve this country in the assumption of a Protectorate. Is it the opinion of the Foreign Office that under his Instructions it is competent for Sir Gerald Portal to do these things?

SIR E. GREY: The Instructions given to Sir Gerald Portal gave him considerable latitude, especially in Clause 8; but I should think that the hon. Member can form his own opinion as to the scope of the Instructions. I have only to say that this question of their exact scope was very fully discussed on the Address in the early part of the Session, and it was then stated that any arrangement which Sir Gerald Portal may make will be provisional until his Report has been considered by the Government.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Surely the hon. Baronet can say whether it is the opinion of the Foreign Office that the Instructions given to Sir Gerald Portal allow the hoisting of the British flag and the assumption of a Protectorate?

*SIR E. GREY: These are the words in the Instructions—

“A Mission to Central Africa cannot, of course, be conducted according to ordinary precedent; the infrequency and difficulty of communication may require a latitude beyond what is usual; and in entrusting to you these important duties Her Majesty's Government reckon with full confidence on your meeting with firmness and caution every occasion that may arise.”

In the absence of any news from Sir G. Portal, as to what he has done and why he did it, it is impossible for me to say more as to the scope of those Instructions.

MR. LABOUCHERE: This is a most important question. Do I understand that, in the opinion of the Foreign Office, Sir Gerald Portal's Instructions do allow him to hoist the British flag in Uganda and to assume a Protectorate over that country?

SIR E. GREY: I can say nothing about the opinion of the Foreign Office on the subject until we have heard from Sir Gerald Portal.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I am not asking the hon. Gentleman what will be the decision of the Foreign Office on the point after they have received information from Sir Gerald Portal, but whether his Instructions authorise him to do what he has done?

SIR E. GREY: I have already said that what Sir Gerald Portal does will be provisional until his Report has been considered. What he does must be contingent upon the circumstances and condition of things which he finds in Uganda, and until we know what they are I can say no more.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Are we to understand that under certain conditions Sir Gerald Portal has a right to hoist the British flag in Uganda, and to assume a Protectorate over the country?

IRISH INSPECTORS OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

CAPTAIN M'CALMONT (Antrim, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Inspectors of Weights and Measures in Ireland have received any remuneration for their services during the past financial year, in accordance with the Inspector General's Circular of 3rd July, 1891; if not, what is the cause of the delay, when the ex-officio Inspectors will be paid, and if the shares will be distributed as in 1892?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): The ex-officio Inspectors of Weights and Measures have not yet, I understand, received their remuneration for the financial year to March 31 last, the reason for the delay being due to the settlement of certain preliminaries. The claims are now being investigated, and the Inspector General expects that payments will be made before the end of the present month.

MOONLIGHTING OUTRAGE IN CLARE.

MR. DANE (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the attack on a farmer named John Collins, whose house at Cree North, in the County of Clare, was attacked upon the night of Monday, May 22, by a band of disguised moonlighters, and several shots fired into it, whether shortly previous to this outrage notices had been posted in the district, signed “Captain Moonlight,” threatening Collins with death if he persisted in exercising his legal rights against his under tenants; have any arrests been made; and what steps have been taken to render Collins and his family protection?

*MR. WILLIAM KENNY (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green): At the same time, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that a threatening notice, signed “Captain Moonlight,” had been posted on Collins' door some time before the outrage; whether he is also aware that Collins has recently been obliged to take ejectment proceedings against his sub-tenants, and had obtained decrees for possession of some small holdings; whether this outrage will appear in the official Returns as an agrarian one; and if any arrests have been made in connection with it?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I am informed that it is true that an outrage of the nature indicated took place on the night of May 22, and that about a fortnight previously a threatening notice was received by Collins. No report of this notice was made to the police until after the attack on his house. Collins has taken proceedings against two of his sub-tenants, but has not, so far, obtained decrees. No arrests have yet been made; the police have taken steps for affording adequate protection to Collins and his family. The outrage referred to has been recorded in the official Returns as agrarian.

*MR. W. KENNY: Can the right hon. Gentleman say if the place at which this outrage was committed is not 30 miles outside the disturbed area which he recently referred to?

MR. J. MORLEY: I cannot answer that without notice.

THE CASE OF JOHN CARRON.

MR. DANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland upon what Report his Excellency acted respecting the Memorial presented to him praying for a remission of the sentence recently imposed upon John Carron by the County Monaghan Justices at Clones Petty Sessions?

MR. J. MORLEY: I very much deprecate putting questions of this nature. As stated in reply to a previous question on this subject a Memorial largely signed on behalf of John Carron was submitted to the Lord Lieutenant, who had also received in the usual course a Report from the Magistrates in Petty Sessions which showed that the assault was a wanton one and committed by Carron on a quiet, inoffensive man. In view of all the circumstances of the case the Lord Lieutenant decided that the law must take its course.

Mr. William Kenny

MR. DANE: May I ask if it is the usual course in Ireland to invite the convicting Magistrates to report?

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Has not the right hon. Gentleman himself been condemned several times in this House for not consulting convicting Judges?

MR. J. MORLEY: The Lord Lieutenant took the best possible means of getting full information. It is a matter entirely for his discretion.

MR. DANE: Did his Excellency consult the Constabulary Authorities?

MR. J. MORLEY: Without wishing to be discourteous to the hon. Member, I must respectfully decline to answer further questions of this nature.

TITHE COLLECTION IN CARDIGANSHIRE.

MR. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tonbridge): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that there are now in Cardiganshire more than 100 orders to be carried out for the collection of tithe, but that it is impossible to carry them out because the Standing Joint Committee and Chief Constable refuse adequate police protection, trusting to the policy of moral suasion, whereby the intended proceedings are made public, and a force of only four men is sent to protect the bailiff; whether he is also aware that this policy was tried in Pembrokeshire and Carmarthenshire, and failed, but that, since the policy of secrecy and of sending a large police force has prevailed, there has been no difficulty in collecting tithe in these two counties; whether he is aware that members of the County Council are present at the proceedings in Cardiganshire, and that, on the 29th of December last, Mr. Morgan Evans, the then Chairman of the County Council and Standing Joint Committee, advised the crowd to do all in its power to prevent the carrying out of the law; and whether he will take steps to compel the Local Authorities to provide adequate police protection, in order that the law may be carried out, and violence prevented?

MR. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): Is it not a fact that distresses have been carried out much more smoothly and that the peace has been better preserved in Wales since the custom of sending large police escorts has been discontinued?

*MR. REES - DAVIES (Pembrokeshire): And is it not a fact as regards Pembrokeshire that since the Act of 1891 it has been the custom for a small force of four police-constables, at the most, with occasionally a Superintendent to accompany the bailiffs in these cases, whereas prior to that date large forces were employed without effect? Also, can the right hon. Gentleman say if the failure to collect tithe is due not to the inadequacy of the police escort, but to the opinions entertained by the Welsh people as to the injustice of the impost?

*MR. SPEAKER: That is entirely out of Order.

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): May I ask whether that portion of the question on the Paper is in Order which says it is impossible to carry out the tithe collections because adequate police protection is refused, and the Standing Joint Committee and Chief Constable "trust to the policy of moral suasion"? Is not that argumentative and controversial?

*MR. SPEAKER: It may be disputable to say that the Standing Committee trust to moral suasion instead of other forces. I think that part of the question had better be left out.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): With respect to the questions put by the hon. Members behind me, and with regard to the second paragraph of the question on the Paper, I have not sufficient information, nor, so far as I know, have I the means of obtaining sufficient to enable me to give a satisfactory answer. I believe it is the fact that a large number of orders for the collection of tithe rent-charge in Cardiganshire have not yet been carried out. I have no reason to believe that the difficulty has been caused by the refusal of the Standing Joint Committee and Chief Constable to give adequate police protection to the bailiff. It is more probably attributable to the fact that the recent Act (as I am advised) does not empower the police to secure entry for a bailiff seeking to levy distress for tithe rent-charge on persons occupying their own farms. I have no information with regard to the second paragraph of the hon. Member's question. With regard to the third paragraph, I have received a telegram from Mr. Morgan Evans denying the truth of the statement there made, and vouching the Chief Constable in support of his denial. I have on more than one occasion impressed upon the Chief Constable the necessity of giving adequate police protection to the bailiff, and I have no reason to think that the Chief Constable does not fully recognise his duty in this respect.

MR. GRIFFITH - BOSCAWEN: Arising out of the answer, may I ask whether, as these difficulties do exist in Cardiganshire and do not exist in Glamorgan and Pembrokeshire, owing to the fact that a different system prevails, he will take steps to secure that the same amount of protection is afforded in Cardiganshire as in the other counties?

MR. ASQUITH: That question involves an assumption and an argument, with neither of which am I prepared to deal.

THE TRIPLE ALLIANCE.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will now lay upon the Table of the House any Correspondence that has taken place between Her Majesty's Government and Foreign Powers with respect to the position of this country in regard to the Triple Alliance that was entered into in 1887 between Austria, Germany, and Italy, and particularly in regard to any declarations made to Italy which might have induced her to enter into that alliance; and whether any pledges or assurances were given directly or indirectly by the late Government, in any official Correspondence now in existence, implying that in case of Italy being involved in a war with France, owing to her having joined the Triple Alliance, Italy may expect any interference on the part of this country to save her from the possible consequences of defeat?

*SIR E. GREY: It would not be in the public interest to publish any Correspondence that may have taken place in previous years with reference to the Triple Alliance. In answer to the second paragraph, I can assure the hon. Member that no pledge unknown to the House has been given as to the employment of the Naval or Military Forces of the Crown. The actual position of affairs seems to have been very fairly explained by the right hon. Baronet the Member for North-East Manchester in an answer given in the House on June 4, 1891; and there has been no change nor any Correspondence since then.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Then I understand there was a Correspondence, which the hon. Baronet declines to give?

*SIR E. GREY: I said it would not be in the public interest to publish any Correspondence that may have taken place. That is exactly what was said in previous years by my Predecessor in reply to similar questions.

BALLANEOH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

MR. MACFARLANE (Argyll): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland why the Scotch Education Department have refused to declare the Ballanoch Public School a centre under Article 21 of the Scotch Code, which would entitle it to a grant of 10s. instead of 4s.; whether Her Majesty's Inspector has passed the school as "good," subject only to some improvements which have been duly executed; and whether he is aware that the school rate in that locality is now abnormally high, being nearly 2s. in the pound?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): The question of re-organising this school as a centre under Article 21 was brought before the Department in 1888, and the proposal was refused on the ground that the school staff was insufficient. More recently the request was renewed, but it was felt to be inexpedient to re-open the question at a time when the organisation of centres for Secondary Education is under the consideration of the County Committee. The premises have not been reported as good, and Her Majesty's Inspector has stated that no improvement will render them permanently satisfactory. According to the last Return the school rate in the district was 1s. 10d.

GREENWICH AGE PENSIONS.

MR. CLOUGH (Portsmouth): I beg to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty whether it is the intention of the Government to give effect to the second recommendation of the Select Committee of the House of Commons on Greenwich Age Pensions (1892) by legislation during the present Session?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: The question of giving effect to the recommendation is now under the consideration of the Treasury.

THE ATTACK ON THE SCOTTISH RIFLES AT ALDERSHOT.

CAPTAIN GRICE - HUTCHINSON (Aston Manor): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the 1st Scottish Rifles bore with perfect forbearance and discipline the two attacks made upon them, their barracks and officers' quarters, by the men of the Cavalry Brigade at Aldershot on 1st and 2nd May; will he explain on what grounds they have been removed from their barracks to others in the North Camp, at a great expense to the married people and officers, while the Cavalry Brigade, the authors of the disturbance, have been brought back to the same quarters they occupied before they organised the attack; and whether, if this is the case, he will see that immediate steps are taken to have the good name of the Scottish Rifles cleared from any stigma of offence which the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men of the battalion feel is laid upon them by reason of this removal?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is the fact that the Scottish Rifles, in the regrettable outbreak of May 1, bore the attacks made upon them with forbearance and good discipline; and no stigma has been laid upon the regiment by their removal, of the reason for which they are perfectly well aware. That reason is easily explained. It was obviously undesirable after what had occurred that the Cavalry regiments and the Scottish Rifles should remain quartered in immediate proximity to each other. The Cavalry regiments must of course be accommodated in barracks with stabling; when, therefore, they were brought back from being under canvas, these regiments were quartered in the Cavalry Barracks; but each regiment has changed its barrack and occupies a different one from that occupied before, while the Scottish Rifles in the North Camp are entirely separated from them.

Sir E. Grey

CAPTAIN GRICE-HUTCHINSON : I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, considering the fact that this regiment does feel that in the public view it has been disgraced by being removed in this way, he will take any steps to assure this gallant and distinguished regiment that it is not disgraced? Could not something be done in the form of a letter written by the Commander-in-Chief to the Colonel of the Scottish Rifles—to be read on parade—which would remove the stigma, which I assure the right hon. Gentleman is felt deeply?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : My information is that the regiment are perfectly well aware that there is no slur upon them. The officer commanding stated that to them before the removal took place.

MR. MACFARLANE : If the necessity for the removal of the regiment was due to the attack upon it why not charge the expenses of the removal against the Cavalry Brigade?

AN HON. MEMBER : Is it not a fact that the 20th Hussars were sent under canvas as a punishment?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : Certainly.

OPEN DRAINS IN ARMAGH.

MR. EDWARD M'HUGH (Armagh, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is he aware, as President of the Local Government Board, that certain open drains in Armagh have been allowed to remain a nuisance and a danger to the public health for many years; that the Poor Law Guardians decided that the responsibility lay with the Town Commissioners, whilst the latter threw it back on the Guardians; and that thus this nuisance is permitted to remain close to a large educational institution, causing blood poisoning and similar diseases; and, if so, what steps, if any, will be taken for the prompt abatement of this dangerous nuisance, so that the lives of those in the locality may not be further exposed?

MR. J. MORLEY : The Local Government Board have been informed by the Executive Sanitary Officer of the Armagh Union that the existence of the nuisance complained of having been recently brought under the notice of the Rural Sanitary Authority the necessary steps have been taken to abate the nuisance, and the work of cleaning the drain will be put in hand at once. It appears that the drain has been in good sanitary condition until a recent date.

BOYCOTTING IN CORK.

MR. WILLIAM KENNY : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that two families, named Davidson and Connor, occupants of evicted farms at Ballyclough, County Cork, are the victims of boycotting and intimidation; that the arrival of the children of these men at the local national school is made the signal for all the other children to leave the school and march through the village, singing such songs as "God save Ireland"; that these boycotted children have to be protected by police when going to and returning from school and during some of the school hours; and that the parents of those children have been denounced by the local branches of the Irish National Federation for their occupation of evicted farms; and whether the Government propose to take any steps to put a stop to this system of persecution of little children?

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.E.) : Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the fact that the parish priest has condemned these acts of violence in unmeasured language?

MR. J. MORLEY : I believe that he has. As to the question on the Paper, I understand that the facts are substantially as stated in the question. The efforts of the police have prevented a renewal of these disgraceful disturbances since May 12, since which date it appears that no children except the O'Connors and the Davidsons have attended the school. Prosecutions have been directed against some of the most prominent disturbers of the peace in connection with this disgraceful matter.

THE ANGORA TRIALS.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in reference to the arrest and trial of Pastor Thounaïan and others the British Vice Consul in Angora has sent in the Report he was instructed to make on the subject; whether the Turkish Authorities have satisfied themselves of Pastor Thoumaïan's innocence, and ordered his release ; and whether he has yet been released ?

SIR E. GREY : I am informed that the trials are in progress, and that M. Thoumaïan's examination has not yet come on. The Turkish Authorities, after some consideration, decided that they could not order the release of M. Thoumaïan without trial.

THE CASE OF HUGH DOHERTY.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to a report in The Derry Journal of the prosecution of Hugh Doherty at Rathmullen Petty Sessions, County Donegal, before Mr. Orr, R.M., for not having his name on his cart ; that Mr. Doherty proved that he had his name thereon in Irish letters, as he spoke and wrote Irish, but that nevertheless the Resident Magistrate imposed a fine of a shilling and costs ; and whether, as some time ago a Donegal farmer had his application for a fair rent dismissed because his name, having no English equivalent, was given in the Irish form in the originating notice, the Government will ascertain what is the analogous practice in Wales and the Highlands, and instruct the police not to bring prosecutions such as that brought against Mr. Doherty, and remit the fine and costs ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I am informed that Hugh Doherty was summoned to Rathmullen Petty Sessions on the 5th May for using his cart on the public road without having his name and residence printed thereon. The case was proved in the ordinary way before the Resident Magistrate and two local Justices, and a fine of one shilling and costs imposed. Doherty did not, I learn, prove he had his name, or any name, on the cart in either English or Irish letters, nor did he produce any evidence to that effect. He appears to have stated in an incoherent manner that his name was on the cart in Irish characters ; but the prosecuting constable proved there were no letters of any kind to be seen on the vehicle when found. The Irish Land Commission state they have no knowledge of any application to have a fair rent fixed having been dismissed for any such reason as mentioned in the second paragraph of the question.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) : Arising out of the question, may I ask whether, in justice to the Irish nation, the Prime Minister will introduce a clause into the Government of Ireland Bill enacting that the Debates in the Irish Legislative Assembly shall be in Irish ?
[No answer was given.]

HOURS OF RAILWAY SERVANTS.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether any further Returns as to hours of labour of railway servants exceeding 10 or 12 hours respectively have as yet been ordered for any month since December 1891 ; and whether, in any future Return, the form of the Returns will be modified so as to afford clearer information as to the more serious cases of overwork ?

MR. MUNDELLA : No further Returns have been ordered at present, and I propose to await the passing of the Railway Servants (Hours of Labour) Bill before deciding upon future action. If my hon. Friend will favour me with his suggestions for the amendment of the form of Return they shall be carefully considered.

MR. CHANNING : Before the right hon. Gentleman comes to any decision will he consult practical railway men ?

MR. MUNDELLA : Certainly ; I shall take the best advice I can get.

BLOOD POISONING FROM VACCINATION.

MR. HOPWOOD (Lancashire, S.E., Middleton) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if his attention has been called to an inquest held at Uttoxeter on the 17th of May, concerning the death of Thomas Henry Nash, a child nine weeks old, and the verdict of the jury that death was attributable to pyæmia or blood poisoning from vaccination ?

SIR W. FOSTER (who replied) : The Local Government Board have applied to the Coroner for a copy of the depositions in the case, and next week I shall be able to answer the question.

MR. HOPWOOD : I will put it down for Tuesday.

CLASSIFICATION IN THE DOCKYARDS.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he can now state the decision of the Government with respect to the system of classification in Her Majesty's Dockyards?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I am not yet in a position to give a definite reply to this question.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: I must remind the hon. Member that this is the third time I have put the question and got a similar answer. On the last occasion he said a decision would be come to before Whitsuntide. Cannot he say something definite now?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I cannot say more than that the question is under active consideration at this moment.

MR. KEARLEY (Devonport): When will the hon. Gentleman be able to? Is it a question of weeks or of months. Shall we know before the end of the Session?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I should hope in a very short time.

MR. KEARLEY: Then it is a question of weeks?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can state on what grounds the Treasury consented to extend the appointment of Sir F. Burton, the Director of the National Gallery, now aged 76, till next year; and whether, in this case, as well as in the numerous other cases in which the Treasury have sanctioned a departure from the Order in Council of 1890, which lays down the age of retirement as 65, they have duly considered the hardship that is inflicted on the younger men in the Departments involved, through the stoppage of their promotion consequent on the retention above them of officials beyond the limits of the working age laid down by the Order?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): The object of the provision for compulsory retirement at 65 was to prevent inefficiency in the Public Service owing to age, and not to provide promotion for younger men. Sir F. Burton is retained because the period of five years for which he was re-appointed has not yet expired.

PLACEMEN AND PENSIONERS IN THE HOUSE.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can now state when the Return of Placemen and Pensioners having seats in the House of Lords and House of Commons will be presented to this House?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The Returns from one Department are not yet complete, but I hope that the whole will be ready in a few days.

H.M.S. "PHAETON."

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty on what ground the relief of H.M.S. Phaeton, which has now been in commission in the Mediterranean for over six years, is now a fourth time postponed, and that of the Undaunted has been substituted for it?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): The suggestions in the question are not in accordance with the facts. The Undaunted is ordered home before the Phaeton because she has been longer in commission.

THE TUBERCULOSIS COMMISSION.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Report of the Tuberculosis Commission, which was expected early in May, has yet been issued; whether his Department intend granting compensation to the many owners who have suffered severe financial loss through the confiscation exercised to protect public health; and whether it is the intention of the Government to provide a fund in order to end the present system?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: The Report of the Tuberculosis Commission has not yet been issued, and I must remind the hon. Member that in my reply to his question on March 17 last I stated that I was informed that it was expected that the microscopical investigations which were being made on behalf of the Commission would be completed and the Reports of the three sub-inquirers be in the hands of the Commission before the end of the present month; that the deliberations of the Commission thereon would follow; and that their Report would be presented as soon as possible afterwards. The Government are not prepared to make proposals to Parliament until the Report of the Commission is presented.

MR. FIELD: When may the Report be expected?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: If the Local Government Board were the Commission I should be able to fix it.

MR. W. REDMOND (Clare, E.): Will the right hon. Gentleman point out to the Commissioners the desirability of reporting as quickly as possible?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I have asked the Commissioners over and over again, and their answer is that they will report when they have completed their inquiries.

MR. FIELD: Is there no way in which this Commission can be compelled to do its duty?

[No answer was given.]

THE EXTRA POLICE FORCE IN CORK.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Cork): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a copy of a Resolution passed by the county at large Presentment Sessions for the County of Cork applying for the reduction of the extra police force for that county; whether he is aware that eight of the nine Magistrates and cesspayers who assented to the Resolution are Unionists, and the Chairman, Mr. Savage French, J.P., is a prominent member of the Cork Landlords' Union, and that the Chairman observed that he did not see the necessity for any extra police at present; and whether, in view of this Resolution, and of the peaceful condition of the county, steps will be taken for the reduction of the extra police force?

MR. J. MORLEY: It appears from a local newspaper report that at the Cork Presentment Sessions held on May 27 the Magistrates and ratepayers drew attention to "the charge for Constabulary for the half-year to March last, with a view to the reduction of the Force at the earliest possible period if the state of the county would permit."

Mr. H. H. Fowler

I have no knowledge of the political opinions of the gentlemen who carried the Resolution, though, of course, it is quite possible the hon. Member's surmise in this respect is correct. It is true that the condition of the county is generally satisfactory and peaceful. But, as already stated by me, there is an area which does not bear favourable comparison with the rest of the county; and the local Constabulary Authorities, taking into consideration the nature of the duty to be performed by the police over so extensive a county as Cork, cannot at present recommend a reduction in the extra force.

THE NATIONAL SPORTING CLUB.

MR. A. C. MORTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the exhibition of boxing at the National Sporting Club on Monday last; and whether the police intend to take proceedings against all or any of the persons concerned?

MR. ASQUITH: The police cautioned the manager of the club and the principals that they would be held answerable for any disorder, or any illegal act, as is always done on such occasions. Nothing occurred to warrant the interference of the police; there was no disorder, nor, so far as the police are aware, any illegality. If evidence is forthcoming to show that the exhibition was of an illegal character, proceedings will, of course, be taken.

FRANCE AND SIAM.

MR. CURZON (Lancashire, Southport): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the recent action of French troops in occupying Siamese posts upon the Mekong River; whether they have invited or received any explanation on the matter from the French Government; whether the French claim to all territory lying upon the left or east bank of the Mekong River is recognised by Her Majesty's Government; and whether Her Majesty's Government consider these proceedings of the French inimical to the political or commercial independence of Siam?

*SIR E. GREY : Her Majesty's Government have received Reports from different quarters with regard to the recent action of the French troops on the Mekong. They have not thought it desirable to address to the French Government any request for explanations on the subject, and the French Government have not as yet offered such explanations. So far as Her Majesty's Government know, the French have not distinctly intimated what territory they claim on the east of the Mekong, and in the present state of the question Her Majesty's Government are not in a position to express an opinion as to the effect which these proceedings may have on the political or commercial independence of Siam.

CLERKS IN THE CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT.

SIR FREDERICK DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Board of Customs propose to recruit the First Division staff of their Secretary's office by direct appointment from outside the Service ; and whether he will direct that the recommendations of the Ridley Commission in favour of filling First Division vacancies in the Revenue Departments by promotion from the Second Division shall be put into force in the Customs Department ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : One Upper Division clerkship has been added to the Secretary's office of the Customs, which it is considered necessary to fill by the appointment of one of the successful competitors at the recent Class I. examination. The action taken does not appear to me to be inconsistent with the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments.

WALSALL BLUECOAT SCHOOL.

MR. TALBOT (Oxford University) : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he will cause inquiry to be made as to whether the Walsall Bluecoat Schools are practically higher grade schools for the town of Walsall ; and, in the event of this being the case, whether he will re-consider his refusal to sanction the imposition of fees under Section 4 (1) of "The Elementary Education Act, 1891" ?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham) : The school in question is not a higher grade school in any greater degree than many others in which education is completely free. There is no sufficient evidence that it would be for the educational benefit of the district to allow the school to charge fees under the section of the Act named.

*MR. J. G. TALBOT : Did the right hon. Gentleman get the information that this was not a higher grade school from local sources ?

MR. ACLAND : I inquired carefully into the case. I had all the evidence before me, and I came to a decision on that evidence.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA AT HENDON.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether it is true that there has recently been a serious outbreak of pleuro-pneumonia at Hendon, in the Metropolitan District ; and how long a period has elapsed since the last outbreak of the disease in that district ?

MR. H. GARDNER : Yes ; I regret to say that it is the case that a somewhat serious outbreak of pleuro-pneumonia has been reported from Hendon, 10 animals on a dairy farm there having been found to be affected with the disease. The cattle in contact have been slaughtered, and the usual precautions taken, and we are making careful inquiry with a view to discover the source of infection. No previous case of pleuro-pneumonia has been reported in the Metropolitan Police District since October 1 last.

MR. FIELD : Will the Government take steps to try the efficacy of inoculation against pleuro-pneumonia ?

MR. H. GARDNER : I must have notice of that question.

DISEASE AMONG CANADIAN CATTLE.

MR. CHAPLIN : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he can state the arrangements which have been made by the Board for the examination of the lungs of the Canadian cattle which are landed in Great Britain ?

MR. H. GARDNER : The arrangements made for the examination of the lungs of Canadian cattle landed in Great Britain are embodied in an Order made by the Board of Agriculture on the 17th ultimo, a copy of which I shall be happy to supply to the right hon. Gentleman. The Order is being carried out by the Inspectors at the various ports where the cattle are landed, with the assistance of a staff of Commissioners specially engaged for the purpose. I may add that the Order was published in the London Gazette of the 18th ultimo, and that the usual steps were taken to give publicity to its provisions, in accordance with the undertaking I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee.

MR. CHAPLIN: Would it be convenient to the right hon. Gentleman to say what has been the result of the inquiry up to the present time? Does it point to the sanitary condition of Canadian cattle, or whether they confirm the continued existence of pleuropneumonia in that country?

MR. H. GARDNER: I must ask for notice of that question.

THE INDIAN CURRENCY COMMISSION.

MR. CHAPLIN: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he can say whether the Report of the Commission on Indian Currency has yet been completed; and if he is now able to name a time within which the Government will be able to lay it upon the Table?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I understand that the Report of the Commission was signed yesterday. It will be necessary to obtain the opinion of the Indian Government upon it, but no time will be lost, either by the Indian Government or by Her Majesty's Government, in coming to a decision upon that point.

MR. CHAPLIN: I assume that the Report will be laid on the Table before any action is taken in the matter?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I believe so, but I cannot say definitely.

SIR W. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): Is the statement correct in the newspapers that the Report is unanimous?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I cannot answer for any statements in the newspapers.

INVERGORDON WATER SUPPLY.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been drawn to the report of a special meeting of the Invergordon Borough Commissioners, in The People's Journal of Saturday, 13th May, at which the Borough Surveyor's Report with regard to the foul water supply was considered, from which it appears that the sewer-drain going through the Nonikiln burying-ground and the sewer-drain of Nonikiln steading and house runs into the water which supplies the town, and that on a recent Sunday the state of the water was such with sheep dip, &c., that many in town were rendered sick, and quite a number lost their dinners, the water being almost thick with filth; whether he is aware that this state of matters has been in existence during a lengthened period; whether the County Medical Officer of Health has made inquiry into the state of affairs; whether he has reported thereon; if so, will the Report be laid upon the Table of the House; and whether immediate steps will be taken to deal with the matter?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: Upon inquiry, I find it to be the case that upon a recent Sunday the water supply of Invergordon was undrinkable through sheep dip having been poured into the source of supply. The water supply of the burgh has apparently been subject to pollution from the causes mentioned by the hon. Member during a lengthened period. The County Authorities are not responsible for the purity of the burgh water supply and no complaint has been received by them until after the Sunday in question; but on receiving complaint the District Sanitary Inspector at once issued notices requiring removal of the nuisance, and, if necessary, prosecutions will follow. The County Medical Officer has twice visited the place and approved of the action taken. The Police Commissioners have intimated to the Board of Supervision that they are about to borrow for the purpose of improving their water supply; and, meanwhile, they have received an assurance from the tenant of Nonikiln that he will do his utmost to prevent the recurrence of the special contamination by sheep dip. It is also understood that the tenant is prepared to divert the drain from his house and with it any matter proceeding from the churchyard. Since the question was on the Paper, I have written to the Board of Supervision on the matter, and have been informed in reply that the Engineer employed by the Board to report with a view to the proposed loan has been requested to examine the source of supply and to suggest means for the purification of the water.

THE EVICTED TENANTS COMMISSION.

MR. BARTLEY : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government has decided on the action to be taken on the Report of the Evicted Tenants Commission ; and, if so, when he proposes to announce it ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I am not in a position at present to make any statement as to the prospects of legislation in connection with this question ; but the Government do not lose sight, and are not likely to lose sight, of a question so important.

MEMORIAL FROM CUSTOMS CLERKS.

SIR EDWARD CLARKE (Plymouth) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Treasury Minute, dated 26th April, 1866, is still in force ; whether he is aware that the Board of Customs have refused to permit the Clerks of the Second Class in the Customs Departments in the Outports to forward to the Lords of the Treasury, according to the terms of that Minute, a Memorial which was submitted to the Board of Customs on the 6th January, 1893 ; and whether he will be prepared to submit such Memorial to the Lords of the Treasury for consideration, and to protect the memorialists in the exercise of their rights secured to them by such Treasury Minute ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : The Minute is still in force, and I am in a position to inform my hon. and learned Friend that the Board of Customs have now given permission to the clerks in question to forward their Memorial direct to the Treasury.

THE SINKING OF THE "DOGGER."

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if steps have been taken to cause a careful inquiry to be made into the disastrous casualty that occurred to the steam trawler Dogger, of Hull, which vessel, while engaged in trawling off the coast of Holland on 24th April last, was run into and sunk, the crew of nine men being drowned, by the German barque Thekla, of Hamburg ?

*MR. MUNDELLA : The Doggerbank is missing with all hands, and her owner alleges that the German barque Thekla caused the disaster. I am advised that as the Thekla is now on a voyage to Chili with all the witnesses of the alleged collision on board no evidence is for the time available, and any formal investigation in this country would be useless at present. But I am strongly of opinion that the fullest information as regards the cause of the loss of the Doggerbank should be obtained, and I have taken every means to obtain such information, and have communicated with the Foreign Office and asked that the matter may be brought under the notice of the German Government without delay.

COMMANDER BETHELL : Will the Government take further steps to secure this information ?

MR. MUNDELLA : I have already communicated with the Foreign Office with that object.

BOYS' TRAINING SHIPS FOR IRELAND.

MR. FIELD : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the Government intends to send a training ship to Cork Harbour, as it was formerly used as a suitable place, and would be beneficial to a number of boys and the neighbourhood generally ?

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) : I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Admiralty will accede to the requests made to them by the Corporation of the City of Belfast, the Harbour Commissioners of Belfast, and the Chamber of Commerce of Belfast, to place a training ship for the Royal Navy in Belfast Lough ; and whether, in view of the fact that Belfast is by far the largest port in Ireland, that a suitable berth for a training ship has been offered by the Harbour Commissioners, and that a ship in Belfast Lough will conveniently serve both Irish and Scottish candidates for the Navy, their Lordships will give a favourable consideration to the request made, in the event of their not having already decided to accede to it ?

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.) : I have to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that a strong public feeling exists in the South of Ireland in favour of the establishment of a training ship in Cork Harbour; is he also aware that a large number of lads annually join the Navy from the South and West of Ireland, even though compelled to make their way to English ports for that purpose; and whether, under these circumstances, and also in view of the fact that Queenstown is the headquarters of the Royal Navy in Ireland, the Admiralty will consider the advisability, in the interest of the Service, of complying with the desire which has been so unanimously expressed on this subject?

MR. FLYNN: At the same time, I will ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the resolution passed by the Cork Incorporated Chamber of Commerce and Shipping in favour of establishing a training ship in Cork Harbour; and what action the Naval Authorities intend to take in the matter?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: There is no present intention of increasing the numbers of boys' training ships. Should any need for increase arise, the relative advantages of Cork, Belfast, and other places in the United Kingdom as stations for training ships will be considered.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there are no training ships in the whole of Ireland, although both England and Scotland possess some?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: That is so; but, as I have already stated, should there be any occasion for an increase in the number of boys' training ships, the claims of suitable stations in Ireland will be considered.

MR. FLYNN: And will the Admiralty take into consideration questions of economy in selecting the site?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: Certainly, all such circumstances will be taken into consideration.

*MR. WEIR: And will the authorities consider the desirability of placing a ship at Stornoway?

[No answer was given.]

TORPEDO CONTRACTS.

*MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether an order has been given within the last three months to Messrs. Whitworth and Co. for a considerable number of air vessels for 18-inch torpedoes; and whether private tenders were invited; if so, was the lowest tender accepted; if not, will he explain on what grounds?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. WOODALL, Hanley): An order for forgings for air vessels for 18-inch torpedoes was recently given to Messrs. Whitworth and Co. Tenders were invited in the ordinary way, and that of Messrs. Whitworth was accepted in view of the reliability of the forgings previously supplied by them, and the better rate of delivery offered, although there was a small difference in price between them and another firm.

*MR. WEIR: Were the tenders invited by public advertisement?

MR. WOODALL: The number of firms capable of supplying these forgings is well known, and invitations were sent to all of them.

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk): Is it the custom, when inviting firms to tender, to accept the lowest tender?

MR. WOODALL: Not necessarily.

RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT IN NATAL.

MR. H. L. LAWSON (Gloucester, Cirencester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, under the grant by Order in Council of responsible government to the Colony of Natal, any change will be made in the relations between Natal and Zululand, and what powers the Ministers responsible to the Natal Legislature will have over the Zulus; and whether the Governor of Natal will exercise an independent authority in Native affairs?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): My hon. Friend will see from the Natal Papers recently laid before the House of Commons (they were distributed on the 17th), that the Bill which was approved by Her Majesty's late Government, and which has now been passed by the Colonial Legislature, does not affect Zululand, which is a Crown Colony entirely distinct from Natal in its constitution. He will also see from the same Paper that that Bill does not contemplate any change in the present position and powers of the Governor as Supreme Chief of the Natives.

Captain Donelan

FLAGS ON LICENSED PREMISES IN IRELAND.

MR. T. M. HEALY : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, as the 6 and 7 William IV. c. 38, s. 8, uses the words that a publican shall not display any sign, flag, or symbol, colour, decoration, or emblem, whatsoever, "except the known and usual and accustomed sign of such house," he will have a test case from Derry submitted to Petty Sessions, and a case stated thereon to the Superior Courts, with a view to decide whether this section imports that it is lawful to fly a particular flag from licensed houses but forbids others?

MR. J. MORLEY : The Government have no power to call on the Magistrates to state a case for the Superior Courts in the event of the decision being in favour of the prosecution. This can only be done by the defendants.

MR. T. M. HEALY : It was done in the case of the Lord Mayor of Dublin?

MR. J. MORLEY : I am told that it can only be done by the defendant.

MR. T. M. HEALY : But under the Coercion Act, when the Lord Mayor of Dublin was acquitted, the hon. Member for Dublin University, who conducted the prosecution on behalf of the Government, demanded a case, although there was an acquittal.

MR. J. MORLEY : I will inquire further.

MR. CARSON (Dublin University) : As I have been personally referred to, I will ask the right hon. Gentleman if it is not a fact that in all cases the Attorney General has a right to demand that a case shall be stated. It was under the ordinary law that I insisted on that being done in the case referred to by the hon. Member for North Louth.

MR. J. MORLEY : I cannot answer a legal question of that kind without consulting the Attorney General of the present Government.

DUNSHAUGHLIN UNION CONTRACT.

MR. W. REDMOND : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the officer who held a sworn inquiry at Dunshaughlin Union into the alleged illegal voting of George Murphy, J.P., and John Wilkinson, J.P., upon a contract in which they were financially interested, has reported to the Local Government Board; and whether the facts alleged were proved; and, if so, what action the Local Government Board intend to take in the matter?

MR. J. MORLEY : The Report of the Inspector who conducted the inquiry referred to has been submitted to the Local Government Board, and it is clear from this Report that the ratepayers of the Union will gain by the acceptance of the tender of the Dunsany Company for the Union meat supply, and that nothing was adduced at the investigation to show that the Guardians who hold shares in the Company do so from any other motive than to keep down the prices of articles consumed in the district. The gentlemen named in the question are shareholders to the amount of £5 and 10s. respectively; and, assuming that the Company paid a dividend of 10 per cent., which has never yet been exceeded, the yearly interest due to Mr. Murphy would be 10s., and to Mr. Wilkinson 1s. It further appears that the Company has been in the habit of declaring a bonus to its customers. The last bonus declared was at the rate of 1s. 6d. in the £1 on the amount purchased by each buyer; and it is evident, therefore, that the ratepayers will gain by the acceptance of the tender. Under all the circumstances, the Local Government Board are of opinion that the present is not a case in which they should initiate proceedings for the statutory penalties, but that it should be left to the trader whose tender was rejected, or to any other ratepayer, to do so.

PROMOTION AMONG THE EDINBURGH TELEGRAPHISTS.

MR. PAUL (Edinburgh, S.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the discontent which prevails among the telegraph clerks in Edinburgh, especially those of the Second Class, with reference to slowness of promotion, uncertainty of prospects, and other causes; and whether he will personally inquire into these grievances with a view to their redress?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.) : An application was made in January last by 10 of the telegraphists of the second class at Edinburgh on the subject referred to by the hon. Member, and a reply was sent to them on the 14th February last. I have already given careful attention to the organisation of the Telegraph Service, and have made known my intention to adhere to the lines settled in 1890. I regret, therefore, that I am not prepared to depart from that decision. I may add that no officer in the Second Class at Edinburgh has yet reached his maximum, and it will take nearly four years before the senior officer will do so. The last telegraphist promoted was getting 32s. a week, and, therefore, was in receipt of 8s. below his maximum when his promotion occurred.

TIPPERARY BARRACKS.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is the intention of the Government to supply the vacancy now existing in the barracks at Tipperary, which has been empty almost since the removal of the 1st Battalion of the East Surrey to Malta last February; and whether it is intended to have a regiment sent early in June, as the traders are anxious to have the military in the place?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is proposed to move the 1st Battalion Seaforth Highlanders from Fermoy to Tipperary in the summer. There are three companies of Infantry at Tipperary—namely, one Company of the 1st Battalion Manchester Regiment, and two of the 1st Battalion Seaforth Highlanders.

BUTTER RATES AT CORK.

MR. W. REDMOND: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Great Southern and Western Railway Company are charging 4d. per firkin more than last year for single firkins sent from Ennis to Cork and intervening stations; and whether he will make any representation to the company on the subject?

MR. MUNDELLA: I have been in communication with the Railway Company, and have received a further letter and two more telegrams on the subject, which I shall be happy to show my hon. Friend. The information, however, is still incomplete.

MR. W. REDMOND: I shall put the question again next week.

Mr. A. Morley

THE MEDITERRANEAN SQUADRON.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the defective state of some of the men-of-war of the Mediterranean Fleet; whether it is a fact that the guns and gun carriages of some of the ships composing that Fleet are in such a condition that with some of their 6-inch guns they can only fire half-charges of 24 lbs.; whether in firing these guns with a reduced charge of 36 lbs. accidents have ensued; and whether it is proposed, and, if so, when, to put these guns and mountings into a condition that will enable them to be fired with their full charge of 48 lbs.?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: There is only one ship in the Mediterranean to which the question is applicable in any degree, which is the Phaeton, and arrangements were made some time ago to bring her home and replace the guns and mountings with those of new pattern which are ready for her.

LAND GRABBING IN IRELAND.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the proceedings of the Sarsfield Branch of the Irish National League, reported in The Limerick Leader of May 26, at which a resolution was adopted stating that the Sarsfield Branch of the Irish National League, having warned by resolution all persons connected with the grabbing of Miss Morrison's farm that if they persisted in retaining possession of the same they would be denounced by name and circulars sent throughout the country branches branding them as land grabbers; and that, such persons having disregarded the warnings, nothing remains but to publish the names of the grabbers, which are: "Messrs. Wheatley and Joynt, Starr-Bowkett Society, and Mr. Bateman, butcher, Roche's Street;" and also to the editorial comment of the same newspaper on the meeting to the effect that if, after repeated protests in a quiet manner, parties refuse to conform to popular opinion, they have only themselves to blame for any consequences that may accrue; and if the Government intend to take any action under which these intimidatory proceedings may be stopped and their authors punished?

MR. J. MORLEY: My attention has been drawn to the newspaper paragraphs referred to, which are correctly set forth. The local police do not anticipate that these references will have any evil effect on the persons named; but the case will be carefully watched, and any steps which it may be deemed necessary to take in their interest will be promptly taken.

* THE NORTH SEA LIQUOR TRAFFIC CONVENTION.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, when he informed the House that the French Chamber of Deputies rejected the Bill for carrying out the North Sea Liquor Traffic Convention of 1887, on the ground of an alleged opposition of Great Britain to French influence in Egypt, he was aware of the date of the alleged opposition; and whether he can state in what year or years the alleged opposition took place?

MR. MUNDELLA: I was, of course, perfectly aware that the allusion to English opposition to French influence in Egypt made in the Report of the Commission of the French Chamber of Deputies was introduced by a reference to occurrences in the time of King Louis Philippe; but I do not think that any useful purpose would be served by examining into the allegation.

THE APPROACHING ROYAL MARRIAGE.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if, having regard to the general desire of Her Majesty's loyal subjects to give expression by personal presence to the national satisfaction in the approaching marriage of His Royal Highness the Duke of York with Her Serene Highness the Princess Victoria May of Teck, and the necessary limitation of the route to be traversed by the wedding procession, he will consider the desirability of promoting much-needed employment by causing stands to be erected, either by the Office of Works or a lessee, within the railings of the Green Park from Walsingham House to Constitution Hill, and devote the large sum certain to be realised by the sale of places to the Samaritan Funds of St. George's and Westminster Hospitals, or other charitable objects?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): I have considered the suggestion of the hon. Member, and have come to the conclusion that it would not be a legitimate use of the Royal Parks to turn them to account in the manner proposed even for the purpose of making money for charities.

SIR T. BRADY'S PENSION.

MR. DANE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what were the terms of the communication made by the Treasury to Sir Thomas Brady relative to his pension upon deprivation of office; and what reply, if any, has been received from him?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Such communications are confidential, and I can say no more than that it is the intention of the Treasury to ask Parliament to vote a substantial sum in addition to the full pension for which the Superannuation Acts provide, in consideration of the services rendered by Sir Thomas Brady.

THE SCOTCH MINT.

MR. A. C. MORTON: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been called to the fact that, in accordance with Article 16 of the Treaty of Union between Scotland and England, the Scottish Mint at Edinburgh was to be continued; and if, as the Scottish Mint no longer exists, he can say whether the Government intend to carry out and maintain Article 16 of the aforesaid Treaty?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: The provision in Article 16 of the Treaty of Union for the continuance of the Scottish Mint at Edinburgh was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act of 1867, and the Article as now in force only provides that the coin shall be of the same standard and value in Scotland and England alike.

METROPOLITAN GAS ACCOUNTS.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state when the accounts of the Metropolitan Gas Companies for 1892 will be laid upon the Table?

MR. MUNDELLA : The Return to which my hon. Friend refers has been received from the printers to-day, and it shall be laid on the Table at once.

SHIPS' SIDE LIGHTS.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has received a copy of an Opinion of Counsel (Sir Walter Phillimore, Q.C., and Mr. Walton, Q.C.), on the subject of the legal liabilities in connection with the Side Light Regulations issued by the Board of Trade, and pointing out that the Regulation which is new is inconsistent with other Regulations, and would work unfairly to foreign vessels in British Courts; and whether he will now re-consider the whole question, with a view to establishing uniformity in the Regulations?

MR. MUNDELLA : I have received a copy of the Opinion referred to, and I have decided to refer it to the Law Officers of the Crown. On receiving their Report I will consider what further steps may be necessary.

LAND PURCHASE IN IRELAND.

MR. BARTLEY : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, pending the consideration of the Financial Clauses of the Government of Ireland Bill, he will undertake that no more money shall be advanced from the Imperial Exchequer to enable Irish tenants to purchase their holdings?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian) : The Government have no power and no intention to interfere with the sale of land in Ireland under the Land Purchase Acts.

PRIVATE RAILWAY WAGONS.

MR. BURNIE (Swansea Town) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade under what Parliamentary powers the Railway Companies claim the right to force on the traders the new Regulations they have issued with respect to the repairs and renewals of private railway wagons; whether he is also aware that the private owners of wagons look upon the Regulations as impracticable, and if attempted to be enforced likely to cause heavy loss to them as traders without achieving any satisfactory result; and whether he will confer with the Railway Companies on the subject?

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.) : Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that question, may I ask whether it is not a fact that the Railway Companies have thousands of wagons of their own which do not comply with these Regulations; and whether, in seeking to enforce the Regulation upon private owners, they are not displaying an undue preference in their own favour? Will he take steps to prevent that injustice?

MR. MUNDELLA : Under Sections 117 and 118 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, carriages are to be constructed according to Regulations, and such Regulations are to apply to all carriages running on the railway. Provision is also made for arbitration in the event of dispute between a Company and the owner of a carriage "as to the construction or condition thereof." Last year the Board of Trade drew the attention of the Secretary to the Railway Association to a letter of complaint from the Association of Private Owners of Railway Rolling Stock, and furnished that Association with Sir Henry Oakley's reply. The Board of Trade have no powers bearing on the question.

CLERKS OF THE CROWN OR PEACE IN IRELAND.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Departmental Report relative to the allowances to be paid to Clerks of the Crown or Peace in Ireland for the carrying out of the Local Registration of Title Act has yet been received; and, if not, what is the cause of the delay; and have any, and what, steps been taken to expedite the presentation of such Reports by the Treasury Officers in Ireland?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I hope to receive the Report next week; but I should explain that the unavoidable delay which has occurred has in no way affected the officers interested, as the allowances will date from 1st April and are not payable till 1st July.

Mr. J. Rowlands

KILKEE POST OFFICE.

MR. MAGUIRE (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, as he is not prepared to place a post office at Doonaha, County Clare, he will consider the feasibility of some arrangement by which the letters of the inhabitants of that place could be conveyed to Kilkee Post Office?

MR. A. MORLEY: Arrangements are being made for the letters for Doonaha to be conveyed from Kilkee by mail cart, as desired, and the hours of service will be so fixed as to afford an interval for reply by return of post. It is also intended to place a wall letter box at Doonaha Cross.

THE IRISH POSTAL SERVICE.

MR. HORACE PLUNKETT (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what number of letters, newspapers, and parcels were received during the years 1890, 1891, and 1892 from Great Britain for distribution in Ireland, and the number received from Ireland during the same period for distribution in Great Britain?

MR. A. MORLEY: No detailed records are kept of the number of letters, newspapers, &c., distributed in any given part of the United Kingdom in the manner suggested by the question; and it is not, therefore, possible to give the precise information asked for by the hon. Member. To keep such records would be a very costly and laborious proceeding, and would necessarily involve delay in the transit of correspondence. An estimate can be formed of the number of letters, &c. posted and delivered in Ireland in a year; but this would not give any indication of the destination of the letters or of their place of origin.

THE TROOPING OF THE COLOURS.

MR. REES-DAVIES: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what arrangements have been made to enable hon. Members of this House to witness the trooping of the Colours?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The ceremony of trooping the Colours in honour of the Queen's Birthday is entirely controlled by the Brigade of Guards. Neither the War Department nor the Military Authorities within that Department have any share in the management of the arrangements, including the issue of tickets. I am informed that, within the available limits, tickets have been issued to hon. Members of the House applying for them; and I hope that in this way the same facilities will be afforded to hon. Members as on previous occasions.

THE PROGRESS OF THE HOME RULE BILL.

MR. MACFARLANE: I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question of which I have given him private notice. I wish to ask him whether he is aware that there are now 90 Amendments to Clause 3 of the Government of Ireland Bill upon the Paper, and that the Leader of the Opposition has publicly intimated that the chief object of the Amendments is to destroy the Bill; and whether the right hon. Gentleman proposes to take any steps to render this or any other legislation possible?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I hesitated for a moment in order to give the right hon. Gentleman opposite an opportunity of explaining.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me now. I understand that the hon. Gentleman has just asserted that I had stated in public that the object of the Amendments was to destroy the Home Rule Bill. That is undoubtedly the fact; but I did not say that the method by which they were to destroy the Bill was by accumulation of numbers. The way in which we trust to destroy the Bill is by bringing propositions before the House which the House will accept, and which the Government will think inconsistent with the further progress of the Bill.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I do not propose to answer the right hon. Gentleman, except that I may be permitted to say that I think he is a little sanguine, judging from what has occurred thus far, in his expectation that the House is about to adopt a formidable number of Amendments which will be inconsistent with the progress of the Bill. That does not require prolonged reference from me. In answer to my hon. Friend, I may say that I am not surprised that he feels some disappointment and, perhaps, a little impatience at the slow progress that is being made with the Bill. The answer

I make is this—that although, perhaps, I am a little discouraged in the matter of time, yet, like my hon. Friend, I rely very much upon the good sense and equity of the House and its consciousness of what is due and necessary to its own dignity ; and, in these circumstances, it is our desire and intention to proceed with the Bill as we have proceeded with it—that is to say, by doing all we can to shorten discussion by explanation, by conciliation, and by concession, where it may appear to us to be consistent with the objects of the Bill and with the regular and practical consideration of its various provisions.

MR. MACFARLANE : After the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, I should like to be allowed to read the exact words he used, taken from The Times of May 8. He said that he would vote for everything that would improve the Bill and, above all, everything that would destroy the Bill.

THE LATE THOMAS HOLLOWAY'S WILL.

MR. A. C. MORTON : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the will of the late Thomas Holloway, which is said to be an illegal will ; whether he is aware that a previous will left a large sum of money for a convalescent home for the poor of London ; and whether he will instruct the Public Prosecutor to fully investigate the matter ?

MR. ASQUITH : I have no authority to interfere in cases of disputed wills, the validity of which must always be decided by the proper Courts of Law. It is not the duty of the Public Prosecutor to investigate such questions, except upon materials showing a breach of the Criminal Law. If in any case such materials are laid before him he will give them full consideration.

STATUTE LAW REVISION.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that the Statute Law Revision Bill has been before the House for a very considerable time, and that the Second Reading of that Bill is still delayed ; whether he is aware that the sixth and seventh volumes of the Revised Statutes and the triennial volume of the Index is delayed in preparation and publication by the delays in the passing of the Statute Law Revision Bill ; whether he is aware that for more than 30 years past these Bills have been passed by common consent as non-contentious measures ; and whether, in view of the fact that a Committee of both Houses have examined the Bill and passed it, as well as the House of Lords, and that the Bill is drawn in accordance with the Report of the Select Committee which sat last year, he will appeal to hon. Members to pass the Bill without further delay ?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE was understood to say that the Government had no power to secure the passing of the Bill in the face of opposition, although they shared most earnestly the hon. Member's desire that the Bill should become law without further delay.

THORNHILL LEES NATIONAL SCHOOL.

MR. OLDROYD (Dewsbury) : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to the case of a boy, named Sykes, a pupil in the Thornhill Lees Church National School, for whom a free place was claimed by his parents on the re-opening of the school after the Christmas holidays, and who attended without payment of fee until 8th May last ; whether he is aware that the boy was then sent back for his fee, and for the arrears from January last, with an intimation that the arrears might be paid by instalments ; whether a free place can be claimed in cases where tacit consent has been given for so long a period ; and whether the managers of schools are within their legal rights in demanding payment of arrears under such circumstances ?

MR. ACLAND : My attention has been called to this case. The Managers of a school which has the right to charge fees are within their legal rights in re-imposing a fee on a scholar who has been for a time admitted without payment, and in refusing to admit him if he does not pay the fee. But it has been decided by the Courts of Law that Managers have no legal claim in any case to payment of arrears of fees, and the Department would consider that the exclusion of a child for non-payment of arrears was a contravention of the Education Acts. A claim for completely free education may be made on behalf of this as of any other child under the Act of 1891, and the Department would then be bound to secure the provision of a free place for him accordingly.

THE MAGAZINE RIFLE.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has, since the 18th May last, ascertained what modifications have been introduced in the bolt and bolt-head, and also in the magazine, carrier or hopper, of the Lee-Metford magazine rifle, Mark I. pattern; if so, will he state in detail what these modifications are, or produce these parts of the rifle for the inspection of hon. Members of the House who have grave doubts as to the efficiency of Mark I. pattern, which is now in the hands of the troops?

MR. WOODALL: As the hon. Member is aware, the Mark I. rifle was modified in certain details, and all the arms of that improved pattern now in the hands of the troops are known as Mark I. Star. The modifications which resulted in the Mark II. model are chiefly in the bolt, spring, magazine, screws, and bolt-head. They are, however, of a character which it would be difficult to make intelligible in answer to a question in the House of Commons; but if the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty, or any other hon. Member desirous of information, will visit the War Office, the construction of the rifle and the various improvements which have been effected in it shall be explained by competent officers.

A NEWCASTLE EMLYN ASSAULT CASE.

MR. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the discharge of the prisoners Griffiths and Thomas, for the attack on Robert Lewis, by the Cardigan-shire Magistrates, at Newcastle Emllyn, before the evidence for the prosecution had been heard, on the ground that beating a man on the head is not "wounding" if the skin is not actually divided; whether he is aware that neither of the two Magistrates who came to this decision is a lawyer; whether the Treasury have taken any opinion on the legality of this decision; and whether any steps are being taken to bring the offenders to justice?

MR. ASQUITH: I understand that, in this case, the offence charged being wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm, it was contended for the defence that no actual wounding had been proved by the prosecution. The Bench held that the objection must prevail, and the prisoners were discharged. With regard to the second paragraph, I believe that neither Magistrate is a lawyer—not an uncommon case—but no doubt they had the assistance of their Clerk. With regard to the third and fourth paragraphs, I understand that the matter is now being considered by the Public Prosecutor.

MR. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the clerk to the Magistrates is a well-known Nonconformist whose sympathies are with those opposed to the tithes?

An hon. MEMBER: And are not the bulk of the Welsh Magistrates members of the Church of England?

MR. ASQUITH: I believe so.

ARMY PAY AUDITS.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he would explain why, although the whole of the pay for pensioners issued on 1st October, 1892, was audited by 11th March, 1893, the pay for the Army Reserve issued on the same day was not audited till the middle of May, 1893; and whether it would be possible to adopt a plan by which the accounts of one quarter are audited before the issue of pay for the following quarter, in view of the fact that the existing plan causes great inconvenience, and sometimes even loss of money, to officers engaged in the issue of Army Reserve pay?

MR. WOODALL: The difference of the dates of the completion of the audits of these two classes of accounts was due to exceptional circumstances; the examination now goes on pari passu. There would be some difficulty in adopting the plan suggested by the hon. Member, owing to the date at which the accounts are received from the Post Office, by which Department the payments are made; but inquiry will be made as to whether the rendering of these accounts cannot be expedited.

CRIME IN IRELAND — STATE OF COUNTIES CLARE, KERRY, AND LIMERICK.

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House in order to call attention to a definite matter of urgent public importance—namely, “the unchecked growth of serious crime in Ireland, and especially in the Counties of Clare, Kerry, and Limerick, and the failure of the Irish Executive to take any adequate steps for its abatement.”

MR. T. M. HEALY: On a point of Order, may I ask whether on Tuesday last on the Vote on Account hon. Gentlemen had not then a full opportunity [“No, no!”]—had an opportunity—of which they had given notice before Whitsuntide of raising this question? The notice was given before Whitsuntide that after the Recess, on the Vote on Account, they would draw attention to this question, and that not having been done on the Vote on Account, I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, if this can be considered to be a matter of urgent public importance?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: On the point of Order, inasmuch as I had given notice of the Motion to deal with this question on the Vote on Account, perhaps you will allow me to explain that I was unable to do so because of the discussions which came on before the Vote for the Chief Secretary’s Department, and because the Vote was closed.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: As to what the hon. Member has just said, it is true enough; but then progress was reported with the Government of Ireland Bill at 11 o’clock on the night before last expressly with the view to this topic being discussed.

MR. SPEAKER: Of course, as this subject was not discussed it is competent to bring it forward. As to the circumstances stated by the hon. and learned Gentleman, it will be for the House to judge when I ask the House to give leave to bring on the matter.

*MR. SPEAKER then called on those Members who supported the Motion to rise in their places, and not less than 40 having accordingly risen,

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER, in moving the Motion for the Adjournment of the House, said, he did not feel he owed any apology to the House for introducing the subject, though he owed some apology for the fact that the treatment of the subject had not been put into the hands of someone more competent to deal with it than himself. The only qualifications he could claim were that he knew well that portion of the United Kingdom about which he wished to speak; he was most deeply concerned in its welfare, and he felt very deeply the importance of the matter he should bring before the House. An hon. Member who sat near him took a different view, and in reference to this Motion had stated that he and his friends were bored by the reiteration of these facts regarding the commission of crime and outrage in the South and West of Ireland. But the matter he (Mr. Arnold-Forster) should bring forward was a matter which, in his judgment, constituted the very primary duty of the House of Commons, and was infinitely more important than the dead-alive discussion which was taking place upon the already-defunct Home Rule Bill. It related to the protection of the lives and happiness of Her Majesty’s subjects. These things were very real, and there was a special reason why some hon. Member from Ireland should bring them forward. There were very few districts represented in the House of Commons whose Members would not be ready in a moment to bring forward what he had to bring forward if it related to any district in England, Scotland, or the North of Ireland. If such horrors occurred in any of the districts he had indicated they would find the Members who represented them would be the first to bring them forward in that House; but not on one single occasion had any hon. Member representing any one of the districts concerned in the Motion and which had been steeped with this persecution to which he should have to refer come forward and spoken in that House in the interests of those of Her Majesty’s subjects who were subjected to this detestable persecution. If it were the fact that the Constitutional Representatives of these persons did not consider it their duty to bring this matter before the House, it was a reasonable, fair, and just thing that some other Member connected with Ireland, who was not immediately responsible for these districts, but who was connected with them by ties and associations and knowledge, should do what he could from time to time to give voice to these dumb persons who were unable, by their Constitutional Representatives, to speak to that House and remind it and the people of Great Britain what was the suffering that was continuously being inflicted upon these unhappy persons. The hon. Member for North Kerry the other night stated that it was not the business of a Member of that House to act as a private detective; and, as far as he (Mr. Arnold-Forster) could understand, he was to take no active or practical part in the diminution or discouragement of crime.

MR. SEXTON: That is an addition made by the hon. Member to what I said. I would ask him to be good enough to confine himself to what I stated.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said, he had given the practical upshot of what he understood the hon. Member to say; and, as a matter of fact, there had been no executive step taken in that House, or—with a few brief exceptions, he could name on the fingers of one hand—out of that House by hon. Members representing these districts to put a stop to the abominations against which he protested. It was not an unknown thing that hon. Members representing constituencies in which there had been serious and prolonged outbursts of crime should think it their duty to go into their own constituencies and use all their influence and talent, and the great position conferred upon them, to abate and put a stop to such occurrences. In the case of the saw-grinding outrages in Sheffield, there was no person more prompt in his endeavours to bring an end to that unhappy state of affairs than the right hon. Gentleman, Mr. Roebuck, who then represented Sheffield. Again, it would be in the recollection of hon. Gentlemen that it had been attempted by hon. Members of that House on a very recent occasion by their own writing, influence, speeches, and presence, to try and allay passion and diminish violence in the constituency he (Mr. Arnold-Forster) had the honour to represent. The precedent was not, therefore, a new one, and when he said it was part of the duty of an hon. Member to take some share in trying to allay disturbance in a district he represented in that House he was not asking for an extreme or unusual display of vigilance, or the exercise of a duty unknown to that House. In asking that hon. Members who represented those counties should take steps to try and allay disorder there, he was not asking them to do anything unknown in the annals of that House. If hon. Members did not consider it their duty to do so, it became incumbent upon those who were acquainted with the facts to lay them before the House. When right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Government Bench made the great change in their policy with regard to Ireland, some hon. Members hoped that there would be compensation in the shape of a Treaty, like that of Kilmainham, under which hon. Members would undertake, at the instance of the Government, to go down and see that outrages in the South and West of Ireland were controlled and put a stop to. For a time it seemed as though there would be a temporary lull in the commission of outrages in those parts of the country, which would have been some reward, though an altogether inadequate reward, for the action of the Government. There had been a brief cessation of crime, but that cessation had ended. He did not want to put the matter too high or too strongly; but he desired to make it clear to hon. Members who differed from the Party to which he belonged that there was a definite and substantial reason for bringing up this subject again. He would ask those hon. Members to give a friendly ear to the pleadings of those who spoke through him, and to whom the fact that this crime and persecution went on from day to day, and was neither new nor strange, did not make life more tolerable in these counties. Since the last Debate in the House crime had increased, was still increasing, and would, in all probability, continue to increase. A time came when the point of saturation was reached, when crime had done its work, and when the gang who committed it had got what they wanted, and the law of the land was superseded by the law of the gang who had obtained supremacy in these counties. When that time came the necessity for outrage ceased, and outrage became stationary. He believed they were within measurable distance of that point of saturation when there would be a diminution or cessation of crime for which the Chief Secretary for Ireland would claim the credit. That would mean that thousands of things would occur in these counties which would never get into the Police Returns or come to the cognisance of hon. Members in this House. Men and women would gravely say they could not do this or that because So-and-so, the head of this or that association, would object. He wanted the House to interfere before the point of saturation was reached, to say that they would now take cognisance of the fact that crime was increasing and would seize this opportunity of putting a stop to its increase. The Chief Secretary had, he was sure unwittingly, somewhat misled the House, for he had continued in the present Parliament to make a distinction which was real and definite at one time—namely, the distinction between agrarian and non-agrarian outrages in Ireland. It was formerly said that these agrarian outrages were the result of a definite policy in regard to land in Ireland, and that, therefore, they could not be put in the ordinary category of offences against the law.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I beg the hon. Member's pardon. I said the practice had been to classify outrages in that way. I made no change in the classification, although I agree with the hon. Member that it is not a perfect classification.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said, of course, he entirely and absolutely accepted the right hon. Gentleman's explanation. What he desired to make clear was that there was a time when that classification carried weight; but that that time had passed, and nearly all crimes in common had now obtained the protection of the organisation which had formerly protected agrarian crime alone, so that it was at present as impossible to get convictions in the case of non-agrarian crimes as it was previously in the case of agrarian crimes. It was, therefore, his intention to deal with all crime in these particular counties on the same footing, because he would submit that punishment for all crime whatever was in these counties absolutely dead and unenforceable. There was one distinction as between the régime in the past and that of the present, and that was that for the first time, with one brief interval, in the history of the last 20 years, the persons against whom these outrages were committed now felt and believed that they were deserted by the authorities in this country, and that those who were responsible for the administration of the Executive in Ireland were under the control of those persons whom, rightly or wrongly, they identified from their past experience with the authority that had inflicted these outrages upon them. He was far from suggesting that there was any fundamental ground for that belief. What was the justification in the minds of the persons concerned for this belief? A justification did exist, for they saw that in this House the Government depended from day to day for its political existence upon a Party which had been at the bottom of these crimes for years past. This was not a matter in dispute, but a mere common statement in plain English of a plain fact, and when the people in Limerick, Tipperary, and Clare—

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): I rise to Order. I wish to know whether the hon. Gentleman is to be allowed to say that a Party in this House has been at the bottom of these crimes for years past?

*MR. SPEAKER: If I had put that interpretation on what I heard I would certainly have called the hon. Member to Order. He did not, however, say, "A Party in this House." [Cries of "He did."] I would certainly have called the hon. Member to Order if he had said anything of that kind.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.): I beg to say that I distinctly heard the hon. Member say, "A Party in this House." [Cries of "Order!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I have ruled on the point of Order.

MR. W. REDMOND: On a point of Order I beg to say most respectfully that I distinctly heard the hon. Member say those words. [Cries of "Order!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: The words that reached my ears were, "A Party that was at the bottom of these crimes." If the hon. Member had said a Party in this House I should certainly have called him to Order, and the House would have taken a very severe course.

MR. W. REDMOND : Most respectfully, Sir, with reference to what you have stated—namely, that you would have called the hon. Member to Order if he had asserted that any hon. Member of this House was cognisant of crime, I beg to say that the hon. Member has stated that of me in The Times newspaper.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said, what he intended to convey was an expression of the feeling in the minds of the persecuted people in Ireland who saw that the Chief Secretary was now under the Parliamentary control of hon. Gentlemen opposite. Those hon. Gentlemen were associated in their minds with the organisation which was first the Land League and afterwards the National League; and they remembered the statement of the Prime Minister that crime dogged the footsteps of that Association. Whether the belief of these people were correct or not, it existed; and it was natural that they should feel that there was a sinister bearing in the facts as they saw them. This differentiated the case of these counties before the right hon. Gentleman took office from the case of these counties now. He was sure the Chief Secretary was anxious that there should be a diminution of crime in these counties; but he must be aware that he had not taken those steps which would be most calculated to reassure the persons who felt themselves in danger by his action in the House or out of it. Since the beginning of the Session the attitude of the Chief Secretary had been consistently such as to discourage and dishearten every loyal man in Ireland. There had been many occasions on which this fact had been brought under the notice of the House. The first incident in the Session was the statement by the Chief Secretary that there had been over 700 illegal seizures by the officers of the law in Ireland. If that statement had been proved it would have set the whole country-side on fire, and it would have made the administration of the law in the affected counties absolutely impossible. The Chief Secretary made the statement on his official responsibility, but it turned out to be a mere cock-and-bull story. From beginning to end it had never been substantiated; but it did its work. It discouraged everyone who thought that the law had been justly and adequately administered by the right hon. Gentleman. There was, next, the case of the unhappy man Mr. Blood, who had committed no crime against God or man, but who had simply done what was not only his right, but his duty. He had refused to harbour in a house belonging to him a man whom he and the bulk of the community regarded as an assassin. He said to the father of the man that if he continued to allow his son to live with him he should no longer continue the bounty which he gave him. What was the answer of the Chief Secretary in that case? Everybody knew the odium which had been most unjustly attached to the carrying out of the process of eviction in Ireland; and when the Chief Secretary was asked what was the cause of Mr. Blood's persecution, he said it was because Blood had taken part in an eviction. There was nothing like an eviction in the case, and there was no justification for that cruel thrust. There was another example, on which a series of questions had been asked in the House. To all the questions one stereotyped answer had been given—"The facts as stated in the question are correct." When the House realised what that answer meant they would realise his feeling in the matter. The case of Thomas Barry was an example of the animus which dictated the answers, and of the way in which the good intentions of the Chief Secretary were conveyed to those who were persecuted in Ireland. Thomas Barry was a Poor Law Guardian. In a speech he denounced two persons for signing a Petition against the Home Rule Bill. The Chief Secretary was asked whether this was the fact, and whether, in his opinion, the denunciation did not constitute a threat? The right hon. Gentleman soon found an ally. The hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Sexton) jumped up to ask whether it was not the fact that the speech in question was made at a meeting for the promotion of a Poor Law Election. Even if that had been the case it did not matter two straws.

MR. SEXTON : As usual, the hon. Member misrepresents the case. [Cries of "Order!" and "Withdraw!"]

MR. WILSON NOBLE (Hastings) : I rise to ask whether the hon. Member is in Order in saying that another hon. Member mis-represents the facts "as usual" ?

MR. SPEAKER : I see nothing of which I can take notice.

MR. SEXTON said, that the words he had used on the occasion referred to were that Mr. Barry did what he had a perfect right to do, and that at the public meeting, the two persons in question being candidates for the office of Poor Law Guardian, he stated that they had signed a Petition against the Home Rule Bill, and, therefore, ought not to be trusted by the electors.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said, the statement he had just made was absolutely correct, but that whether the meeting were a meeting of the Federation, or a meeting to elect Guardians, his point was unaffected—it did not matter two straws whether the speech was made at a meeting of the Federation or not. The Chief Secretary at once said that he had no doubt that the statement of the hon. Member was correct. The next question he asked was whether, as a matter of fact, the houses of two persons had not been burnt ; and whether these two persons were not those who had been denounced by Thomas Barry ? Then, again, two of the right hon. Gentleman's allies sprang to their feet to ask how the right hon. Gentleman could know anything about it, seeing that no names were mentioned. The right hon. Gentleman, however, knew perfectly well who the men were, and he frankly told the House that he was informed that the persons whose houses were burnt were the persons who had been denounced by Barry for signing a Petition against the Home Rule Bill.

MR. J. MORLEY : How was I informed ?

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said, he did not know who the right hon. Gentleman's informant was ; but the information was precisely the same as his own ; and he did not doubt one informant more than the other. Then he asked the right hon. Gentleman whether, pending the proceedings taken to reimburse the two men for the loss of their burnt premises, Barry was not going about and telling the people of the district to resist inch by inch and to the end the claim for compensation which was to be brought before a competent tribunal ?

MR. SEXTON : And why not ?

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said, the right hon. Gentleman replied that he could not answer the question because the matter was sub judice. His point was that the defending party was making use of public meetings to compel the competent Court to withhold compensation from the injured persons. There was one more question asked—whether it was not the fact that Thomas Barry had been previously convicted ? The right hon. Gentleman would not answer. He said it was hard to go back upon the bad, unhappy past of this man, if there had been a bad, unhappy past. He then asked whether it was not the fact that one of the convictions of Barry in the past had been for precisely the same offence of boycotting ? The right hon. Gentleman could not deny it. If the right hon. Gentleman felt bound to answer questions in this way, and to give the cover of his protection to the persons who were concerned in these outrages, then he must not be surprised if the victims lost the full value of the protection which he was certain the right hon. Gentleman was anxious to give them. He believed that the right hon. Gentleman hated crime ; but the Parliamentary position in which he found himself was a very difficult one. It would be said by some hon. Members that he had no right to bring forward this question unless he was able to show that there had been a serious increase of outrage since the time when the House last considered the matter. He could positively prove that that was the case. The last Debate in the House on the subject was in March. He had details, unfortunately most incomplete, of the occurrences which had taken place since that date. Many cases were not reported, either through the newspapers or through the police. In Clare alone there had been no less than 17 serious outrages committed since March 2. And to that catalogue he had to add another case that had occurred since the matter was brought before the House. These were not matters which could be regarded lightly, and, for his own part, he had never looked upon threatening letters lightly. Not every threatening letter was followed by crime, but there were very few crimes which were not preceded by threatening letters. The class of crime in County Clare to which he referred included the shooting at men at night, the burning of hay, the burning of houses, firing into houses, attacks on houses by moonlighters, and horse-stabbing—and that reminded them of a very melancholy case in regard to which they had had a very unsatisfactory answer from the Chief Secretary—a case in which a woman's husband was brutally murdered in County Clare. A horse was stabbed, and the right hon. Gentleman stated that it was because this unhappy lady had dismissed a man in her employ. But the real reason was that her husband had been murdered, and for that reason alone she was persecuted. He now came to Kerry, and the catalogue was very black and serious there. It included two tons of hay burnt, a moonlighting attack on a farmhouse, a horse poisoned, a house fired into in daylight, a cow killed, damage done to farm railings, a moonlighting attack, a heifer killed, a cow killed, a bullock killed, a cow killed, a moonlighting attack on a house by masked men, two large hayricks burnt, a house fired into at night, one bullet lodging in the wall near the place where two women were sleeping. He now came to Limerick, and in some respects the state of the case there was the most serious of all. The list of crimes included the following :—A house burnt down, nine tons of hay burnt, four tons of hay burnt, a house fired into, a house fired into by moonlighters, a house burnt, house attacked, and so on. He did not pretend that this catalogue was exhaustive of the outrages that had been committed during the time referred to, but it was simply a list of such crimes as had reached him. And what he desired to point out was that though there was nothing new in the black catalogue relating to the Counties of Kerry and Clare, the increase of crime in the County of Limerick was new. Clare had always been what might be called an abnormal county; the same statement in a different way could be made in reference to Kerry, but Limerick had for a long time been free from crime; and when he said that between the date when the present Chief Secretary took office and the present time there had been 17 serious cases of moonlighting in this County of Limerick alone against one in the corresponding period of the preceding 12 months, hon. Members would realise the sort of thing that was in his mind when he brought this matter before them. In the County of Limerick the number of cases of crime had increased during the period he had specified from 1 to 17; in Kerry it had increased from 5 to 12, and in Clare from 10 to 19. Well, what was it the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was doing to meet this increase of crime? The right hon. Gentleman had over and over again thrown up his hands, and said—"What can we do? We are doing everything you can suggest." The House had been frequently told that there was no efficacy in the measures adopted by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. A. J. Balfour) when Secretary for Ireland. He (Mr. Arnold-Forster) denied that statement. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had prepared three efficacious weapons, and of those the present Chief Secretary had deliberately deprived himself. He had said—

"I will not use secret inquiries and change of venue and special juries; and the reason," he said, "I will not use them is, not because I am less opposed to crime than you are, but because these instruments have failed in the hands of those who used them before, and because I believe that they would fail if used now and in the future."

He (Mr. Arnold-Forster) contended that these instruments had not failed in the past, and would not fail in the future. Secret inquiry had not failed. In the County of Kerry, in four cases of murder, the principals had been brought to the gallows, and the participators had been brought to justice and sentenced to periods of imprisonment by means of secret inquiry. He admitted that in the County of Clare it had not resulted in securing convictions, but it had produced an effect quite as important. The Chief Secretary ought to have told the House of this result. He could go down to-morrow to the Chief Constables of Ennis or Tralee, who could give him the names of at least 300 men, known to be concerned in crime, who had been compelled to leave their counties because these secret inquiries had been set on foot and were having their effect in making these men known to the police. It was unfortunate that in his comparisons between the past and the present, which he had indulged in ad nauseam, the right hon. Gentleman had not given the House one single allusion to this very cardinal fact in the situation, the result of which was that the crime in those counties came down by leaps and bounds. True it was that crime had oscillated up and down slightly ; and it was not fair to compare crime of one year with crime of the preceding year. It was necessary to compare the crime which took place before the measures of the late Chief Secretary were taken with the crime which took place afterwards. It would then be found that those measures had been largely efficacious in freeing the country from crime. In Clare crimes went down from 141 in 1886 to 58 in 1890 and 94 in 1891. In Kerry crimes went down from 209 in 1886 to 56 in 1890 and 68 in 1891. In Limerick crimes went down from 80 in 1886 to 30 in 1890 and 17 in 1891. These were important figures, but he did not mean to say that this result was brought about solely by the power of holding secret inquiries. The other powers contained in the Crimes Act, which were concurrent with it, also had effect. There was, for instance, the power of change of venue. The Chief Secretary passed the matter over, but it had been eminently successful. In Clare alone, in 30 cases affecting 69 persons, 32 persons were convicted. In 44 cases in Kerry, affecting 87 persons, 46 convictions were obtained. In 41 cases in Limerick, affecting 65 persons, 28 convictions were obtained. It could not be said that these people were unfairly tried or that anything but justice was meted out to them ; and, therefore, what had been done in the past could be done now and in the future. When the right hon. Gentleman deliberately deprived himself of these instruments, he was, pro tanto, contributing to the lawlessness in these three counties. He (Mr. Arnold-Forster) had before him the figures showing the results of the Courts held in these counties, which showed that they had been most successful. In Kerry, in 1887, there were 19 Courts held and 32 convictions obtained ; in 1888, 41 Courts and 96 convictions ; in 1889, 24 Courts, and 23 convictions ; and in 1891, three Courts—all that were required—and four convictions. In Clare, in 1887, there were 19 Courts held and 37 convictions obtained ; in 1888, 46 Courts and 134 convictions ; in 1889, 10 Courts and 50 convictions ; and in 1891, nine Courts and eight convictions. He was not blind to the fact that a large number of persons who ought to have been convicted were not convicted, and to that extent he (Mr. Arnold-Forster) was prepared for the exposure and censure of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. But that was a calamity he deplored as much as the right hon. Gentleman could, and he maintained that, to a large extent, these Courts were successful. In a few days or weeks the Assizes in Clare, Limerick, and Kerry would be coming on. What would be the use of trying prisoners at those Assizes ? Everybody knew, and no one better than the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, that it would be an absolute waste of time to try them there ; for two reasons : In the first place, past experience showed that convictions were not likely to be the result of such trials, whether the cases were agrarian or non-agrarian. There was also the additional fact that the persons who were called on to serve on the juries and to act as witnesses in these counties had been continually and deliberately commanded by persons belonging to that Party in Ireland supporting the present Chief Secretary to commit perjury in the jury and witness-boxes. Jurors and witnesses were exposed to terrible outrage, and were threatened for performing their duty according to their oaths. Cases of this kind had been published in the papers, and it was not to be expected that men in these counties, with the slack hand of the Secretary for Ireland affording them no protection, would come forward and take all the risks of doing their duty when they knew very well the fate that would wait upon them as a result. He should be told that all this was the natural outcome of the system that prevailed in the country. But was that the fact ? It was not beside the mark to remind hon. Members that this was not the outcome of the system of law under which the Irish people as a whole lived. He found that last year the number of agrarian crimes committed in Clare was 57, in Limerick 56, and in Kerry 61 ; while in Antrim, including the City of Belfast, it was one, in Down it was five, in Londonderry none, and in Armagh two, although these districts were under exactly the same system of government as the others. The right hon. Gentleman, therefore, could not contend that there was anything in the existing condition of things in Ireland that naturally produced these outbreaks of crime. The right hon. Gentleman had said that he had done all in his power to put down what was practically becoming a reign of terror in those districts, and he had taunted the Members of the late Government with having themselves reduced the police force of County Clare. But at that very time the right hon. Gentleman held in his hands the actual words of the Grand Jury, in which they asked for an increase of the police force of the county. The late Government had filled up many vacancies, and had brought up the police force to within 15 of its former strength. The right hon. Gentleman, however, was perfectly aware that he might increase the police force of the district as much as he pleased, and that any steps he might take in that direction would be utterly ineffectual, unless he supplemented them with further action. He suggested to the right hon. Gentleman that he should take that further action. He asked the right Gentleman whether he would not make use of some of those weapons that still remained in his hand in order to put an end to the deplorable state of things which he himself admitted existed in these districts. The right hon. Gentleman had said that crime was confined to a very small area in Ireland. He ventured very respectfully to differ from the right hon. Gentleman. He had gone over the localities in which these crimes and outrages had been committed, and he had found that, so far from their being confined to one locality or centred round one spot, they were distributed over an area of 40, 50, or 60 miles, and over the length and breadth of the three Counties of Kerry, Limerick, and Clare. Even if the crimes centred round one place, it would be all the more desirable to make some effort to put an end to the plague spot and to crush out the crime of which the right hon. Gentleman acknowledged the existence. He (Mr. Arnold-Forster) acknowledged the difficulties under which the right hon. Gentleman laboured, and he hoped he had not spoken lightly or disrespectfully of the work the right hon. Gentleman had undertaken, but he knew there must be times when the Chief Secretary was as sick of this state of things as anyone else, and it was to be hoped he would determine that, however bad this state of things had been in the past, it was, at any rate, his duty now to adopt whatever measures were necessary to protect the lives and liberties of Her Majesty's subjects.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Arnold-Forster.)

MR. J. MORLEY : I do not complain of the action of the hon. Member in calling the attention of the House to the condition of certain parts of Ireland, but I do think that both the House and the Government have a right to take exception to the conduct of the hon. Member in not having availed himself of the opportunity that was offered to him, and deliberately offered to him, for bringing this subject—which is not an unimportant one—forward on Tuesday night. Up to 11 o'clock that night we were engaged in discussing a variety of matters of third-rate importance.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL : Hear, hear !

MR. J. MORLEY : I am glad the hon. Member for South Tyrone assents to that statement. At 11 o'clock that night we adjourned the Debate to enable an hon. Member to bring forward a subject of which he had given notice before the Whitsuntide Recess. There is one other thing I must complain of—namely, that the hon. Member has been guilty of a want of good faith and sincerity in describing these as matters of urgent public interest, when really one-half of his speech was directed to old matters which were discussed and disposed of in the course of the five or six Votes of Censure brought forward against the Irish administration of the Government before the Easter Recess. My defence or reply to the hon. Member will be shorter but not of a less substantial character than the hon. Member's attack. What was the hon. Member's point? It was that, because there has been a change of Government and a change of policy, the moonlighters of Clare and Kerry ought to have at once become the supporters of law and order. The hon. Member says he had hoped that our accession to the Irish Government would have led to a cessation of crime and outrage. He gave a reason for it exactly opposite to what Members of the late Government gave for expecting a decline of crime in Ireland. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite stated their belief that crime would decrease in Ireland, because those who were in working alliance with the Government now, and who had hitherto taken no part in the repression of crime, would have every motive to restrain the disorder and crime that prevailed. Her Majesty's Government are not at all ashamed to avow that a working alliance has been formed between themselves and hon. Members below the Gangway opposite. But the hon. Member who brought this subject forward said that that alliance is the reason for the prevalence of disorder in Ireland. The hon. Member said that the comparisons which the present Government made ad nauseam between the amount of agrarian crime in Ireland that prevailed after their accession to Office and that which existed under the administration of the late Government was unsound, because there were many kinds of non-agrarian crime which might have an agrarian significance. Well, I admit that there are many kinds of non-agrarian crime which are almost as significant of a bad state of social order as the prevalence of agrarian crime. I go with the hon. Member to some extent on that matter. I do not undervalue the figures which show an increase of non-agrarian crime, but the Committee must not lose sight of the fact that it is the figures of agrarian crime which, after all, are of the first order of importance. What are the facts as to these Counties of Clare, Limerick, and Kerry? I should like the House to know that the quantity and volume of agrarian crime in Ireland, which began to decline under the late Government, has continued to decrease under the present Administration. The number of agrarian outrages since I came into the office of Chief Secretary, excluding threatening letters—which have been excluded from all my categories—compared with the number in the corresponding period of 1891-2, shows a decrease of 31, and that decrease has not been attended by any increase in virulence of type, for there has not been a single agrarian murder in the whole of Ireland since the accession of the present Government.

Mr. J. Morley

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What is the comparison between the first six months of this year and the first six months of last year?

MR. J. MORLEY: I have not arranged the figures in that way. I have taken the figures from August 27, 1892, when the present Government came into Office, and have compared them with the figures for the similar period of 1891-2. During the earlier of those periods there was, I believe, one agrarian murder as compared with none in our period. The hon. Member referred to the maiming of cattle in Clare—a peculiarly foul and cowardly form of outrage. What has happened in respect to that? In this class of crime there has been a fall from 38 to 19, showing that these outrages have been only one-half as frequent under the present Administration as they were in the time of the late Government. So much for the general case all over Ireland. I now pass to the particular counties which the hon. Member has referred to. It is quite true that in Clare, Kerry, Limerick, and North Cork there has been an increase in the number of offences, which are unscientifically classified as moonlighting offences.

An hon. MEMBER: Whiteboy offences.

MR. J. MORLEY: Yes; Whiteboy offences committed at night. I suppose they are called "moonlighting," because when the offences are committed at night that name strikes the imagination more, but I should be glad if the more correct classification were recognised. I feel it would be difficult to get people interested in crime in Ireland to adopt it. There are two plague spots in which these Whiteboy offences have shown that which I trust is but a passing and temporary recrudescence. One of those areas is in Clare, within about 10 miles of Ennis; the other is included in the wild districts of Kerry, Limerick, and North Cork, where night raids have been of recurring prevalence at any time during the last 10 years. But it would be a great mistake to suppose that even in those parts the figures mean a general rise of disorderly spirit. There has, in fact, been a decline of agrarian crime in the Counties of Cork, Kerry, and Clare. We will take the County of Clare. It is not my fault that I am obliged to go through some of the figures which I have already given upon former occasions. In County Clare, upon which the hon. Member lays most stress, there has been seven years' steady decline in agrarian crime. The figures are 52, 48, 32, 30, 33, 33, and, in our own period, 27; so that the figure is now six below that at which it stood when the late Government thought they were quite safe in removing from County Clare some of the most operative portions of the Crimes Act. The agrarian crime in the County of Clare is now 20 per cent. lower than it has been at any time since 1886. It is true that there has been a rise of non-agrarian crime in that county from 46 in 1891-2 to 64 in 1892-3. That, I admit, is an important fluctuation, but exactly similar fluctuations took place in 1889-90 and the following year, when the number of these crimes in Clare rose from 41 to exactly the figure it is now—namely, 64. The offences which the police authorities with some reluctance have classified as moonlighting rose from 10 in 1891-2 to 20 in 1892-3; but it should be noted that these are local in character, the area being some 10 miles from Ennis, and 18 of the 20 occurred in three places—Corofin, Ennis, and Tulla. There has been a considerable decline in agrarian crime and certain fluctuations in non-agrarian crime in Kerry. In Kerry the cases of agrarian crime had gone down from 22 to 20, whilst cases of non-agrarian crime had increased from 55 to 61. Therefore, putting the two together, there has been a total increase of 4 in the cases of crime. I think that those who are conversant with Irish affairs will agree with me that this is not a very serious change. Moonlighting offences show a rise of from 7 to 13, but they all took place in one district. Agrarian crime in the troublesome County of Kerry has never been so low since 1876. Taking both the East and the West Riding, and combining the agrarian and the non-agrarian cases, the figures are 111 in 1891-2, and 102 in 1892-3. I come now to the County of Limerick, which I admit is, in some parts of it, in a state very far from satisfactory, as there has been an increase under every head. But, after all, except under one head, there has been no cause for anything like great anxiety. There has been an increase in agrarian offences from 11 to 15, and in non-agrarian offences from 25 to 51, whilst the cases of moonlighting have increased from 1 to 19. Here, again, the increase is confined almost exclusively to a not very large district adjoining the district I have already referred to. But let the House mark this—that, out of these moonlighting cases, 7 occurred in a single week in last April, and since the 23rd of April there has not been a single moonlighting outrage in the county. From the 23rd of April to the 28th of May Limerick, as far as moonlighting goes, shows a completely clean sheet. Does not this show that these rushes of crime are not to be ascribed to the failure of any method of government?

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said, he thought there had been several cases of moonlighting in the County of Limerick since the date mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman. On the 17th of last month some hay was burnt, and on the same date a horse was attacked by moonlighters, and shots were fired.

MR. J. MORLEY: Our figures are, at least, as much to be relied upon as those of the hon. Member; and, therefore, until the hon. Member can prove his cases, I shall insist that my figures are correct.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: Perhaps I may give my authority. It is The Limerick Leader, a paper which, I think, represents hon. Members opposite.

MR. J. MORLEY: I did not know that the hon. Member thought that a paper representing hon. Members opposite was a good authority. At all events, I prefer to rely upon my own figures.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It does not represent us at all.

MR. J. MORLEY: The Return from the 1st to the 27th May in the County of Limerick is a nil Return.

MR. W. REDMOND (Clare, E.): The Limerick Leader is as good a paper as The Freeman's Journal.

MR. J. MORLEY: Well, there is this extraordinary fact—that you had seven or eight moonlighting cases in the County of Limerick in a week, followed by a complete cessation of that class of offences. Does not that show that this was merely one of those rushes of crime which did occur in Ireland, have occurred there, and which for some time, whatever form of government you have, are not likely to come to an end? If the House is going to judge the Government by fluctuations in offences, it must realise how these fluctuations have occurred in the past. In 1892, there were 15 moonlighting offences in Limerick in July, in August there were 3, in September 16, in December 14; in January, 1893, there were 3, in February 13, in March 9, and in April 22. Well, the state of things is undoubtedly unsatisfactory in Limerick, and I have admitted on several occasions that in Clare the condition is not satisfactory, whilst in North Kerry it is not what we desire to see it. But when the hon. Member says that all this has been brought about by a change of Government and by a feeling on the part of the people in these counties that they have got a Government in power which does not care whether crime is committed or not, I must point out that there is no foundation for such an assertion. With all due respect to the hon. Member, I cannot but think he knows that the disorganisation, as far as it prevails in Clare, is an old matter, whilst I have shown that in Limerick it is one of those temporary rushes which have occurred before, and which we may hope, under vigorous, firm, and proper measures, will disappear. He says that we cannot resort to firm and vigorous measures, because we have no Crimes Act. Let us look at that point for a moment. The hon. Member read a great number of figures as to the convictions obtained in the Summary Jurisdiction Courts; but he forgot to tell the House that the late Government dropped the clause by which the Summary Jurisdiction Court was constituted. As I pointed out in the former Debate on this subject, when the late Government revoked the Proclamation which placed Clare under that provision of the Crimes Act, they drew the teeth of the Act. At all events, it was the late Government and not us that was responsible for the dropping of that power. Then with regard to change of venue there may be circumstances in which change of venue may secure the doing of justice which otherwise could not be done. We have change of venue in England, and there are provisions in the Irish law for change of venue.

Mr. J. Morley

MR. CARSON (Dublin University): Not under such conditions as exist at present.

MR. J. MORLEY: Well, we will see about that. The object of change of venue is to secure the conviction of the prisoner. Yes; but the weakness of the Government and of the police in the County of Clare is not that they cannot get prisoners convicted; the great difficulty is to get your prisoner. The reason they cannot arrest men is that people are afraid of giving evidence. That is not affected by change of venue applied to a prisoner when you have got him. I quite admit that people will not give evidence because they are afraid of the intimidatory public opinion around them. Before you can send a prisoner for trial you must have him brought before local Magistrates, and committed by such Magistrates after the hearing of evidence. I should like any lawyer to explain how change of venue would decrease this difficulty.

MR. CARSON: There were seven prisoners at the last Clare Assizes.

MR. J. MORLEY: I will just add this. If I thought a change of venue would have the effect which the hon. Member, contrary to the experience of the last 10 years, says it would have, and would clear Clare and Kerry of these ruffians, does he suppose that because I have said again and again that either change of venue or exceptional legislation is undesirable in Ireland, I should refrain from pressing on my Colleagues in the House the advisability of making a change? Well, as I have said, there are some unsatisfactory conditions in these counties; but there is reason to believe that they are of a temporary and passing character. All the authorities concerned are doing their duty to the full, and I am glad to hear the expression of the hon. Member's opinion that the police are working just as energetically and as faithfully under the present Government as they worked under the Government of the right hon. Gentleman. Every step is being taken in reference to personnel and method that experience, judgment, or sense of responsibility can induce us to take, and the hon. Member has shown no justification for the serious step he has thought fit to take in moving the Adjournment of the House.

{*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, he thought he could convince the House that it had not been mis-spending its time that afternoon, for since the Debate commenced he had received a telegram from Ennis which probably the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had heard nothing about. At all events, the right hon. Gentleman had told the House nothing about it, and had stated that there had been no murder in Clare. The telegram he had received read as follows :—

“About noon, to-day, Weldon Moloney, solicitor, of Dublin, agent to Moloney trustees in this county, was fired at and wounded near Tulla, close to where Perry was shot.”

Therefore, if there had been no murder, there had been an attempt to murder that very day, and it was no fault of the criminals that their hands had not been stained with murder. Why had not the right hon. Gentleman stated in his speech what had taken place within seven miles of Ennis that afternoon? The right hon. Gentleman had said that this question ought to have been raised on Report of Supply. Well, hon. Members were prevented from raising the question on the Vote on Account, in the first place, because they were shut out by other Members who had precedence; and, in the second place, because the Debate was closed. With regard to Report of Supply, the hon. Member for Kingston (Sir R. Temple) had asked the Prime Minister whether he would adjourn the Debate on the Government of Ireland Bill a little before midnight, so as to allow time for a brief discussion on education on the Vote on Account, and the time was occupied with this subject. He was not going over the weary catalogue of crimes further than this. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had declared that, from his information, there had been no case of moonlighting or agrarian crime in County Limerick since April 23rd. He would give four cases, with the names of the people and the nature of the outrages, which had occurred in the county since that date, and would ask the right hon. Gentleman to inquire into them. On May 2nd the house of John Walsh was fired into, and on May 17th hay belonging to Mary English was burned and a cowhouse belong to Mary Richardson was destroyed, and the house of Owen Hegarty was fired into.

MR. J. MORLEY said, he had already explained that the police classified as moonlighting offences only offences that occurred at night. Those which the hon. Member had given occurred in the daytime.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, the right hon. Gentleman gave the House the impression that the County of Limerick had been free from crime since the date he named. These crimes were simple ruffianism, and the official classification had no bearing upon the point. Leaving the crime itself, he asked, What had the right hon. Gentleman done since Mr. Justice O'Brien declared that property and life had no protection in the County of Clare? Since he came into Office the right hon. Gentleman had removed the County Inspector, a tried and efficient officer, who had the whole of the strings in his hands. He had removed the Head Constable, a man who knew every rascal in the County of Clare. The right hon. Gentleman had dealt with crime in Clare by removing the police officials who knew all its ramifications and putting in their place men who knew nothing about it—he meant that they had no local knowledge. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that the change of venue was of no use, that the difficulty was to catch the criminal. That was only half the truth. The right hon. Gentleman knew that change of venue had been of great use. He knew that in Kerry three murderers had been tracked down by means of the secret inquiry and convicted by means of a change of venue. There were criminals at the last Assizes in Clare and Limerick, but they were not convicted because the jurors were afraid to do their duty. He would read a few sentences of the teaching that jurors had received in the past—

“We look to the Irish jurors this winter to teach this cowardly, cut-throat Government of ours a lesson never to be forgotten. The Irish jurors can do it, and we dare swear they will. Our Irish jurors are the one barrier that stands between us and absolute and undiluted despotism. What a paradise of tyrants the island would be if it were not for juries. . . . The jury system is on its trial this winter. Every juror that is sworn or challenged is on his trial. Let him show what of manhood he has in him. We are not of those who hide our meanings under metaphors, transparent or opaque. The Government means to try a number of innocent men this winter, and it dares hope for a verdict of guilty. The hope is an insult to Irish jurors. Let there be no beating about the bush. We don't want and we won't wait to hear the unintelligible jargon of an indictment, the long, reckless rigmarole of constabulary evidence, the solemn platitudes of prosecuting counsel and prosecuting Judge. We know the whole story by heart, and so does the country. Hurley, Saunders—fortsmen, and Tully have already appeared before the bar of Irish public opinion, and already in every honest Irishman's heart the verdict of 'Not Guilty' has been pronounced. The Judge has no hold on him (the juror); the whole power of the British Constitution has no hold on him. He is responsible only to his own conscience and to his country for his verdict. He tries and is tried, and as he judges others he shall himself be judged."

That language was written in a paper edited by a man who sat on the opposite side of the House at that moment. And if jurors dared to do their duty, and brought in verdicts the justice of which had never been questioned, the panel was published and sent all over Ireland, in order that the jurors should be marked and their businesses destroyed. What right had they to wonder that these poor Clare farmers, with cattle to maim, hay to burn, and houses to be fired into, had not the courage which the Chief Secretary himself had not got? He would ask the right hon. Gentleman this question. The Assizes were coming on. There were men in custody for serious crimes in Clare, Limerick, and Kerry. Was the right hon. Gentleman going through the old farce of sending these people to be tried by Kerry, Clare, and Limerick jurors? If so, he was practically an accessory to these crimes. The Chief Secretary had often said that secret inquiry had failed. He could not take up that position now. A Return had been issued that morning giving the result of every secret inquiry that had taken place under the Act of 1887. It was quite true that in the three cases in which a secret inquiry was held in County Clare it failed, but that did not mean that it produced no good result, because he had it on good authority that contemporaneously with the sitting of those secret inquiries many men of bad character left County Clare and left Ireland. What were the facts as to the operation of the secret inquiry in the Counties of Kerry and Limerick? In the County of Kerry seven inquiries were held, four cases being murder cases, and in only one did the inquiry fail. In three out of the four murder cases conviction and execution followed the inquiry. What, then, was the use of the right hon. Gentleman's getting up and saying that the power of holding a secret inquiry was a failure? In the only case in which it was put into operation in the County of Limerick it was successful in producing evidence sufficient to bring the criminals to justice. Then there was the question of special jurors. He could quite understand that the right hon. Gentleman had no affection for them. What had been the result of trials by special jurors? In almost every case from Kerry in which the venue was changed and the trial took place before special jurors conviction took place. When the right hon. Gentleman had such powers at command, he had no right to stand up at the Table and say that the Government were doing all that they could to put an end to these crimes. The method of the right hon. Gentleman in dealing with crime was curiously illustrated by an answer he gave that day when he brought under the right hon. Gentleman's notice the case of the Sarsfield Branch of the National League. In that case a man entered into possession of what was called an evicted farm. The National League and the National Federation met in the City of Limerick and passed resolutions denouncing the man by name, by which they declared that unless he gave up the farm and conformed to popular opinion his name would be sent by circular all through the county and the South of Ireland, and a newspaper article declared that if the man did not take that "quiet warning" he must take the consequences. What did that mean? It meant that that man was marked out for popular displeasure, that he was to be ruined in his business. All the right hon. Gentleman said was that he did not think from the information he had that the case was likely to turn out serious, but that the police were keeping an eye on it. If that man was shot, what would be the good of the policeman's eye? Had any body of citizens the right to meet in that public and unabashed way and denounce a man and hold him up to this punishment? If they had not that right, why did the Chief Secretary sit there and allow it to go on? In this part of Ireland life was practically intolerable to a large number of people. A man went to a fair and quarrelled with some one over the price of some beasts ; he was probably shot on his way home. [Cries of "Oh!"] Oh! There was nothing more probable. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for West Islington had no right to be disorderly.

*MR. LOUGH : I have no intention of being disorderly. The hon. Member made a statement about the probability of a man, who had disputed about the price of a beast in a fair in Ireland, being shot on his way home. An hon. Member behind me said it was perfectly true, and I turned round and said that it was not true, as I had bought and sold more cattle at fairs in Ireland than the whole of the Members on the Bench on which he was sitting had ever bought or sold there.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL : The hon. Member evidently did not find it a very profitable business, because he left Ireland long ago.

*MR. LOUGH : That statement, like many which come from the same quarter, is perfectly untrue. I have not left Ireland ; I spend part of every year in Ireland. I have a house in Ulster, and I question if the hon. Member who has challenged me, and who represents an Ulster constituency, has got as good means of knowing the facts as that gives me.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he would resume his argument. He asserted that the state of the counties under discussion was a disgrace to the Government of the country. The Government could, if they chose to exercise the powers they possessed, make an end, in a month, of the present state of things, and every one of these rascals could be hunted out of Ireland, if they were not brought to justice. This was not agrarian crime nor non-agrarian crime. It was sheer ruffianism, and for the Chief Secretary to have any scruple about applying the Crimes Act, or any other Act, to put down that ruffianism was unworthy of an English Minister.

MR. W. REDMOND (Clare, E) said, he did not propose to stand between the House and the Division, which he supposed must come, for more than a moment, because it appeared to him quite evident that, although the interest of hon. Gentlemen opposite in the condition of those counties might be great, their interest in postponing the Bill for the better government of Ireland was even greater. ["Oh!" and cheers.] He made that statement advisedly, for this reason. The condition of Clare, as could be discovered by a study of the statistics of crime committed in that county, was to-day undoubtedly better than it had been for the last few years of the late Administration. When the late Government were in power, they had no Debate about the condition of Clare, although it was undoubtedly worse than at the present time. However, he would only say a few words, for the reason that he had been referred to in connection with the condition of the county which he represented by the hon. Gentleman who moved the Adjournment. He differed from the hon. Member for West Belfast and those who sat round him. They were opposed to him on the broad political issues of the day. They believed in the present system of governing Ireland, while he had all his life been a strong believer in the necessity of Home Rule. But he asked whether it was not possible for hon. Members representing Ireland, Unionists as well as Nationalists, to discuss the great questions of the day with reference to Ireland without descending so low as to accuse some of them, in so many words, that they were in direct sympathy with crime and outrage in Ireland? He had attacked Unionist Members bitterly for the past 10 years for their political opinions ; but he had never charged any one of them with either sympathy with, or the responsibility for, outrages and murder. When outrages had been committed in Ulster, and when these outrages had been denounced by hon. Members from Ulster, he had accepted their denunciations, because he thought it would be a most unworthy thing to charge a fellow-countryman with a thing so base as sympathy with crime. The most irritating circumstance in a matter of this kind was the tone adopted by Unionist Members. The hon. Member who had last spoken referred sneeringly to what was called "the Union of Hearts." He did not know whether or not it was desirable, in the opinion of those hon. Members, that the old feeling of bitterness between Englishmen and Irishmen should cease ; but he could assure Englishmen in all parts of the House who were anxious by Home Rule or some other means to establish a better state of feeling between England and Ireland in the future than had existed in the past, that it could not be brought about by adopting the course of stating, almost in so many words, that a large section of Irishmen were in sympathy, direct or indirect, with outrages which had been condemned by all Parties in the country. If the Irish Members or any of them were responsible, by word or action, in the slightest degree, for any crime committed in Ireland, why had they not been made amenable? Many of them had been imprisoned under the Coercion Act, but not one of them had ever been made amenable to the law, simply because it could not be done, for there were no Members of the House more free from crime and outrage than the Nationalist Members. He was not going to justify any crime which had been committed in his constituency. He had stated repeatedly that these outrages were of an infamous character, and ought to be put down by every person who had the means of doing so, for those crimes were injuring the Irish people, and every man he knew in his constituency agreed with him in the matter. But though they might sneer at the statement, he would repeat that with evictions and notices of evictions outrages increased in Ireland; and he would say, further, that were it not for the Nationalist Representatives who came there year after year and voiced on the floor of the House the grievances of the Irish people, and forced from the Legislature Land Act after Land Act which had brought peace and contentment to the Irish people, there would have been 20 outrages for every one which had unfortunately occurred during the last 10 years in Ireland. He declared that, so far from the Nationalist Members encouraging outrage in Ireland, their actions in the House of Commons had restored the country to a condition of peace and tranquillity greater than it had ever enjoyed for many years. He wished hon. Gentlemen who pinned their faith to the present policy of the Government with regard to Ireland to note the fact that with all the anxiety of Unionist Members to display the condition of Ireland as black as possible, they had only been able to find something to complain of in three counties out of the whole of Ireland. That proved that the general condition of Ireland was thoroughly satisfactory. With regard to the three counties in question, it should be mentioned that other figures besides figures of crime could be quoted. He found, for instance, that in Clare for the quarter ending March, 1893, no less than 209 notices of eviction had been served under the 7th section of the Land Act of 1887. He did not say that these notices of eviction were a justification for the outrages in Clare, but they were a reason for these outrages; and he would like to know what would be the effect on even the most peaceable county in England or Scotland if the people were served right, left, and centre with these eviction notices as his people had been served in the County of Clare? The fact was that eviction and crime had always gone hand in hand in Ireland, and eviction and crime would continue to go hand in hand in Ireland, and the best way to put down crime in Ireland was by going to the root of the grievance, and put down evictions, for when the Irish counties were as free from evictions as the English counties they would be as free from crime as the English counties. Then, again, Clare was in a 20 per cent. better condition than it was in 1886; and he wished to know how, in face of that statement, it could be said that Clare was in an alarming condition? He would only say, in conclusion, that he was just as much opposed to crime and outrage as the hon. Member for West Belfast; but while he denounced the moonlighter, he would also condemn the landlords who showered eviction notices on the people and levelled their homes. It had been said by the hon. Member for West Belfast that if he only took the trouble he could have brought the malefactors in Clare to justice. That was a most unworthy assertion, and an assertion which he believed the hon. Member would feel in calmer moments that he had no right to make. He knew no more of these outrages and crime than the hon. Member for West Belfast himself. But he knew that the people of Clare had suffered harsh treatment—that they were now threatened with eviction; and he appealed to the Government, when they turned their attention to Clare, not to ignore the fact that the condition of the county was due to the serving of these notices, which had been so well described as "sentences of death."

MR. CARSON (Dublin University) : I only desire to intervene in the Debate for a few moments in consequence of some matters more or less personal to me introduced by the Chief Secretary. I think the right hon. Gentleman has entirely misapprehended the scope and the nature of this Debate, and I think, also, that he has given no answer whatever to the charges that have been brought forward against the Government by the hon. Member who moved this Motion. The matter in reference to which this Debate is conversant is the increase of agrarian crime that has taken place in these three counties in Ireland since the last discussion upon the subject in March last. The right hon Gentleman is amply prepared with the statistics of Irish crime in 1892 ; but he has none to give the House in relation to that crime between March last and the present time, although he has been warned by us in this House, and by the Judges of Assizes in March last that there would be fresh outbursts of crime, unless steps were taken to prevent them in these particular counties. The right hon. Gentleman admits that since the present Government came into Office there has been an increase of moonlighting in Kerry from 10 to 20 cases, in Clare of from 7 to of 15 cases, and in Limerick of from 1 to 17 cases. That is a most alarming condition of affairs to anyone who knows the condition of the country, and the manner in which these crimes extend from one county to another. But the right hon. Gentleman says that, after all, these moonlighting cases have nothing to do with agrarian crime. Then, what kind of crimes are they ? The right hon. Gentleman says they are not classed as agrarian crimes. But how is the classification made ? The truth is that unless the police are able to obtain information that an outrage committed by moonlighters arose out of an agrarian dispute they return it as being non-agrarian. Therefore these moonlighting outrages may or may not be agrarian cases, as the police have no information on the subject. Indeed, the probability is that nearly all these moonlighting outrages are agrarian crimes, although they are classified as being non-agrarian. In these circumstances it cannot be successfully contended that the amount of agrarian crime has been reduced since the present Government came into power. In view of this state of things, surely we have a right to ask the Government what steps they are taking to put an end to moonlighting in Ireland ? The right hon. Gentleman says—"We will not take your advice !" We then ask, "What are you doing ?" and he is unable to give us any answer. There still stands upon the Statute Book an Act of Parliament giving the Government the power to change the venue of a trial which under the Constitution the right hon. Gentleman is bound to use if the necessity for it arises. The right hon. Gentleman says that a change of venue would be absolutely useless in these cases ; but I think that the statistics adduced by the hon. Member for South Tyrone entirely disproves the right hon. Gentleman's assertion. I ask the right hon. Gentleman—and it is a serious question—can he find a single instance of a conviction in a serious agrarian outrage case in a local venue since the passing of Lord O'Hagan's Act in 1872 ? I assert that since that Act, relating to juries, was unfortunately passed for Ireland, there has not been, in a serious agrarian case, a conviction obtained in a local venue and before an ordinary local jury. What is the remedy against that state of affairs ? Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to assert in this House that there is no remedy in the case of agrarian crime ? There are in the Cabinet, besides the right hon. Gentleman himself, two right hon. Gentlemen who have been Chief Secretaries for Ireland, one being the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, and the other being the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Scotland, and both of them immediately after their return to this country from Ireland stated as the result of their experience that ordinary juries could not be trusted to give just verdicts in cases of agrarian crimes. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War said—and his words are exactly applicable to the present condition of affairs in Ireland—

"The key of the whole question was this : that in many parts of Ireland, for certain classes of offence, especially offences of an agrarian character, they could not trust the ordinary class of jurymen to do their duty partly from ignorance, partly from prejudice, but greatly owing to the system of terrorism under the National League."

The right hon. Gentleman went on to say—

"They could not be sure, even with the clearest evidence, of being able to obtain a verdict."

And he added—

"The provisions for change of venue and special juries might very well be made the law of the land."

I could quote also in exactly the same terms from speeches by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Scotland. I might even quote from a speech on the subject made by that right hon. Gentleman after the introduction of the Home Rule Bill of 1886. No doubt both of those right hon. Gentlemen have changed their opinions with regard to Home Rule; but their change of opinion cannot change their experiences while they held the high Office of Chief Secretary for Ireland. In addition to this, I might quote the words of the Prime Minister himself. In introducing the Home Rule Bill of 1886, the right hon. Gentleman said that it was impossible if a trial took place in a local venue to obtain a conviction, because the people who formed the local juries took a different view from other people as regards the criminality of agrarian crimes. Now, if these right hon. Gentlemen and the Judges of Assize take this view of the point, it is utterly ridiculous and futile for the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to assert that changing the venue in such cases would be absolutely useless. I say that you may have your police; you may have your detectives; you may have your Resident Magistrates; but the whole machinery of the Irish Government will totter to its foundation unless criminal trials in Ireland are fairly conducted by a change of venue. The right hon. Gentleman says that there is a right to change the venue at Common Law. I should like the right hon. Gentleman to try it. My experience of these applications is that if you go before the Court and rely on the general condition of a county as reason why it would be impossible to obtain a fair trial the Court will say—"You must go to Parliament. Parliament has given the local venue for the trial of those cases." But even if the Court could be induced to change the venue at

Common Law in certain particular cases of intimidation, the result, as you will find recorded in the Irish law cases, would be that the jury panel would be reduced to 24; and, inasmuch as the prisoner would have a right to challenge 20 out of that number, there would only be four jurymen left to try him. I hope, therefore, that we shall hear no more of this right to change the venue at Common Law. The right hon. Gentleman says you must catch your prisoner before you can try him; but if there is anything which more than another is the cause of the reluctance of the people to give evidence it is the fact that though they may give evidence the prisoner will not be convicted. Unless a prisoner is convicted the last state of the witnesses against him will be worse than the first; and, therefore, unless witnesses believe that the trial will be a fair one, they will decline to give evidence against a prisoner. On the other hand, you will have no difficulty in getting evidence if you show that your laws will not be paralysed, and that the evidence will not go for nothing. Therefore I do in all earnestness press on the right hon. Gentleman the great necessity there is for putting this power of changing the venue into operation. I certainly believe that the right hon. Gentleman was entirely sincere when he stated to the House that if there were a necessity for it he would be the first to take that course. Is there any necessity or not? And I want to know, if there is no necessity, what is the alternative the right hon. Gentleman proposes for the purpose of restoring law and order in this part of Ireland? I only wish to refer to one other matter. The right hon. Gentleman said it was hard to get evidence for the purpose of leading to conviction. But has the right hon. Gentleman or those who assist him been reading the newspapers in these districts for the past month? If he had he would read day after day, in Clare, Limerick, and Kerry, and other parts of Ireland, of these Land League Courts being set up again for the purpose of summoning farmers before them. I myself, within the past few days, have read accounts of such meetings in Clare. In United Ireland of the 19th May the right hon. Gentleman will find that parties had been summoned before these Land League tribunals, for the purpose of explaining their conduct and being held up to public odium. These are matters in the daily routine of the journals that represent certain opinions in the South and West of Ireland. They are not matters hidden away in the dead of night as moonlighting cases are. What has the right hon. Gentleman done in these cases? One case has been mentioned—that of Barry. What are the facts in that case? Barry denounced certain persons for signing Petitions against the Home Rule Bill, and the result of that was that their houses were burned. What steps did the right hon. Gentleman take in that case? The only matter the right hon. Gentleman stated in this House was that it was not fair to be going back upon the character of Mr. Barry. Is the meaning of that defence this—that because Mr. Barry has a bad character and has been convicted before, therefore when he commits a crime now he is to be let off? I think the right hon. Gentleman could lay his finger upon many cases reported in these papers which, as he has himself stated in reply to questions, very frequently led to crime in which, if the right hon. Gentleman consulted his Legal Advisers, the authors of these paragraphs and those responsible for their publication could readily be brought within the Criminal Law. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not allow this recrudescence of crime to go on and spread in Ireland until he finds it much more difficult to cope with than now.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, the Government need no suggestion from me as to what the real object of this Motion is. Its object is, of course, two-fold. In the first place, it has wasted four hours of valuable time, on which I must congratulate the Mover of the Motion; and, in the second place, the object appears to be that the Conservative Party want to get the Liberal Party, who have denounced coercion at all times since 1886, to utilise the Bill which the Conservative Party passed in 1887 in order that thereby the Conservative Party might justify their action for the last seven years. In vain is the net spread in sight of any bird, and certainly I think the Government would be extremely wanting in ordinary sagacity if they did not see this. The object of this Motion is not so much concerned with outrages in the County Clare as with Party tactics in the House of Commons. From the way the stories are attempted to be palmed off on this House, my belief is that the Tory Party seem to think that any yarn is good enough for the House of Commons. We have just heard the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University, with all the calmness of a lawyer, declare that in Ireland if you have a change of venue at Common Law you have a panel of 24, and that the prisoner has a right of 20 challenges. I would like to ask the hon. and learned Member, is there one word of foundation for the statement? How was Phelan tried for the murder of Boyd in the year 1880? Why did not Phelan challenge 20 jurors?

MR. CARSON: I do not know why he did not.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Well, he did. And strange to say, there were the ordinary number of Common Law jurors left in the box. The reason is plain, because it is not true that the panel consists of 24 jurors, though it is true that the prisoner has the right of 20 challenges. I do not intend to go into the technicalities of the matter now, but if any hon. Member looks it up he will find it in the books. I wish simply to expose and demolish as absurd—

MR. CARSON: As a matter of personal explanation, I wish to say I was referring to a change of venue from one county to another, and not to a restricted trial in the Queen's Bench in Dublin.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The hon. and learned Gentleman is referring to something I never heard of. If the hon. and learned Gentleman feels disposed to imagine a certain state of things, all I can say is that in my present position I am unable to deal with them. I should like to say one word as to the condition of Clare. I believe that the person most responsible for the condition of Clare at this moment is Mr. Justice O'Brien. There is no use in this House in trying to blink the facts. What is the position? You have in Ireland a set of political Judges. I go into the Queen's Bench in Dublin, and whom do I find confronting me? Mr. Justice Holmes, who sat upon that (the Treasury Bench) and proposed the Coercion Act; Mr. Justice Gibson, who is second in command; and Mr. Justice Madden, who also acted under the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour), and the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench in Ireland—[Cries of "Order!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. and learned Member is now perilously near the infringement of the Rule which says that you must not comment, except upon Motion in due course, upon the conduct of the Judges of the land, or impute to them, arising out of political circumstances, any bias in their conduct.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I shall carefully abstain from any infringement of the Rule. All I say is this, that here you have four gentlemen who have been Attorney Generals under this Coercion Act. And when they go down through the length and breadth of Ireland to declare at the Summer Assizes, or at the Winter Assizes, or at the Spring Assizes, that a particular state of things exists in the country, of course I cannot forget that I have seen these gentlemen at that Table. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. VICARY GIBBS: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask you, Sir, whether the hon. and learned Member is not now doing the very thing you told him not to do?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Member, as I said before, is going very near an infringement of the Rule, and I must ask him to faithfully observe the spirit of it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I shall simply say this, that I admire the character of the English Judges, who never do anything of the kind. [Cries of "Order!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: I must call the hon. and learned Gentleman to Order. I have appealed to him already, not in a very direct way he will admit; but I think he should observe the ruling I have made.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I am very sorry, Sir, if I have infringed the ruling you have made. As this, therefore, appears to be so delicate a subject I think I had better pass from it altogether, reserving to myself when I pass beyond the doors of this House complete liberty of appreciation. I will therefore depart from this subject, which cannot very well be treated in this House except by hon. Gentlemen opposite who utilise the Charges of these Judges. So much upon that head. I would now like to give the House two or three grounds for the present condition of things in Clare. I believe that the present state of Clare is largely owing to the distribution of Secret Service money under recent Administrations. I will say this to Her Majesty's Government, that I believe no worse system could exist than the system by which you perpetually keep in your pay in a particular county or district a standing hired informer. If a man is to be rewarded for giving information—if you must reward a scoundrel who has taken part in crime for peaching upon his colleagues—then I say, having rewarded him, the use the Government have been making of him should then and there cease. What happens under successive Administrations? You have kept in your pay in the County of Clare a series of ruffians so disgraceful that they were not even defended in this House by the right hon. Gentleman who then was at the head of the Government—men so disgraceful that their conduct when exposed in this House brought the blush of shame to the cheeks of even coercionist Members of Parliament. You have kept this class of men in your pay, and I say they have stimulated outrage, provoked outrage, and even committed outrage. A notorious case was the case of the murder of Head Constable Whelehan. It is well known and was proved in this House, under the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, that Cullinane, the informer, had been put up for this job. It was not denied, it was known to the police that this outrage was going to take place, but unfortunately the person who suffered by this put up plan was not anybody but the unfortunate Whelehan himself, and the informer was compelled to tell the whole story upon the table. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has been attacked by the hon. Member for South Tyrone for having transferred a constable from County Clare to another county. What was proved about this Constable O'Halloran in this House? That he himself distributed ten pound notes to various people, with a view of getting information. The ten pound note that O'Halloran gave to one man was produced in this House by the then Member for the Division, and the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition saw nothing to blush at in it. I say that Her Majesty's Government should put an end to this system of using State informers in the County of Clare, and if they did so the encouragement of crime by informers would, to that extent, be ended. There is another suggestion that I would make to Her Majesty's Government. At the present moment, in the police force, it is only a particular sergeant, or a particular officer, who has any interest in the detection of crime. The general body of the Police Force at large has no interest in the detection of crime. A particular sergeant is entrusted with the distribution of special rewards. He has the whole matter under his hand. The other members of the force are well-acquainted with these facts. They say, "It is no business of ours to bring criminals to justice." To that extent there is indifference amongst the police force as to bringing the proper means to bear upon the detection of crime. Above all, I think the state of Clare was brought about by an ineffective County Inspector. The removal of the County Inspector from Clare will largely tend to the improvement of the district if he is replaced by an efficient officer. I do not know who has replaced him, but I think the inefficiency of the County Inspector of Clare was the third great cause of the state of the county; and I am sure, if he is replaced by a better man, it will greatly tend to improve that district. There is another reason for the state of Clare, and that is the conviction of innocent men. Take the conviction of the brothers Delahunty, one of whom was notoriously an innocent man. The two brothers were convicted together. One of them went down on his knees to the Judge, and swore that his brother was innocent, and that he alone was guilty. I believe that from these convictions of innocent men the idea has spread among these moonlighters that, in all probability, it is the innocent men and not the guilty men who will be convicted, and I believe that fact has largely led to demoralisation. I would be glad that Her Majesty's Government would look into the case of the younger brother Delahunty, and investigate the circumstances connected with his arrest. The only other observation I shall make is as regards the question of the change of venue. Great stress has been laid by the Opposition upon this question of the change of venue. I will not at all say that there is not something to be said for change of venue when a county is in a demoralised state; but I do not regard this Motion as having been brought forward with any bonâ fide object whatever. I do not believe it is brought forward in order to put an end to the state of things in Clare. I believe you are delighted with the state of things in Clare. The hon. Member for South Tyrone crowed with jubilation when the Chief Secretary was obliged to admit that there were 15 more outrages now than 12 months ago. All these outrages are nuts to the hon. Member for South Tyrone. The telegram that he read out that a man was just shot at in the County of Clare reminded me of a man who has been out shooting, and who has taken a big bag. He flourished the telegram before the House—"Another outrage in Clare—good for the Unionist." You are delighted with the state of things in Clare because you can use it as a weapon against Her Majesty's Government. This question of the change of venue, no doubt, is one of considerable difficulty. The moment the Government avail themselves of any section of the Crimes Act, that moment the Conservative Party will shout out with one voice—"Oh, we are justified, our justification is complete now. What did you say in 1887? At last, so barbarous are those Irish that you have been obliged to resort to coercion yourself." That is what you want. You hardly disguise it, because your papers are not as wise as your statesmen. They blurt out things in the most inconvenient fashion; and therefore I simply and absolutely decline to believe that this Motion is brought forward for any bonâ fide object. Four hundred Amendments were getting a little tedious, and this is a "maiden over." You have changed the bowling. Your 400 Amendments have been put on the shelf for a few hours, and now you are taking a turn at the County of Clare. The thing is perfectly apparent. It deceives nobody, and I am really astonished that hon. Gentlemen opposite do not do the thing a little more scientifically. When we were obstructing was this the way we did it? Did we ever miss a Vote on Account? Did any one of us go out speaking for a noble Duke when he ought to be in this House to move his Motion? Did we go to garden parties or anything of that kind? No; we stayed on these Benches and moved our Motion, and did not bring forward irrelevant Motions two days afterwards, without even the pretence that they were brought forward for a bonâ fide object. The Unionist Party up to the present have not made at all as good a fist of this business as had been supposed. You were told they were the strongest Opposition of modern times. [Cries of "Question!"] I am very glad to hear that cry. It is a reminder, no doubt, of great value, and having received the smallest reminder that I am out of Order, thankful as they will be that I have occupied 10 minutes of this evening, I will obey the slightest hint from the hon. Gentlemen who are so admirably able to decide upon points of order, and I will resume my seat.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

(No. 209.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 31st May.]

[ELEVENTH NIGHT.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Legislative Authority.

Clause 3 (Exceptions from powers of Irish Legislature.)

*THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the following Amendment, which stood in the name of General Goldsworthy, was out of Order :—

In Clause 3, page 1, line 22, after the second word "or," insert "the Secretary of State for Ireland so soon as he shall be appointed."

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith) intimated that he should bring forward a New Clause dealing with the question.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) had the following Amendment on the Paper :—

In Clause 3, page 1, line 24, after "of war," insert "Provided always that nothing in this section shall prevent the passing of any Irish Act whenever such Act may be necessary to provide for the proportionate contribution of Ireland to Imperial liabilities arising from a state of war or exceptional preparation for war."

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : Before the hon. Gentleman moves this Amendment, I would, with the leave of the House, like to make a suggestion. The object of the hon. Member is a perfectly good one, and the Government are quite ready to meet him ; but there are two objections to the Amendment. The hon. Member begins by assuming that Ireland is to be liable for her share of war expenditure. The Government have already stated that in their view Parliament has the fullest right to impose on Ireland her share towards that expenditure ; but the Irish Legislature ought to be left perfectly free as to the mode in which that liability is to be satisfied, and Ireland ought not to be disabled from raising money. We ought not, therefore, to rule that the war liabilities of Ireland are to be satisfied by the Irish Executive, and the question ought to be reserved for consideration until we come to the Financial Clauses. The object which the Government have in view is a perfectly legitimate one, and it ought to apply to all the reserved subjects. For the hon. Member's Amendment I propose to substitute the following, which I submit to him will meet the case. On page 2, at the end of the clause, to insert—

"Provided always that nothing in this section shall prevent the passing of any Irish Act for discharging any liabilities imposed by Act of Parliament."

That proposal is large and general ; it excludes all the heads of the reserved subjects, and prevents any question as to the incapacity of the Irish Parliament to raise funds for any purpose.

MR. HANBURY should be willing to meet the right hon. Gentleman as far as he could if what had been suggested would meet the purpose he had in view in drawing up the Amendment. But he thought the Leader of the House had misapprehended the gist of the Amendment. In the first place, he was of opinion that a bird in hand was worth more than two in the bush, and the Financial Clauses could not come on until a late period—in fact, they had some doubt whether they would come on at all. Again, as he had said, the right hon. Gentleman misapprehended the purpose of his proposal. The object of the Amendment was not to say that this extraordinary expenditure must necessarily be met by an Irish Act, but that it might, if necessary, be met by an Irish Act. The Bill did not allow any portion of that extraordinary expenditure to be met by an Irish Act. He could not agree with the further objection raised by the right hon. Gentleman—that this proviso ought to apply to all the sub-sections in this clause; but during the adjournment for dinner he would consult with the Leader of the Opposition, and would, when the Committee resumed, state the decision at which he arrived.

On resuming,

MR. HANBURY said, he had had an opportunity of consulting the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour) and the late Solicitor General (Sir E. Clarke), and they both agreed that the proposition which had been made fully carried out the object of his Amendment. He was perfectly willing to withdraw his Amendment and insert the words suggested at the end of the clause as follows:—

“Provided always that nothing in this section shall prevent the passing of any Irish Act for discharging any liabilities imposed by Act of Parliament.”

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar) said, he understood that these were the exact words used by the Prime Minister.

MR. HANBURY said, he had the words in the handwriting of a Member of the Government.

MR. SEXTON rose, but—

THE CHAIRMAN: There is nothing before the Committee.

MR. SEXTON: The Amendment.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment has not yet been moved. We have only heard a conversation, and it was not properly before the Committee.

MR. HANBURY said, before the Amendment was withdrawn he should like a distinct answer as to the words of the Prime Minister. Were those words accepted or not?

THE CHAIRMAN then read Mr. Hanbury's original Amendment.

SIR J. RIGBY: The words which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister proposed—

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.), on a point of Order, asked whether the Amendment ought not to be put in the first instance before discussion arose?

THE CHAIRMAN did not reply.

SIR J. RIGBY, rising again, gave way to

MR. SEXTON, who said, as he understood it, Ireland was to contribute under two heads—an ordinary contribution and a special contribution in the case of war. He wished to have it made clear that her liabilities would not be made greater by this Amendment or the words suggested in lieu of the Amendment. He would suggest that the words to be used should be—“To prevent any liabilities imposed by this Act.” That would show that there was to be no increase in the liabilities by any other Act.

MR. HANBURY said, he rose to a point of Order. He did not move the words now. They were to be moved at the end of the clause, and he apprehended any discussion now was out of Order. He had a distinct pledge from the Government.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is quite right. The hon. Member wishes, then, to withdraw his Amendment?

MR. HANBURY said, yes; but it would be taken—the words would be inserted—at the end of the clause upon the sub-section.

MR. SEXTON said, he would like, before they passed from the subject, to hear the views of the Solicitor General and the Chief Secretary for Ireland on the words proposed by the hon. Member for Preston, and the statement he had just made regarding them. The words seemed to him to carry an extension of the liabilities proposed by the Bill. They were entitled to know whether Ireland was to contribute under two heads—an ordinary contribution and a special one in time of war? His object was to ensure that ~~the~~ liabilities would not be increased.

MR. J. MORLEY: Whatever the agreement arrived at, it took place when I was not present.

THE CHAIRMAN: The only question now before the Committee is that the Amendment be withdrawn, and it is not proposed to move any further Amendment until the end of the clause is reached.

MR. SEXTON: Before we agree to the withdrawal of the Amendment it is desirable that we should ascertain what the agreement is that was come to a few moments ago.

MR. J. MORLEY : The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister told the hon. Member for Preston that he would insert at the end of the clause the words which were read out at the time—words to the effect of the Amendment of that hon. Member.

MR. HANBURY said, the words he had read out he had read from a manuscript in the handwriting of the Secretary to the Treasury taken from the lips of the Prime Minister himself.

MR. MACARTNEY said, that one of the objections the Prime Minister took to the words of his hon. Friend was that they only applied to one exceptional liability, and he suggested a form of words which covered a number of exceptional liabilities.

MR. SEXTON said, he was willing for words to be inserted such as would provide for all the liabilities under the Act, but he should look askance at any Amendment having reference to liabilities beyond those.

MR. BARTLEY said, the Prime Minister had declared that he desired to give a larger scope to the liability than that contained in the Amendment. When the matter came up for decision he hoped there would be no hesitation in carrying out the view of the Prime Minister.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARKER SMITH said, he rose to move an Amendment which would introduce, in effect, the Preamble of the Foreign Enlistment Act of 1870. The object was to except from the powers of the Irish Legislature the power to make laws as to

“the regulation of the conduct of any portion of Her Majesty’s subjects during the existence of hostilities between foreign States with which Her Majesty is at peace, in respect of such hostilities ; or.”

The Foreign Enlistment Act, which was one of first-rate importance, extended to all the dominions of Her Majesty, including the adjacent territorial waters, and provided that nothing should be done to the detriment of foreign Powers who might be at war with each other whilst at peace with us. It was an Act universally applicable to the whole of the British Empire. It was an Act which no colony could alter. He presumed it was the intention of Her Majesty’s Government that the Irish Legislature should not have power to alter that Act in any way. He would like, however, to ask the Solicitor General or the Secretary for Ireland whether it was the view of the Government that the case he put in his Amendment was already sufficiently covered in any sub-section of the clause, or whether they thought his Amendment was necessary ?

*SIR J. RIGBY was understood to reply that in his view the point raised by the hon. Member was already provided for in the Bill. The regulation of the conduct of any of Her Majesty’s subjects during hostilities would be connected with legislation having reference to a state of war. That would not be a matter relating exclusively to Ireland. This question was covered by Section 2 of the Bill—by the fact that the only power given to the Irish Legislature was to make laws in respect of matters exclusively relating to Ireland or any part thereof.

MR. PARKER SMITH said, he was afraid he could not accept that assurance, and he would therefore proceed with his observations in support of his Amendment. The case that might arise under the Foreign Enlistment Act would very likely deal with some individual in Ireland, and it was a startling idea that the limitation of legislative powers of the Irish Parliament to matters exclusively Irish could by any possibility be held to prevent the Irish Parliament from repealing Section 8 of the Foreign Enlistment Act, so as to allow an individual to build and equip a ship, say at the great ship-building yard in Belfast, with the knowledge that it would be used for purposes of war against a friendly State. It never occurred to him that anyone would argue that the fact that the powers of the Irish Legislature were limited to matters exclusively relating to Ireland would prevent the Irish Parliament from repealing that section, and allowing a ship building yard in Belfast to build a blockade-runner or a fast cruiser, in that way bringing not only Ireland but the whole British Empire into difficulties. That argument was a striking example of the legal subtlety of the Solicitor General, and might do for the Court of Chancery, but would not pass muster in the House of Commons.

*SIR J. RIGBY said, that he might have called attention to the sub-sections of the clause as precluding the Irish Parliament from repealing the Foreign Enlistment Act. Those sub-sections would prevent the Irish Parliament from legislating as to Treaties and other relations with foreign States and as to matters arising out of a state of war.

MR. PARKER SMITH said, those sub-sections had seemed to him to be the sub-sections which would bear upon the matter if any part of the Bill did. It was a startling proposition to say that the provision as to the making of peace and war should refer to war between two foreign States in which this country was not concerned. The obvious meaning of the sub-section was the question of this country being at peace or war with a foreign Power. The other sub-section to which the hon. and learned Gentleman referred was that which prevented the Irish Parliament from dealing with the question of Treaties or other relations with foreign States or the relations between different parts of Her Majesty's dominions. "Other relations" must mean other relations of the same kind—Conventions or Agreements of any sort between this country and some other nation. It seemed to him impossible to conceive that offences against International Law, which might not absolutely form the subject of Treaty and offences under the Foreign Enlistment Act, could be held to be covered by the words of Sub-section 4. They had to look upon this question in the light in which it would strike an ordinary person. It was a matter which should be considered by laymen as well as by lawyers, so that the clause should be made clear and explicit. The failure to enforce the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act might involve this country in war or in an arbitration costing us many millions. The Act was passed in 1870 as a result of long deliberation and of bitter experience, after the Alabama question had been hanging for many years over our heads, and in the early days of the Franco-German War, when it was felt to be essential that further powers should be given to the Government to prevent a recurrence of the American difficulty. The main provisions of the Bill were, in the first place, to prevent illegal enlistment; that was to say, to prevent enlistment in any part of the British Empire of men to take service with either of two belligerents who were already at war. After the establishment of an Irish Parliament this question might easily become of vital practical importance. Supposing a war arose in which there might be a possibility of the temporal power of the Pope being restored. This country might be neutral, or might possibly be on the side of Italy. But there would be a very strong feeling in Ireland on the side of the Power that held out a chance of the restoration of the temporal power of the Pope. There would be an enormous temptation to the Irish Parliament to give facilities for the formation of a foreign Legion, and if such a Legion were formed, we might be involved in the most serious consequences. It seemed to him of essential importance, therefore, that there should be no doubt that the power to repeal any of the sections of that Act should remain in the hands of the Imperial Parliament, and should not be given into the hands of a subordinate Parliament in another part of the Empire. The next set of clauses of the Act dealt with illegal shipbuilding, and fitting out and aiding the cruisers of the enemy, and this was a question not merely of our own Statutes, but of the rules which we laid down in our Geneva Arbitration, which we undertook to hold for the future and to do our best to enforce, and for any breach or violation of which we should be held liable. It was because we transgressed the rules we had laid down and accepted ex post facto that we had to pay an indemnity of 15,500,000 dollars. Under the Foreign Enlistment Act the very largest powers of seizure were given to the officers of the Executive. In Ireland the Lord Lieutenant would deal with these matters, and he wished to know whether the Lord Lieutenant would, in the exercise of his discretion, act under the control of the Irish Parliament or under the control of Parliament at Westminster? What he wished to make certain of was whether it would be possible for the Irish Parliament to repeal any of the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act? It was clear that if they ventured to do so in a time of war the Imperial Parliament would certainly interfere, and by its overmastering power stop them from doing so. But that would be a very unsatisfactory way of treating the question, and would bring about far more friction than would be created in laying down in clear and simple words the rights of the two Parliaments. This question, it seemed to him, was far too important to leave uncertain, and to subtle constructions such as those as the Solicitor General.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 24, after "war," insert "the regulation of the conduct of any portion of Her Majesty's subjects during the existence of hostilities between foreign States with which Her Majesty is at peace, in respect of such hostilities; or."—(Mr. Parker Smith.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: My hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General has already given the opinion of the Government as to the intention of this Bill—that there shall be no power in the Irish Parliament to interfere with the provisions to which the hon. Member has referred, and has stated that in his judgment the words of the Bill are perfectly adequate to give effect to that intention. That, I am bound to say, is our feeling. But the hon. Gentleman, looking at the Bill, I am sure not with a desire to destroy it, but in perfect good faith, has doubts as to whether the clause gives effect to the intention which the Government have expressed. Those doubts may be shared by others. The policy of the Government in a case of that kind is to pay all the respect we can to doubts we do not share, provided the mode proposed for meeting these doubts does not in our judgment import any inconvenience or danger. That is the principle on which we have acted, and that is the principle on which we mean to act. Examining the words of the Amendment from that point of view, the Government do not think there is any harm in them. They express what we believe to be already conveyed by the Bill; and as there is no harm in them, we are willing to admit them.

SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire) said, this raised, for the first time, a fresh question of extreme importance to this country, though, of course, there was nothing more to be said now that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had seen his way to accept the Amendment. The effect of the Amendment was merely to insert in the Bill the title of the Act of 1870 as an assertion that the Act of 1870 could not be touched by the Irish Legislature. Of course, they could not touch the question of the Executive at this stage; but inasmuch as these words were now to be put into the Bill, of course the Prime Minister would in the same spirit see that provision was made for carrying out the obligations of the Foreign Enlistment Act.

MR. SEXTON was willing that the view of the Prime Minister should be carried into effect; but he doubted whether, as a matter of drafting, the words of the Amendment were apt words for the purpose. He would put it to the Solicitor General that he should apply himself to the matter, so as to prepare words which would make it clear that there should be no infraction of the Foreign Enlistment Act by the Irish Parliament.

*SIR J. RIGBY said, he could see no objection to these words as they stood. There could be no reason for supposing that they covered anything more than the prevention of such legislation as would be against the spirit of the Act of 1870, and might involve us in difficulties with other Powers.

Question put, and agreed to.

THE CHAIRMAN: The next Amendment, in the name of the Member for North Islington (Mr. Bartley), which is "Clause 3, page 1, line 24, after 'or,' insert—to change the name, title, or powers of the Legislature as established by this Act," is out of Order.

SIR E. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT rose to move the following Amendment:—In Clause 3, page 2, line 1, leave out "naval or military forces," and insert "army, navy, militia, volunteers, and any other military forces."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: We propose to accept this Amendment, with the exception that we would alter the precedence as between the Army and Navy. We would suggest that the words should read "navy, army, militia, volunteers," and so on.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I have no objection to the slight alteration proposed by the right hon. Gentleman.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 1, leave out "naval or military forces," and insert "navy, army, militia, volunteers, and any other military forces."—(Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

THE CHAIRMAN: The next three Amendments are out of Order.

MR. BARTLEY said, that on behalf of the hon. Member for Dover he would move the next Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 1, after "forces," insert "or any police force other than a local police force required for local purposes and acting under the orders of a local authority."—(Mr. Bartley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. SEXTON said, the whole question of police was dealt with in Clause 30 of the Bill and the Schedule dependent on it, and it would be extremely inconvenient to have anything bearing upon that subject elsewhere than in that clause.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I agree with the hon. Member for North Kerry that it would be more convenient to discuss this question, if it has to be discussed, on the later clause. I hope it will not be insisted upon.

SIR E. CLAKE did not think Section 30 would be a convenient point for considering this Amendment. The question was whether a Legislative Body in Ireland was or was not prohibited from dealing with police which were of an Imperial or central character or other than a local force. If they looked at the 30th clause they would find that it referred only to the Royal Irish Constabulary and the Dublin Metropolitan Police and the way in which those forces could be dealt with. If any prohibition was to be inserted in the Bill this would be the appropriate place.

MR. SEXTON pointed out that under the 6th schedule, read in connection with the 30th clause, local forces might be established by Irish Act. That would, therefore, be the place in which the Amendment should be dealt with.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (who was indistinctly heard) was understood to speak as follows:—I must admit that there is some argument in favour of dealing with the Amendment at the present moment. My contention is that, from a theoretical point of view, the control of the police ought not to be taken out of the discretion of the Irish Legislature, on the broad ground that it is a matter which relates absolutely and exclusively to Irish affairs. I have always held the very strongest opinion that the duties of the police are duties which constitute the very first letter in the alphabet of local government. Historically, the basis of all local government is the local protection of life and property. Now, let us look at the case from a practical point of view. It appears to me that if we attempted to interfere with the discretion of the Irish Legislature we should place them in a very false position. You must in a good police force have the power of transmission of a body of men from one district to another. The wants of particular districts and neighbourhoods are not a constant quantity. A town may require a certain number of police for its own purposes; but special circumstances may arise which, as in the case of Hull the other week, without the smallest imputation on the intention of any of those connected with the recent strike, constitute a state of things in which prudence requires that there should be a larger number of police on the spot. Will you lay down as your policy in the matter of police that the police force of each locality should be according to its maximum wants or according to its aggregate, which are also its minimum wants. Take the case of Belfast, which furnishes the best example that I think the whole case of Ireland, as far as recent experience goes, presents. Should we force the Irish Legislature to fix the police force at Belfast at its maximum wants? No, certainly not. Surely it would be much better that, instead of having in every police district arrangements adequate to meet exigencies, which occur once in 15, or 20, or 50 years, you should have a central force, which would be adequate to meet the whole of such exigencies. Otherwise, it is evident that you must bring about enormous waste. You ought to have in each district a police force strictly adequate to its ordinary aggregate wants, which are also its minimum wants, and you ought to have the means somewhere in the country of meeting whatever special exigencies are likely to arise. It appears to me that these are propositions which do not belong to the contested parts of this subject. Very well then, what is to be done? I am for localising to the utmost degree. Even if the Irish Legislature chose to avoid having any central police force, which I rather hope it would, they would be obliged to make provision for having somewhere an available and disposable extra police force over and above the wants of some special locality—say Dublin—which extra force might upon occasion be made use of for the different parts of the country, just as in England now detachments of police are sent from one district to another to meet local wants. I cannot conceive how this can be disputed. Supposing there were disturbances in Belfast, would it be right that it should depend absolutely and finally upon the Municipality of Dublin to determine whether order should be restored in Belfast or not? It surely is obvious, not that you should necessarily introduce a Central Authority—God forbid; no one wants to avoid that more than I do—but that it would be absurd to say that the power of provision for the special wants of any particular district should depend on the will of the Local Authority of some other district. I think the hon. Member who is responsible for the Amendment means to make the Committee understand that there is a certain jealousy of a political force. The Royal Irish Constabulary is an expiring Force, and will be replaced by an Irish Force. Is the Viceroy to have no control over the movement of police forces from one part of the country to another as far as regards the meeting of exigencies which might occasionally arise? I cannot think the hon. Member really means to prevent the intervention of the Authority responsible for the peace of the country in determining those questions which may arise, and which always must arise from time to time. I think, without going further into the question, there are adequate reasons why we should not attempt to interfere by prohibition in a matter so purely Irish and so entirely beyond the possible occurrence of anything in the nature of risk.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) said, he had never contemplated that there should be no Central Authority in Ireland having power to move a central force or local contingents of police from one place to another. His difficulty was that the Bill, as it stood, contemplated the gradual substitution of purely local forces for the Royal Irish Constabulary as it now existed. But there was nothing in the Bill or in the facts of Irish history which would lead to the supposition that an Irish Government would abolish the Royal Irish Constabulary out of hand. The Royal Irish Constabulary had been the good servants of all those who had employed them. The present Chief Secretary (Mr. J. Morley), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour), and everyone else who had had any dealings with the Force had been proud to speak of them as they deserved, and had paid them many well deserved tributes in the House of Commons. In calm moments the Nationalist Members had added their tributes, and he did not think it beyond the bounds of possibility that there would be no undue hurry on the part of an Irish Government to abolish altogether one of the factors of Irish life of which Irishmen might be most proud. That being so, the Committee must consider that the Royal Irish Constabulary might continue to exist in many places, and his object was to make this perfectly clear. If the Lord Lieutenant in his relations with the Royal Irish Constabulary was an Imperial officer the Amendment ought to be accepted, because only yesterday the Prime Minister stated that the Lord Lieutenant, except within those spheres of action specifically withdrawn by this clause, was an Irish officer responsible to the Irish Executive. As long, however, as the Royal Irish Constabulary existed he would act, according to the Bill, as the representative of Her Majesty the Queen. If so, it was clear that the Constabulary ought to be excepted under the 3rd clause, just as the Army and Navy were excepted. But, supposing that the Irish Legislature did get rid of the Royal Irish Constabulary, what was to be placed in the field of action so cleared? The Prime Minister said he was in favour of localising the police as far as possible. In making that statement the right hon. Gentleman had merely repeated the tenor of thousands of speeches throughout the country. Would not the Government, then, prohibit in this Bill the recrudescence of an evil they had deplored during the six years of the late Government's tenure of Office. The Prime Minister had implied that in asking the Committee to accept this Amendment he was casting some reflection upon the Irish nation and upon the Irish Legislature which he hoped to see created. In fact, the right hon. Gentleman had again employed the old argument about attributing to the Irish nothing human but the form.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I said nothing of the kind.

MR. WYNDHAM: I understood the right hon. Gentleman to imply that the Amendment was inspired by mistrust.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I said nothing about mistrust.

MR. WYNDHAM held that the Prime Minister had intimated that the Mover of the Amendment was actuated by mistrust of the Irish nation in suggesting that the Irish Legislature might go beyond the tenour of the Bill by creating a clandestine force to coerce Ulster. He held that view, and denied that it constituted any reproach to the Irish people, or to the Irish Legislature that was to be. They were invited by the Bill to divest themselves of the responsibility of keeping the peace as between Ulster and the rest of Ireland, and to shift that responsibility on to the shoulders of the Irish Legislature. But if he were a responsible Minister in that Legislature he should utterly refuse to undertake the task unless he was allowed to embody a force analogous to the Royal Irish Constabulary as it now existed. Did not that dispose of the insinuation that he was distrustful of the Irish nation, and that he suspected the Irish Legislature would act contrary to the spirit of the Bill? Indeed, he contended that it would be no crime if the Irish Legislature sought to create such a force, unless they were directly prohibited by Act of Parliament from doing so. A central force—a force removable from place to place, as the necessity arose—would be necessary in Ireland to preserve peace and order, whether the country was under Nationalist or Imperial Government. Then came the question, Who should have the control of that central force? There could be but one answer to that question. They had in the 2nd clause of the Bill the declaration that the Imperial Parliament must be supreme. It had been said that that declaration would remain a mere idle form of words unless they had some machinery in Ireland, such as an adequate police force, which the Imperial Parliament could direct to make good its supremacy throughout Ireland. If the Government intended to adhere to their declarations that they would effectively maintain the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, they would insert provisions in the Bill either to retain the Royal Irish Constabulary as at present, or to create another central force. On the other hand, if they broke faith with respect to those declarations, and refused to allow the insertion of Amendments for creating adequate machinery to maintain that supremacy, they would aggravate the consequences of their lâches and not only deprive the loyal people of Ireland of armed protectors but impose upon them armed oppressors. The necessity for a centralised force had been admitted by the Prime Minister. The question, then, to be decided was whether the Imperial Parliament, which must be more impartial than the Parliament sitting in Dublin, was to control that force? It must be remembered that the Royal Irish Constabulary had been described at one time as "Morley's Murderers," and at another time as "Balfour's Bloodhounds." What name, he asked, would a similar force controlled by the Irish Parliament be called; but, above all, what would be the essence and character of such a force?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Prime Minister, in his observations upon this Amendment, was, through the accident of the progress of business in Committee, placed somewhat under the disadvantage of speaking before he had heard the arguments which the Mover of the Amendment proposed to advance in its defence. There are, therefore, aspects of the question which appear to have escaped the attention of the Government. The Prime Minister, in his speech.

appears to contemplate the necessity for Ireland of some kind of central police force, and he seems to think that some such central police force exists at the present time in this country. That is a mistake.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: There is a large force in the Metropolis, under the control of the Executive Government, which supplies all the needful purposes of a central force.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The one observation I have to make on that statement is that, as I understand, the Government propose to hand over the central police force to the control of the County Council, with the exception of a small fragment in central London, which is to remain under the Executive power. That force will not be of the slightest use for provincial work. It could not be of service, for example, in the case of disturbances at Hull or elsewhere. Then, again, I do not believe it is legal, and certainly it is not practicable to use the London Police Force in Scotland.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: They go to Balmoral.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, when I was Secretary for Scotland it was at one time difficult to provide an adequate police force to deal with disturbances in one or two of the Highland Counties, and the Executive had to rely entirely upon the charity of the police authorities of other districts of Scotland—a charity which was withheld in some cases, and very grudgingly granted in others. The contention of the Prime Minister that there is an adequate central police force in this country which can be used in cases of disturbances in outlying portions of the island is, I think, absurd. I am one of those prejudiced persons who hold that the proper form of police service is a central service. We should never have had a localised police force in this country were it not for the law-abiding instincts of the British community, which prevented evil arising from that state of things. I might remind the Government that the first idea of an Army was a local force, which gradually developed into our present central Army. However, to the local police service which is found adequate to our needs in

Mr. A. J. Balfour

England the people are accustomed, but it is not the best form of police service. In Ireland, however, different conditions prevail, and to manage affairs in that country without a central police force will be extremely difficult. The difference between Ulster and the rest of Ireland alone constitutes a reason why a local police force depending upon Local Authorities will always be difficult to use in certain cases of emergency. That being admitted, the question is whether the control of a central police force, which is the right form of force for Ireland, can be safely entrusted to an Irish Assembly? I think not, for the following reasons. A central police force paid by an Irish Parliament and under the control of an Irish Executive could be used, and would be used, for oppressive purposes in dealing with a Province like Ulster, differing from the rest of Ireland in its aims, intentions, religion, history, and in all things which make up the life of a community. It would be intolerable that the Executive in Ireland should have such powers to coerce Ulster. This, I think, is the view of the Government itself, for in the 30th clause of the Bill it is proposed that the police force which is to be gradually substituted for the existing centralised force shall be a local force. The Government, therefore, agree that the Irish Executive ought not to be given the power of ordering about a central police force. The proper force to give to Ireland under this Bill is a local force under the County Authorities, and over which the Irish Executive would have no more power than the Home Secretary has at this moment over the county police of Aberdeenshire or Ross-shire. If we are to allow the Irish Government to become the paymasters and commanders of a force of 12,000 drilled men, what value can be attached to the provision in the Bill which says that the new Legislature is to have nothing to do with the Naval or Military Forces of the Kingdom? At this moment a month's drill, or less, would make the Irish Constabulary the most formidable Military Force in the world. From the quality of the men, from their education, their training, they are not merely the raw material but the manufactured material of an admirable Army, and to allow this new Parliament to be the masters of such a Force would be little less than lunacy. I know that the Prime Minister resents as if it were a personal insult any suggestion that in any conceivable circumstances the new Irish Legislature and Executive could ever be engaged in hostile action against British interests and the British Army. But such things have occurred in the past, and may happen in the future; and we must remember that we are not legislating merely for next year or the year after that, but for an indefinite time. Are we, then, to shut our eyes to the possibility that in setting up a separate Legislative Assembly and Government in Ireland, and giving that Assembly the power of having a separate Army, we are creating in our own despite a danger and a menace? I do not say that the possibility which I am contemplating would be fatal to our interests; but there can be no doubt that in times of difficulty it may put an additional and most severe strain even upon the resources of this Empire. These are reasons which should induce the Committee to think not once nor twice, but to deliberately pause before they refused an Amendment which will, in the first place, have the effect of preventing, not only the abuses which undoubtedly may follow in internal administration from the intrusting to the Irish Legislature a central police force which may be used as a great instrument of oppression, but also which will have the effect of preventing external complication that may result from endowing the Irish Government with an army formidable in discipline and training which may prove at a time when we are pressed by the sorest necessity and have to meet the greatest difficulties to be a new danger and a new difficulty with which it will be almost impossible for us to deal.

MR. J. MORLEY: I must point out that the right hon. Gentleman has entirely overlooked a couple of facts. The first is that the Government do not contemplate the placing of this police force under the central authority. The Bill expressly says that that is not to be done.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Where?

MR. J. MORLEY: In Clause 30 of the Bill, to which the right hon. Gentleman has himself referred. Then the right hon. Gentleman has overlooked another thing. He has rightly said that the Royal Irish Constabulary is a splendidly-organised, armed, drilled, and disciplined force, that for a time all might be well, but that under certain contingencies that force might be used by the new Irish Government as a military force, for military or naval purposes, against this country. But the right hon. Gentleman entirely overlooks in his argument one line in Clause 30 which indicates that no officer or man shall be appointed to either of those forces.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In Section 30, as the right hon. Gentleman says, the Government have undoubtedly indicated their own private and personal view in the drafting of the Bill that the force to be substituted for the Royal Irish Constabulary is to be a local force. That is true enough, but there is nothing in the Bill to prevent the new Irish Government from starting an Irish Constabulary of their own, paid, armed, and drilled precisely as the Irish Constabulary is now. If the Chief Secretary thinks that that is not the intention or desire of the Government, I would earnestly press upon him that all he has to do is to accept the Amendment, and the contingency will be absolutely obviated.

MR. J. MORLEY: The right hon. Gentleman was not present earlier in the evening when an Amendment, moved by an hon. Gentleman opposite, was accepted by the Government, prohibiting the Irish Legislature from having an Army, Navy, Militia, Volunteers, or any other military force. The right hon. Gentleman says there is nothing in the Bill to prevent the new Irish Government from creating, constituting, drilling, and arming a new force; but if they attempted to create such a force under the pseudo-name of police, that would be contravening the Amendment that has been accepted by the Government.

MR. WYNDHAM said, he could point out circumstances in which the Irish Legislature might create a force equally dangerous without contravening the section to which the Chief Secretary referred. Supposing a local police force were created under the Bill in Ulster and the Royal Irish Constabulary were withdrawn from that part, but were to continue in existence elsewhere. If difficulties arose in Ulster after five years, and the local force proved inadequate to cope with them, did the Chief Secretary contend that it would not be in the power of the Irish Legislature to raise 1,000 men and put them into Ulster, calling them policemen? So far as he could see, there was not a line in the Bill to prevent the Irish Parliament from raising a police force to deal with difficulties in Ulster.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said, it was quite impossible for anybody who had had an official connection with the Royal Irish Constabulary to accept the assertions made by the Chief Secretary. He understood that the force of the future was to be a civil force. Allusions had been made to a military force, but he hoped the Committee would keep totally distinct the questions whether the force was to be central or local, or whether it was to be civil or military. At present the Royal Irish Constabulary was a force central and military in its organisation; but a force might be local and military, or central and civil. The contention of his hon. Friend was that if any central authority were to have the control of the police it should be laid down that that authority should be subject to the Imperial Parliament. The Prime Minister stated that that was already provided for.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It is in the Amendment.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER said, it was not in the Amendment or in the Bill.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The police are given to the Viceroy.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER said, that if he were to discuss the powers of the Viceroy he would be told that he was out of Order in anticipating a later clause; and he declined to accept, even from so high an authority as the right hon. Gentleman, a suggestion to contravene the regularity of the discussions. He would not only endorse what the Leader of the Opposition had said about the Royal Irish Constabulary, but would add that no British regiment could be produced which could hold a candle to an equal number of men in the Constabulary. They were seasoned troops, and not short service men. The Bill provided no adequate safeguard against the raising of an unlimited and highly-disciplined force by the Irish Government. He hoped, therefore, that the Committee would insist on the insertion of words in the Bill which would prevent the Irish Government of the future—if he could contemplate such a monstrosity—having under its command a highly-disciplined force which would enable it to perpetrate injustice in all parts of Ireland.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): The right hon. Gentleman appears to contemplate the continued existence of the present highly-trained Constabulary Force.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: I beg pardon. I have done nothing of the sort. I entirely recognise that under Clause 30 the existing Constabulary and Dublin Police Force will be gradually dissolved. But I contend that there is nothing in the Bill to prevent an equivalent force from being created the very next day after those forces have disappeared.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: The right hon. Gentleman confirms me in the opinion I have formed that he has not read the subsequent clauses of the Bill. So long as the Dublin Metropolitan Police and the Irish Constabulary continue in existence they are to be under the control of the Lord Lieutenant. These highly-trained forces can never be under the control of the new Legislature. The right hon. Gentleman says there is nothing in the Bill to prevent the creation by the Executive of a new Royal Irish Constabulary.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: I did not say Royal.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Well, a new Constabulary. [Opposition cheers.] I am glad hon. Gentlemen cheer, because that is how the right hon. Gentleman gives himself away. If it is not to be a force like the Royal Irish Constabulary the whole of the right hon. Gentleman's argument falls to the ground. The new force will be either a Constabulary or a Police Force. Is it to be an armed force? By using the words "local police force" it is made impossible to create an armed force. Can anyone mention a County or Borough Police Force that is armed ?

MR. JAMES LOWTHER : The very city in which the right hon. Gentleman stands. The London Police Force carry revolvers.

MR. H. H. FOWLER : No London policeman can carry a revolver without special permission and under special circumstances. But, assuming that a police force can be armed and made a military force, then it at once passes beyond the purview of the powers of the Irish Legislature. [Opposition cries of "No !"] The right hon. Member for West Birmingham should not cry out "No," because he was not in the House in the earlier part of the evening.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : I beg pardon. I am listening to my right hon. Friend with the greatest interest. I did not utter a word.

MR. H. H. FOWLER : I beg my right hon. Friend's pardon ; I thought he contradicted my statement. An hour and a half ago the Government accepted an Amendment to extend the prohibitory clause of the Bill to every kind of military force. Whatever description of force comes within the category of military force is excluded from the purview of the Irish Parliament. I consider the Irish Constabulary to be a military force.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Not at all.

MR. H. H. FOWLER : It is an armed force, and that is the essential difference in England and Scotland between the military and police forces. In Ireland we were dealing with a military force under the guise of a Constabulary Force.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : It is not a military force.

MR. H. H. FOWLER : Well, anyhow, it is under the control of the Executive. If the right hon. Gentleman will refer to the 6th schedule of the Bill he will find the various regulations as to the establishment of the Irish police forces and as to the Royal Irish Constabulary and the Dublin Metropolitan Police ceasing to exist. It is there provided—"That such local police forces shall be established under such local authorities, and for such counties, municipal boroughs, or other larger areas as may be provided by an Irish Act."

The argument of the hon. Member for Dover is that the police forces will be local police forces, which will be under the control of the Local Authorities, and that it ought not to be in the power of the Irish Legislature to create a central police force. In that case we might just as well not give Home Rule at all. That is the meaning of the Opposition then, but it is not ours. You create a Local Legislature in Ireland, and to refuse to that Local Authority control of a civil force for the purposes of civil administration is a contradiction of terms, which the Committee will not stand for one moment. I entirely sympathise with the view that the Irish Legislature should not have power to create a military or an armed force, which should not be under the control of the Imperial Executive. That was already provided by the provisions of the Bill, but it has been emphasized by the Amendment, which has been accepted. Every military force in Ireland—everything that comes under the definition of a military force—is reserved to the control of the Imperial Parliament ; but the local police force will be placed in the hands of the Irish Government.

*MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square) : The Prime Minister has suggested that there should be not only local police forces subject to the Local Authorities, but a central force which should be subject to the control of the Irish Executive.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I said that there must be some disposable force, whether central or not.

*MR. GOSCHEN : The right hon. Gentleman says that there must be an available and disposable force, under the control of some Central Authority, which might be sent to assist the Local Authorities when necessity arises. At all events, for the purposes of argument, may I be allowed to call that force a central force, because it would be impossible to call it a local force. We had it from the Chief Secretary that there is nothing in the Bill which would authorise the existence of a military force in Ireland under the control of the Irish Government. Then the question is, can the central police force be converted into an armed force ; and, if so, is there any words in the Bill which will prevent it from being so converted into an armed force? It is clear that there has been a casus omissus in the Bill in reference to the creation of a military force, and that is the reason why the Prime Minister has assented to the amendment of the Bill in that respect. The Bill, however, contains no words which will prevent the creation of such a military force, except those which are in the Amendment to which the Prime Minister has assented, and the question is, whether the language of that Amendment is sufficient for its purpose? The right hon. Gentleman who spoke last quoted words of the Bill to the effect that "the local police forces are to be established under such Local Authorities and for such counties, municipal boroughs, or other large areas as may be provided" by what—by "an Irish Act." The right hon. Gentleman did not put a distinct emphasis upon the words "by an Irish Act." It is by Irish Act that the constitution of the future police force is to be determined, and that is claimed as belonging to the prerogatives of the Irish Legislature. Then the question is—How near can a central police force be made to a military force without coming actually within the term of a military force? It can be trained up to a degree that only a fortnight's more drill will constitute it a military force. It is not the actual training in the use of the musket that would constitute the danger of such a force. Thus, among many of the points that may arise between the British and the Irish Legislatures there may be one as to the definition of a military and of a police force. There is a violent controversy just now as to whether the present Constabulary is a military force or a civil force. The Bill, I am reminded, contains a proviso that the whole of the Royal Irish Constabulary is to cease to exist as a police force, and, possibly, the Irish Judges would argue from that phrase in the Bill that a force precisely constituted as the Royal Irish Constabulary is intended by the Government to be defined as a military force and not as a police force. If we put together the utterances of the three Cabinet Ministers who have addressed the Committee on the subject, it will appear that they agree that it is necessary to have "a central something." I call it that so that the Prime Minister shall not say I am misrepresenting what was said. There is to be a central body. It may be drilled and it may be organised by "an Irish Act." Whether arms could be placed in their hands is the only point on which controversy would remain. But under the Bill you may have a force of 12,000 men organised with everything short of arms. I venture to think that neither the Prime Minister nor any of his Colleagues will venture to say that that is not authorised under the Bill.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Totally unauthorised by the Bill.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I will proceed by stages. The future force might be drilled like the Royal Irish Constabulary. Might it not be so drilled? The right hon. Gentleman does not deny that it might be drilled like the present force.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: In my opinion it cannot be so officered and drilled.

MR. GOSCHEN: I do not wish for the right hon. Gentleman's opinion. I wish for the words in the Bill.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Why did the right hon. Gentleman ask for my opinion if he did not wish for it?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I make a present to the right hon. Gentleman of his rhetorical point. I wish for the right hon. Gentleman's opinion supported by words in the Bill. I can find no such words in the Bill. Having brought the argument to that point, I will leave it there, and will not insist that the Irish Government can put arms into the hands of the new force. I am, however, reminded that the Royal Irish Constabulary are drilled with ball cartridge. I must, therefore, again ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Royal Irish Constabulary is or is not to be the model for the future police force of Ireland? I maintain that unless the Amendment is accepted there is nothing in the Bill to prevent it. I admit that the Prime Minister did not intend that the future police force of Ireland to be like the present Royal Irish Constabulary. We have suggested a method by which that can be prevented, and we ask him to accept it.

SIR H. JAMES: Unless we have misinterpreted the meaning of the Prime Minister, there is nothing between him and us but a matter of construction. I understood the Prime Minister to say that in his view there should not be a central armed force in Ireland, and the right hon. Gentleman took the view that this had been carried into effect by the Amendment which prevented military forces being employed by the Irish Executive, and that they cannot have a central armed force because they cannot have a military force. But a military force must be under the provisions of the Mutiny Act. The present Constabulary, however, are not under Military Law. They are, however, armed with muskets, and undergo target practice and the same drilling as military forces. What is to prevent the new force which is to come into existence being armed up to the point of the present Constabulary? Nobody thinks that such a force would come under the Mutiny Act; and, therefore, though armed, they will not be a military force. Such a force will not be forbidden by this Amendment. If the Amendment covers the police armed force, this Amendment is out of Order; but the Chairman has said that the military force will not cover the police armed force. On the construction of this Act, after these two forces have ceased to exist, the Executive Government in Ireland, not the Lord Lieutenant representing the British Ministry, but the new Executive, with the Lord Lieutenant under their power, will be able to bring armed men into existence, to keep them in barracks, to send them to Ulster or to any portion of the country, and as long as they are kept out of the Mutiny Act they will be a powerful armed force, to be used by the Irish Executive for any purpose they may think proper.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) asked the Prime Minister whether, if Clause 30 were not in the Bill, the words "military forces" would, in his opinion, include the Royal Irish Constabulary? He also wished to know whether the future Government in Ireland was to be unable to establish for purely local purposes a force similar to that which the Canadian Government had established in Canada, and to that which had been established in Cape Colony. If a central police force was to come into existence, he could not understand what good it would be if it was not to be an effective police force; and no one who knew anything of Irish social life, altogether apart from the controversy raging round this Bill, could for a moment imagine that a central force, without effective arms to aid it, would be of any assistance to the Executive in Ireland.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I do not think that the hon. Member has made it quite clear what it was he wished a reply to; but I will give an answer as clearly as I can to what I conceive to be the main question now at issue as far it admits of a perfectly definite reply. I differ from the doctrine laid down by the hon. Member that the central force in Ireland made available for meeting the special police exigencies of particular districts must necessarily be a force with military organisation or anything approaching to it. In England we know nothing of this. I am not aware that the police force of the Metropolis has more of a military organisation than the rest of the country; and my wish is that no strong distinction should be drawn between any central force in Ireland, if it is found to be necessary, and the local police force. The question is, What is really a military and what is really a police force? With respect to a clearly police force, my desire is that the discretion of the Irish Legislature should remain quite unfettered. With regard to an armed force, I should have been ashamed of myself if I had assented either to the original words as to the prohibition of a military force, or to the extension of the words which have been accepted this evening, if I had had in my mind the belief that some not properly police force, but a semi-military force, was to be within the competency of the Irish Executive. It is very difficult to be precise. Some hon. Members have said that the Constabulary is virtually a military force; others say that it is not. But I put aside the illustrations of the last speaker taken from Canada and the Cape. I know the case of the Cape pretty well. The force there is not intended for ordinary police purposes; I apprehend that the police at the Cape—the Cape Mounted Rifles, as they are called—are intended for dealing with disturbances on the frontier. In Canada there are the aborigines, and at the Cape there are the frontier tribes. There is nothing analogous to this state of things in Ireland; and the intention is that there should be at the disposal of the Irish Legislature nothing but a properly constituted police force. Next, with respect to arms. So far as arms are by usage and understanding within the true, genuine meaning of the ordinary police force, they are not entirely excluded. They may be used with certain limitations of which I cannot give a technical account. I am not aware that there is any legal definition on which I can fall back and draw a line between police and military forces; but I think that the Committee understand it. I should think, however, that within the bosom of a civilised community the case of the Irish Constabulary comes within the category of the most doubtful of any that have ever fallen under my notice. The question might then be asked—"Do you conceive that it ought to be within the attributes of the Irish Legislature, which you have disabled from establishing any description of military force, to establish a force like the Irish Constabulary?" I admit that I am not well-informed as to the facts, but my recollection is pretty distinct that the Irish Constabulary as it is has been greatly altered since its first foundation. At that early stage in its history it was almost absolutely a civil force; but in 1859 and 1850 measures were proposed and taken for the purpose of giving a more military character to the Irish Constabulary, in view of the possibility of invasion. The right hon. Gentleman said the Irish Constabulary was not a military force; and, for myself, I frankly own I do not think the Irish Legislature ought to be in a position to re-create the Irish Constabulary. Such as it is, whether it is to be described as a civil or a military force, it appears to me to be beyond the attributes of a Local Legislature, working for local purposes, having, of course, the resource of the military, and at the discretion of the Executive, in case of need, to create such a force. I regard it as an admirable force, but abnormal in many of its conditions, and, as such, not lying within the proper attributes of a Local Legislature. In these circumstances, I hope the Amendment will be withdrawn.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The speech to which we have just listened shows the extreme importance of the discussion and its bearings. I do not think anything could be more explicit or satisfactory than the declarations of the Prime Minister, and now we can see very clearly the point at issue, if, indeed, there remains any point in issue at all. The right hon. Gentleman desires that the Irish Legislature should be able to establish, in its discretion, if it finds it to be necessary, a small civil force to aid in the preservation of order. [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] I submit to the right hon. Gentleman that it would be very difficult to foresee the circumstances under which the constitution of such a force will be necessary. Of course, British troops will be in Ireland to assist in maintaining order. In this country the only force which the British Government have at their disposal is the Metropolitan Police; and I have always understood that my right hon. Friend would desire that the Metropolitan Police should be transferred to the Local Authority. If it is unnecessary for the Imperial Parliament to have an Executive force of this kind, I cannot think it is important to preserve to the Irish Legislature the right of creating such a force. In any case, supposing it is desirable to leave to the Irish Legislature this power of creating a civil force, let the Committee consider what kind of force, according to the right hon. Gentleman's declaration, it is that they will be entitled to constitute. It is not to be a military organisation; it is not to be an armed force; it is to be, properly speaking, a police force, but it is not to be a re-creation of the Irish Constabulary.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Further than an ordinary police force.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Yes; but perhaps the right hon. Gentleman is not familiar with the constitution of police forces, which are armed in some cases with bayonets, and in some with revolvers, and in all cases with truncheons. What the right hon. Gentleman means probably is that it is to be a force whose arms are to be such as not to enable it to become a military force in the ordinary acceptance of the word. I doubt very much whether it is necessary to give the Irish Legislature such a power; but if it is limited and restricted in the manner proposed, I, for one, should not think that it could, in any circumstances, be seriously mischievous. Can the right hon. Gentleman point to any clause or proposed Amendment which will prevent the Irish Parliament from creating under the name of a central civil force a force which will have a military organisation, and be an armed force according to his own definition? This is really the whole point at issue. As the Bill is drawn, even with the addition of this Amendment, there is nothing to prevent the formation of a force which might hold its own against a regiment, or, if it were sufficiently extended, against any number of British regiments. The right hon. Gentleman said he did not intend it should be possible for the Irish Legislature to re-create the Irish Constabulary, because it was to all intents a thoroughly military organisation. How does this Bill prevent the Irish Legislature from re-creating the Irish Constabulary? I am obliged to ask my right hon. Friend that question. What power is there in the Bill to prevent it?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I understand that we are to take the case of the Irish Legislature creating a central force, which is virtually to be a military force. My answer is this—that there is ample and sufficient provision in the clause to render that illegal. But that is not my full answer. The Irish Constabulary, I apprehend, is created by an Act, and any force which is to take its place must be created by an Act. It will not be possible to do that except by an Act. It will be the duty of the Viceroy to examine every Act and see that it does not establish any force of the kind. I have noticed that this is one of a set of suspicions injurious to Ireland and her Representatives here. [Laughter.] So much as this is due to our Colleagues in this House, and I am not ashamed to confess—I will not say that I am angry, because I am not angry—but I confess I am grieved to the heart by ridicule of this kind. I entirely disclaim, because I never entertained, the suspicions to which I refer.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: My right hon. Friend has a little misunderstood the interruption to which he has referred. It did not proceed from this quarter, but I think my right hon. Friend misunderstood the intention. There was no intention to cast disparaging suspicions on the Irish people or their Representatives. No, not at all; in no sense more disparaging than those cast by the provisions of this Bill. My right hon. Friend originally of his own motion prohibited the Irish Legislature from creating military or naval forces. He has now most willingly accepted an Amendment extending that provision to Volunteers and to all other military forces. In refusing to the Irish Legislature the power of creating a military force there is no intention of throwing disparaging suspicions on the Irish people and their Representatives.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I take not the slightest exception to what he is saying; from his point of view it must necessarily be said, but it was to provide for the necessities of our position that made me appear to adopt these suggestions.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I think we are substantially agreed; at all events, whatever our motives may be, we are agreed as to the propriety of prohibiting the Irish Parliament from establishing any kind of military force. Now, the answer my right hon. Friend made just now was that first, in his opinion, the Amendment he has just accepted would prevent the re-creation of the Irish Constabulary. That is, to a large extent, a legal question that I am not competent to deal with; but my right hon. Friend by my side (Sir Henry James) assures me that provision about a military force would not be sufficient to prevent it being perfectly legal for the Irish Legislature to establish a force precisely similar to the Royal Irish Constabulary. My right hon. Friend then says—"Your second security is that such a force might require an Act of Parliament."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: "Would."

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not know that it is positively so; the only way it would require an Irish Act is that it would ultimately require an Irish Appropriation Act to pay the expenses of the force; but I doubt if it would require an Act to provide for the constitution. That might be an Executive act which would not necessarily require an Act of the Legislature until the payment came to be made. But surely in a matter of this importance—and again I thank my right hon. Friend for appreciating my point of view—in a matter of this importance, from my point of view, we ought not to rest on that veto of the Viceroy, especially if we do not put the restrictions into the Bill. This will be purely an Irish affair, in which the Irish Viceroy will be advised by the Irish Government. I know that, although he will be advised by them, he will be subject to the instructions of Her Majesty ; so that advised in the first instance by the Irish Government in one sense, it may happen, if the British Ministers advise Her Majesty, he may be instructed in an opposite sense by Her Majesty. Surely the plainest and simplest way to avoid subsequent irritation and difficulty would be to put it into the Bill. I am obliged now to put the question from my point of view, which my right hon. Friend does not share. My point of view is this : that when you create a separate Legislature in Ireland you are creating a subordinate Parliament that will always desire to become co-ordinate, and would seek to exercise pressure for that purpose. You have the experience of Grattan's Parliament and the Irish Parliament preceding Grattan's Parliament. You would have Volunteers or some other nominally civil force, but which is virtually a military force, and they would put on you pressure to exact fresh concessions. That is my fear. The difficulty will arise when you yourselves are in a condition least able to meet it. I say, therefore, you ought from the first to make clear in this Bill that the establishment by the Irish Legislature of any force which can by any possibility be used hereafter as a military engine against this country is to be prohibited ; but it is not prohibited in this Bill. My right hon. Friend says he thinks it is, but I do not think any lawyer will say so. At any rate, I will put it this way—that if any lawyer can be found who will say it is prohibited it will be easy to find another who would say it was not.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I have already stated we are quite willing to reconsider the framing of the sub-section we have just passed—of course, it can only be done at a future stage of the Bill—so that any doubt shall be removed.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : I will say at once, if I understand my right hon. Friend's last statement, that will be satisfactory to me. I understood him before to say that, in his opinion, there was no necessity for any further words.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I am consenting to put them in, but my opinion holds just the same.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : I hope my interpretation is right, but I do not want any misunderstanding at a subsequent stage. It appears to me that on this matter we are agreed as to what we want. My right hon. Friend thinks it is provided for—I think it is not, and, as I understand him, he says—"Very well, in order to meet your scruples I will be induced at another stage to add words that will make our meaning perfectly clear." If that is so, I withdraw any further opposition.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.) : As I understand the right hon. Gentleman—I did not hear the whole of the conversation that took place between the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) and the Prime Minister—but, as I understand, the Government pledge themselves to bring in words that shall absolutely exclude from the new Irish Legislature the right to create any force at all analogous to the Royal Irish Constabulary. The Government are not prepared to bring those words up at present, as they require consideration, and they therefore ask for time, but make a pledge that they will, at a subsequent stage, frame the requisite Amendment. That being the view of the Government, I would recommend my hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendment, and we might then proceed with the Bill.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : With regard to the engagement, what I said was that we pledged ourselves to bring up words ; but they must be subject to communication with the view of a friendly understanding being arrived at. That is what we desire, but as it would be unusual that after several hours' discussion no progress should be made, I would suggest that the Amendment be negatived.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I think the course the right hon. Gentleman suggests rather unusual ; but I dare say my hon. Friend will be satisfied with the substantial victory he has gained. I should recommend him not to put the Committee to the trouble of a Division, as he has practically extorted from the Government all he desires.

Question put, and negatived.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The next Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Lichfield (Major Darwin) is out of Order; the one after that is in Order.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick) begged to move the Amendment standing in his name. The force of the Amendment would be recognised by the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce), as it was derived from the Constitution of the United States, being part of Section 8 of the First Article of that Constitution.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 1, after "realm," insert "or forts, permanent military camps, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings, or any places purchased for the erection thereof."—(Mr. Parker Smith.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: There is no necessity for the Amendment, as all matters connected with the defence of the realm are already reserved under the Bill. I think the hon. Member should have given us notice of these words.

MR. PARKER SMITH said, the words of the Amendment had been standing on the Paper a great many days.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I made no charge against the hon. Member; I merely said these words are in reference to the American Constitution, and we have not the Article before us.

MR. DUNBAR BARTON (Armagh, Mid) earnestly hoped his hon. Friend would not withdraw these words, and he would very soon show the Prime Minister that these words were not covered by the words "defence of the realm," because it was a recognised fact now that these forces of the Crown were to be used in Ireland, not for the defence of the realm, but for the coercion of Ulster. The Prime Minister rested his whole argument on the plea that it would be necessary to have a centralised police for dealing with Belfast; he said it might be necessary to have a Central Body, perhaps in the County of Dublin, which, under exceptional circumstances, should deal with the Province of Ulster.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No; I did not say that.

MR. DUNBAR BARTON said, the right hon. Gentleman used the words "for Belfast;" he would not deny that. [Cries of "Divide!"] Hon. Members seemed to think that the Representatives of the loyal minority in Ireland must not say anything, and he ventured to say they had been singularly scrupulous not to speak too often.

MR. J. MORLEY: I hope the hon. and learned Gentleman will allow me to interrupt him for a moment. We are quite prepared to accept the words of the hon. Member. He has added words of his own—namely, "permanent military camps," and two words at the end; but they do not materially alter the effect of what we desire to have. Though we do not think the words necessary, we are perfectly willing to accept them.

MR. T. M. HEALY would like to know whether the words "other needful buildings" occurred in the Article of the American Constitution? At the present moment the Corporation of Dublin, for purposes of a main drainage scheme, were in communication with the Military Authority. He did not know the meaning exactly of "other needful buildings;" but he sincerely trusted the American Constitution was not going to be set up to prevent them from draining Dublin.

MR. PARKER SMITH said, the words "other needful buildings" were in the Article of the American Constitution. He had forgotten that he had introduced three words into the Amendment that were not in the Article, and they were the words "permanent military camps." The words of the Constitution were—

"To exercise direct authority over all places purchased with the consent of the Legislature and the State for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings."

MR. T. M. HEALY suggested that on the Report stage these words should precede the words "defence of the realm."

MR. SEXTON thought it was perfectly clear that while there might be some context to the general language of the constitution, as they stood here the words were nonsense. The words must either come out or be brought in in connection with something to show the nature of the need.

Question put, and agreed to.

*THE CHAIRMAN : The next Amendment, in the name of the noble Lord the Member for Brixton (Lord Carmarthen), is no longer in Order ; but the first in order is in the name of the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Byrne).

*MR. BYRNE (Essex, Walthamstow) said, his only object in putting down the Amendment standing in his name and certain other Amendments upon the Paper was to endeavour to improve the Bill in case it should ever, which he sincerely hoped it would not, become an Act of Parliament. In point of fact, these Amendments were really forced upon them by reason of the framing of the Bill. The Bill as it now stood, and had been accepted so far, was framed on the lines of conferring all powers except such as were expressly mentioned, instead of being framed on the footing of enumerating those powers which were intended to be delegated. The consequence of that was, as the Prime Minister himself said the other night, it was possible that something might have been left out that ought to have been inserted, and, for his (Mr. Byrne's) part, he ventured to say that a very large number of subjects had been omitted. He had selected certain of them that he considered very important, and he had selected some because he thought they served to illustrate the necessity for a general exception at the end of the clause. With regard to the particular Amendment which he had put first on the Paper, after the discussion which had taken place to-night, he really hoped it would be accepted, as soon as he had explained it, without much discussion. The Amendment proposed to withdraw from the Irish Legislature the power of making laws, regulating the carrying and using arms, armed associations, and associations for drill or practice in the use of arms. If he was right in the view he took of these matters they could not have a more Imperial subject than this one. By using the word "Imperial," he used it in this sense : that he regarded these exceptions as being meant to be exceptions of Imperial questions, Imperial questions being those which were so intimately bound up with the welfare of the whole State, that they could not pass a law applicable to Ireland in respect to it which should not strike at the interests of this country. The Amendment as it stood—first with reference to the carriage of arms ; and, secondly, as it stood with reference to armed associations and associations for drill—differed, to some extent, in the two categories. They knew there was special legislation in Ireland, particularly with reference to dangerous associations ; and as he understood the feeling of some hon. Members of the Party opposite, their notion was that after the passing of this Act the Irish Legislature should not have power to do away with special laws, which had been found necessary in Ireland from time to time. An entirely different question was the question whether they would allow the law which had been considered necessary for the well-being of the country, so far as Ireland was concerned, to be abolished if the Irish Legislature so thought fit immediately after the passing of this Bill into law. With regard to the carrying and using arms, he proposed to ask the attention of the Committee to the law as it stood with reference to Great Britain as distinguished from special law. The law relating to carrying arms now stood in England upon the old Statute, commonly known as the Statute of Northampton, passed in the reign of Edward II. The 3rd section of the Statute was worth consideration.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress ; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (No. 2) BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Question, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That Clause 2 stand part of the Bill."

MR. BARTLEY said, he would like to ask the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Sir J. T. Hibbert) whether it was necessary to keep to the 5 per cent. rate, and whether the time had not come to make an alteration in the amount given in the Bill which, as they knew, was a sort of index to the rate of interest?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham) said, he would consider the matter. At present he was not in a position to answer the hon. Member.

MR. BARTLEY said, he hoped the matter would be considered in connection with the next Bill.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

PRISON (OFFICERS' SUPERANNUATION)
(No. 2) BILL.—(No. 359.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 29th May.]

Order for Committee read.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) objected to the stage being taken.

MR. ASQUITH said, there was only one clause of the Bill remaining for discussion, and as the measure was non-controversial, he hoped the objection would not be persisted in.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he must press his objection.

Committee deferred till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

SEA FISHERIES REGULATION (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 244.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

SIR H. MAXWELL (Wigton) wished to ask whether the Secretary for Scotland would consider, before the Committee stage came on the Report of the Committee over which he (Sir H. Maxwell) had presided, as to incorporating in the Bill some of that Committee's recommendations?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton) said, he was willing to consider these recommendations, but there were some which he took exception to, though there were others which he thought valuable.

MR. ANSTRUTHER (St. Andrews, &c.) asked, would it be possible to put down the Committee stage of the Bill for certain nights—say, Mondays and Thursdays—so that Scottish Members would not be detained night after night to watch for it?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. MARJORIBANKS, Berwickshire) said, the Bill would be put down at every convenient opportunity to facilitate discussion.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (SCHOOL ATTENDANCE) BILL.—(No. 24.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) said, the Bill dealt with an important question, and if it were to be discussed, it should be put down for some day, when it could be dealt with in an adequate manner.

MR. MARJORIBANKS said, no arrangement was possible, as the date of Public Business did not permit.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

STATUTE LAW REVISION (No. 1) BILL
(No. 282.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. GIBSON BOWLES objected.

SIR E. CLARKE appealed to the hon. Member to withdraw his objection. The Bill was one of great importance, and the public were deeply interested in its passing.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he must object to any legislation at that time of the night—after 12 o'clock.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, he had to ask Mr. Speaker, had they no power to prevent this wholesale obstruction?

MR. T. M. HEALY: I understand the hon. Member is the slave of duty.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: The hon. Member is quite right.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am surprised at the hon. Member resisting the appeal from a high authority on his own side of the House, and I would put it to him whether he is using the power which the House has given to single Members to object in its spirit and intent? If the hon. Member objects simply because it is past 12 o'clock he is impeding the Business of the House by acting in controvention of the Rule of the House.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that he valued his authority as highly as that of any one on his own side of the House, but he believed he was acting in the spirit and intent of the Rule, which was passed for the purpose of preventing hasty legislation, and, inasmuch as this was a Government Bill, and the Government had taken up the whole time of the House, he submitted it was not fair to pass it in a few seconds. It might, at least, be properly explained.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney) said, that he had attended in his place night after night in charge of two Bills that had passed the Committee stage and—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is scarcely in Order.

MR. CONYBEARE asked whether the difficulty could not be got over by a ruling that the hon. Member for King's Lynn was abusing the Forms of the House? He would ask that especially in reference to Order No. 5, the Prison (Officers' Superannuation) Bill, with which the hon. Member had nothing to do.

*MR. SPEAKER: I cannot say that the hon. Member is out of Order, but it is my duty to observe that the power of objecting after 12 o'clock ought to be used with some discrimination and discretion, because I foresee that the time is coming when some change will have to be made to prevent objections which are made indiscriminately.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, he hoped the hon. Member would withdraw his objection. As a lawyer, he knew how desirable it was that the measure should pass. It was not a Bill that could be discussed profitably in the House. It was a subject for experts.

SIR J. LUBBOCK said, he also hoped the hon. Member for King's Lynn would withdraw his objection. The power of objection after 12 o'clock was very valuable to private Members, and if the privilege was abused it might be withdrawn.

*MR. STUART-WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam) said he would point out that the Standing Order laid down that what could not be taken after 12 o'clock was Opposed Business. The hon. Member for King's Lynn had given express notice to the House that his objection was not dictated by opposition to this particular Bill. In these circumstances, was his opposition an opposition at all?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member used the words "I object," and that amounts to opposition under the Standing Order.

MR. BARTLEY wished to add his appeal to those which had already been made.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Hanbury, Hanbury [referring to Mr. Hanbury, the hon. Member for Preston].

MR. BARTLEY said, the measure, which was of a highly technical nature, ought not to be opposed.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he felt like a lady who had too many suitors for her hand. He had objected because he knew nothing about the Bill, and had had no opportunity of acquiring any knowledge of it. However, as he saw that it came from another place—the Chamber for which the Prime Minister had so great a regard—he would withdraw his objection.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

CROFTERS' HOLDINGS (SCOTLAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 236.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Objection being taken,

*MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) said, he hoped the objection would be withdrawn.

Second Reading deferred till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

ARBITRATION ACT (1889) AMENDMENT
BILL.—(No. 300.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Objection being taken,

MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby) hoped no objection would prevent the progress of this Bill. It was a very simple measure brought in to amend the Act of 1889 in a very simple point—that of having three Arbitrators instead of two.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he must object.

Second Reading deferred till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

WATERMEN'S AND LIGHTERMEN'S ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 52.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON said, the Bill had made very good progress every year, and he was anxious it should now pass the Second Reading, and be referred to a Select Committee.

An hon. MEMBER said, he objected, not because of the hour at which the Bill was taken, but because he had read its provisions, and considered them most objectionable.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES also objected.

Second Reading deferred till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

BARGE OWNERS' LIABILITY BILL.
(No. 169.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES objected.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON said, the Bill was practically part of the last one.

Second Reading deferred till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES
(EDINBURGH) PROVISIONAL ORDER
BILL.—(No. 347.)

+ Reported, without Amendment [Provisional Order confirmed]; to be read the third time To-morrow.

RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES PRO-VISIONAL ORDER [CRANBROOK AND PADDOCK WOOD RAILWAY, &c.] BILL
—(No. 339.)

Reported, without Amendment [Provisional Order confirmed]; Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PRO-VISIONAL ORDER (No. 4) BILL.—(No. 345.)

Reported, without Amendment [Provisional Order confirmed]; to be read the third time To-morrow.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PRO-
VISIONAL ORDER (No. 5) BILL.—(No. 346.)

Reported, without Amendment [Provisional Order confirmed]; to be read the third time To-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to,—Metropolitan Commons Provisional Order [Orpington] Bill. Amendments to Amendments to—Police Acts Amendments Bill; Public Libraries Act (1892) Amendment Bill, without Amendment.

MESSAGE TO THE LORDS.

Railway Rates and Charges,—Ordered, That a Message be sent to the Lords, to request that their Lordships will be pleased to give leave to the Lord Balfour of Burleigh to attend to be examined as a Witness before the Select Committee on Railway Rates and Charges.—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE

As the subject was not discussed on the Vote on Account it was competent to bring it forward on a Motion for Adjournment. Whether it was a matter of urgent public importance would be for the House to judge, June 1, 1771

CLOSURE

The question was whether the Closure could be moved after a speech had been made on a general subject, or after reasons given for moving it. A similar question was raised in August, 1887, when a right hon. Gentleman made a long and controversial speech, and at the end of it moved the Closure. A Member raised the point, and the Speaker then told him that the question had been settled by former precedents, and that it was competent for a Member at the close of a speech to move the Closure. But the Speaker was bound to say, after an experience of many years, that for a Member to make a controversial speech, and then move the Closure, was scarcely in conformity with the spirit of the Rule, because such a course shut out an answer to the speech. It would be improper and contrary to the spirit of the Rule to move the Closure, and then to give reasons; and, therefore, it would be improper to give reasons for moving the Closure, and then to move it. The question of accepting the Closure was within the discretion of the Speaker, or the Chairman, and they would be guided by the circumstances under which the Closure was moved. If a Division on a Motion for reporting Progress, or any other question, was taking place before the hour for the interruption of opposed Business, the time for the interruption of opposed Business was, so to speak, projected forward; and after the Division on the Motion under discussion at the usual hour for the interruption of Business, it would be competent for a Member to move the Closure May 12, 790, 791

According to the Standing Order it was open for any Member to move the Closure May 30, 1547

COMMITTEES

Closure (see that sub-heading)

Instructions to Committees (Government of Ireland Bill)—The principles which guide and limit the system of Instructions on going into Com. were, first, an Instruction must empower the Com. to do something which the Com. was not otherwise empowered to do; secondly, the purpose of an Instruction must be supplementary and ancillary to the purpose of the Bill, and must fall within the general scope and framework of the Bill; thirdly, it was irregular to introduce into a Bill by an Instruction a subject which should properly form the substance of a distinct measure, having regard to the usage and the general practice of enacting distinct Statutes for distinct branches of law. Having these general principles and limitations in view, the Speaker considered the 13 Instructions on the Paper. The first Instruction (Mr. Kimber's) properly formed the subject of a separate measure, so far as it related to the representation of Great Britain, and as regards that of Ireland no Instruction was necessary. The second (Mr. Parker Smith's) dealt with the ad referendum principle, and that was the Instruction which gave the Speaker the most anxiety; but he came to the conclusion that an ad referendum was a matter of such transcendent importance that it could not be brought within the scope of the Bill by an Instruction. The ad referendum had been included in the provisions of some Private Bills, enabling the ratepayers to decide by vote whether or not they should adopt a particular Act which imposed a charge upon them. But this Instruction was a proposal to enable the electors to override the decision of the House of Commons, to go over the heads of the elected

Representatives of the people, and to submit to the electors generally whether a Bill of this great magnitude should come into force or not. That, the Speaker thought, was quite beyond the scope of the Bill, and could not be brought within the scope of the Bill by an Instruction. The third (Mr. Bousfield's) might be done in Com. without an Instruction. The fourth and fifth (standing in the name of the Member for Oxford) which dealt with the Army and Militia were beyond the scope of the Bill. The Militia was a part of the Military Forces, and, like the Army, was under the control of the Military Authorities; and it would be an improper dictation to the Executive, and to the Authorities of the Army, to interfere with the movement of troops from one portion of the Kingdom to another. That could not be considered as ancillary to the Bill. It was beyond the scope of the Bill, and could not be brought within the scope of the Bill by an Instruction. The Sixth (Mr. Beckett's) was a modified ad referendum. While the Speaker held that a Bill such as this could not be over-ridden by an appeal to the electors, he was far from saying that in particular localities the ad referendum principle could not be adopted. There was also proposed in No. 6 that Ulster might be empowered to exclude itself from the Bill. Ulster might be excepted from the Bill, as any other portion of the United Kingdom might be, but this could always be done without an Instruction. This local referendum was a different thing from saying that the whole Bill could be over-ridden by an appeal to the electors over the heads of the Representatives of the electors in the House of Commons. The Seventh (Member for Bolton's) could be proposed in Com. without an Instruction. The Eighth (Sir R. Temple's) was so indefinite that it was out of Order; but the Speaker thought its object could be effected in Com. without an Instruction. The Ninth (Mr. T. W. Russell's) was a Land Bill of the widest scope, and formed a distinct subject of legislation. The Tenth (Mr. Heneage's) was a Reform Bill, and fell within the same category. The Eleventh (Mr. G. Bowles'), which proposed to divide the Bill into two parts, was, according to all precedents, distinctly in Order. The Twelfth (Mr. J. Collings') dealt with the exclusion of Ulster, which could be effected by Amendments in Com. without an Instruction. The Thirteenth (Viscount Wolmer's), could also be carried into effect under the Bill without an Instruction. To summarise what the Speaker had said—Part of No. 1, No. 2, Nos. 9 and 10 would require separate Bills; Nos. 3, 7, 12, and 13 could be dealt with in Com.; Nos. 4 and 5 were beyond the scope of the Bill, and No. 8 was not sufficiently definite, and No. 11 was in Order. May 5, 205, 206, 207

Out of the three proposals standing on the Paper to instruct the Com. the first (Lord R. Churchill's), to confer on the Com. the power of suspending the operation of Standing Order No. 35, and to allow

QUESTIONS

If a Member would take upon himself the responsibility of the statements, he could ask whether those statements were true. The better course would be, if the Member could not take upon himself the responsibility of the statements, to ascertain the facts, or else give notice of his question May 18, 1238

Limiting the number of Questions—A Member might have a legitimate curiosity which would necessitate the asking of many questions May 19, 1372

Editing and answering Questions by the various Departments would be a very responsible duty May 19, 1372

The Rule that a Member should forfeit his right for the day if he were not in his place at Question time would tend to swell the number of Questions, as those Questions could be put down on the next day May 19, 1372

RULES AND ORDER OF DEBATE

The question of how many speeches were made on the 2R. of a Bill could not be discussed on a Res. for referring a Bill to a Grand Com. May 5, 208

It was irregular to discuss the composition of a Committee (Railway Rates and Charges), which had not been struck, on the 3R. of a Railway Bill. If a Member had any objections to the Com. he could raise it when the question of the nomination of the Com. comes on May 9, 442

It was out of Order to discuss the conduct of the Board of Trade with regard to all the Railway Companies in the United Kingdom on the 2R. of a Bill for one particular Company May 11, 610

It was out of Order to refer to a Bill on the Report of a Vote on Account May 30, 1622

A Member was near the infringement of the Rule which says that a Member must not comment, except upon Motion in due course, upon the conduct of the Judges of the land, or impute to them, arising out of political circumstances, any bias in their conduct June 1, 1807
